And see also Bartel v. Brown, 104 Wis. 493, 80 N. W. 801, wherein the court said "that the importance of protecting the holders of commercial paper is so great that to warrant finding that a person who assumes to have authority to receive payment of the principal sum on any such paper has such authority, possession of the paper itself by such person, or proof aliunde of express authority, is indispensable." The doctrine of this case was approved and applied in Kohl v. Beach, 107 Wis. 409, 50 L.R.A. 600, 81 Am. St. Rep. 849, 83 N. W. 657; Spence v. Pieper, 107 Wis. 453, 83 N. W. 660; Bautz v. Adams, 131 Wis. 152, 120 Am. St. Rep. 1030, 111 N. W. 69.

And it has been held to be the debtor's duty to pay to the person owning and holding a negotiable note at the time of payment, or to his duly authorized agent, and no payment to any other person is of any effect, unless made in reliance upon the actual possession of the note, or upon words or acts of the owner so unambiguously declaring the authority of the assumed agent to receive such payment as to estop him from denying it. "Possession of a negotiable instrument is generally the sole adequate evidence of apparent authority to collect upon which the debtor has any right to rely, or can, without negligence, do so." Loizeaux v. Fremder, supra; and see, to the same effect, Winkelmann v. Brickert, 102 Wis. 50, 78 N. W. 164.

So, Mynick v. Bickings, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 401, holds that the holder of securities, by allowing or employing an attorney to collect money on loans made through him, and accepting payment thereof, did not invest the attorney with authority to receive and receipt for the principal and interest of any bond or mortgage that the holder might own, unless he had possession of the instrument, or express authority to make the collection. To the same effect, see also Cowden v. Bechlar, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 8; Bryant v. Hamlin, 3 Pa. Dist. R. 385.

433, wherein the court said that "the burden of proof is on the debtor to show that the securities were in the custody of the agent at the time of the payment . . . the collection of other securities or even a part of the existing debt is not sufficient to raise an implied authority in the agent to receive payment . . . express authority to collect interest is not sufficient to authorize the collection of the principal . . . the rule has been strictly adhered to in all the adjudged cases, that the possession of the securities by the agent is the indispensable evidence of his authority to collect the principal . . . any other principle would be dangerous in the extreme." And see, to the same effect, Viskocil v. Doktor, 27 Ill. App. 232.

So, if money is paid to one who usually received money for the obligee, such payment is not binding on the obligee if the person to whom payment was made has not the custody of the bond. Gerrard and Baker, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 145.

But where the scrivener who had made the loan thereafter collected interest from time to time and paid it to the obligee, and later collected the principal, and sent to the obligee for the bond, which was forwarded to him, the payment was held valid, although the scrivener was not in possession of the bond at the time of payment. Abbingdon and Orme, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 145.

That an attorney collected and turned over to the holder of a bond and mortgage a portion of the principal and interest thereon, and interest on other mortgages, does not establish his authority to receive payment thereof as agent of the holder, unless he has possession. Cox v. Cutter, 28 N. J. Eq. 13.

Miscellaneous.

Authorizing an attorney to foreclose a mortgage is sufficient to entitle a junior mortgagee to pay to him the amount of such mortgage after foreclosure has been commenced; especially where any defect in authority is afterward cured by the holder sending the mortgage to the attorney, who delivered it to the person who had made the making of such payments, Conway was their agent, and not the agent of the plaintiff.

Upon such findings the court rendered a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants, ordering a sale of the property, and providing for a deficiency judgment. Upon appeal, the defendants contend that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

We are very clearly of the opinion that the findings which the court made, that Conway was the agent of the defendants, and that he in no particular was the agent of the plaintiff, and did not represent him in any of the transactions referred to, is against the clear weight of the evidence. That Conway was not the agent of the defendants, and that he was some sort of an agent for the plaintiff, and represented him in some of the matters, we think is very clearly established by the evidence. True, there is no evidence to show that the plaintiff had given him any express or direct authority to negotiate the loan or to collect the interest, or to receive payment of any moneys from the Gowanses. In fact, there is affirmative evidence to show that no such direct or express authority was given Conway by the plaintiff. But the question still remains, Did the Gowanses, from plaintiff's conduct in the premises, and from Conway's participation in the transactions, with the knowledge and apparent acquiescence of the plaintiff, have the right to presume that Conway had the apparent or ostensible au-

Authority in an agent to sell property and take a note for the purchase price does not carry with it authority to collect the note, unless he has possession of it. Draper v. Rice, 56 Iowa, 114, 41 Am. Rep. 88, 7 N. W. 524, 8 N. W. 797.

Proof that it was the custom of manufacturers of farm machinery to send their wares to their general agents at a certain point, who, in their turn, sent them to their local dealers in that territory, and that the local dealers sold the machinery, usually taking notes in payment therefor, which they guaranteed and sent to the general agents, and that, as the notes matured, they were returned to the local agent who had sold the machinery, to collect the money thereon as the agent for the holder of the note, does not establish authority in a local agent to receive payment of a note taken under such circumstances, unless he has possession of the instrument. Rhodes v. Belchee, 36 Or. 141, 59 Pac. 117, 1119.

Effect of revocation of authority.

Where the agent was never in possession of the securities, notice of the revocation of his authority to collect, without possession, must be given a debtor in order to render invalid, as against the principal, payments to the agent after the revocation of his authority.

Thus, where the holder of securities knew that a third person made collections of principal due on such securities, and required him to account for such collections, and forbade him collecting more on the principal, but gave to the mortgagors no notice that he had in any way limited the authority of the agent, the effect was to give the agent apparent authority to deal with the mortgagors as he had been doing; and, as between the mortgagors and the holder of the securities, the holder should suffer the loss arising from a subsequent payment of principal by the mortgagors to such agent. Fitzgerald v. Beckwith, 182 Mass. 177, 65 N. E. 36.

So, payment of a note to an agent who formerly had authority to collect, but whose agency had been revoked, is nevertheless binding upon the principal, although the agent did not have possession of the note, where no notice of the revocation of the agency had reached the debtor at the time he made the payment. Ulrich v. McCormick, 66 Ind. 243.

Spencer v. Wilson, 4 Munf. 130; Edinburgh-American Land Mortg. Co. v. Noonan, 11 S. D. 141, 76 N. W. 298, also hold that the maker of negotiable securities is entitled to pay same to a person other than the holder thereof, who has theretofore been authorized to receive payment, although such authority is revoked, unless notice of such revocation is given the debtor. Of course, payment to such an agent after notice of revocation of his authority to receive payment is not binding on the holder of securities. Upton v. Jameson, 67 Mo. 234.

But where the agent was in possession of the securities at the time of payment, the withdrawal of the securities from his possession is a sufficient notice of revocation of authority to collect, and payments thereafter made are at the risk of the debtor making same.

On this point, in Crane v. Gruenewald, 120 N. Y. 274, 17 Am. St. Rep. 643, 24 N. E. 456, the court said: "Information of the physical fact of possession by the attorney is alone effectual for protection. And he must have such knowledge when every payment is made, for no presumption of a continuance of possession can be indulged in for the purpose of giving support to an apparent authority on the part of an attorney to act, where no actual authority exists. This knowledge he did not have, for it was not the fact. By his own wrongful act, the attorney had parted with possession, and, as a necessary consequence, has deprived himself of the power to longer misrepresent his authority in respect thereto to the detriment of the mortgagee. The mortgagor thereafter placed his trust solely in the assertions of the attorney and was deceived. In so doing he was legally as much at fault as the mort-thority to represent the plaintiff and to receive moneys for him? So far as pertains to the negotiations of the loan, it appears all that Milner had to do with it was to approve the loan. The matter of negotiating and consummating the loan, attending to the execution and delivery of the note and deed, and paying over the moneys of the loan to the Gowanses, were all conducted by Conway. As a result of such transactions on the part of Conway, the plaintiff received and accepted the note and deed, and recognized the transactions so had and concluded by him, and to that extent ratified the acts of Conway. The natural inference to be drawn from the evidence is that the coupons were delivered to Conway for collection, and that all the interest payments were made to him, presumably when he had the coupons in his possession. The undisputed evidence shows that the plaintiff had knowledge that Conway collected the interest of the Gowanses, and that it was paid over to Milner by him. The plaintiff having knowledge of such fact, and of the manner in which Conway collected the interest, and by plaintiff's receiving and accepting it, and in no manner repudiating the acts of Conway, it justifies a finding that his acts in those particulars were also ratified by the gagee, who also relied upon the attorney's trustworthiness. Therefore he cannot invoke in support of his contention the doctrine of apparent authority,—a rule which undoubtedly had its foundation in the equitable principle that, if one of two innocent persons must suffer, he ought to suffer in preference whose conduct has misled the confidence of the other into an unwary act."

And in Stiger v. Bent, 111 Ill. 328, the court remarked that where the agent has the possession of the promissory note after due, it may be inferred that he has authority to receive payment of it; and the burden is on the debtor who makes payment to the agent, relying upon such inference, to show that the promissory note was in his possession when the payment was made; the fact that the note was neither surrendered nor offered to be surrendered, under the circumstances is conclusive that he did not then have it.

So, money paid to an agent as owner of a bond and mortgage after a withdrawal of the papers from such agent by the owner is not a valid payment. Emery v. Gordon, 33 N. J. Eq. 447.

Authority to collect may, in some cases, be inferred from the possession of the bond and mortgage; but, in such cases, it is incumbent upon the debtor making the payment to show that the securities were in the possession of the person assuming authority to receive payment on each occasion when the payments were made, for the withdrawal of the security would be a revocation of the authority. Smith v. Kidd, 68 N. Y. 130, 23 Am. Rep. 157; Williams v. Walker, 2 Sandf. Ch. 325.

A debtor is authorized to infer that an attorney or scrivener who has been employed to make a loan is empowered to receive both principal and interest, from his having possession of the bond and mortgage given for the loan, or of the former only; but the inference in such cases is founded on the custody of the securities, and it ceases whenever they are withdrawn by the creditor; and it is incumbent on the debtor who makes payment to the attorney or agent, relying upon such inference, to show that the securities were in his possession on each occasion when the payments were made. This rule, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

however, does not apply where express authority to pay the principal and interest to an agent is shown. Haines v. Pohlmann, 25 N. J. Eq. 179.

And see Bloomer v. Dau, 122 Mich. 522, 81 N. W. 331, which holds that the withdrawal of securities from a general agent having authority to collect both principal and interest is an implied revocation of such authority. An express notice of such revocation to a debtor who had been paying such agent is not necessary. The court said: "When the debtor pays his debt, he is entitled to a surrender of the written evidence of that debt. Creditors usually place the bonds, notes, and mortgages they desire to have paid into the hands of their agent whom they authorize to collect. The absence of such papers is usually sufficient to place the debtor upon inquiry as to the agent's authority. A general agency continues until, in some way, parties have been notified of its termination, or have sufficient facts in their possession to put them upon inquiry. Banks are collection agencies, and the courts will take judicial notice of the fact that notes and other evidences of debt accompany the agency, and are placed in their hands, to be surrendered when the debt is paid. It must be presumed, therefore, that defendants knew that this was the customary method of doing business, and that this bank would, in the due course of business, if its agency continued, have the note and mortgage in its hands for surrender."

In the absence of the possession of the security paid, actual agency may be established by proof of circumstances—by circumstantial evidence—bearing upon the question. Thus, where it appears that the alleged agent has repeatedly accepted payment of securities belonging to the principal, without being in possession, which act the principal has ratified and accepted, his authority for the performance of the disputed act may be inferred. This mode of proof of agency does not rest on estoppel, it is proof of a fact by deduction or inference from other facts. Hence, the acts need not be shown to have been known by the party claiming that he dealt with the agent. Heferman v. Boteler, 87 Mo. App. 316.

plaintiff. It is a general rule that a subsequent ratification has a retrospective effect and is equivalent to a prior command. We think it is quite clearly* established that Conway had the apparent or ostensible authority to represent the plaintiff in the negotiation of the loan and in receiving the interest payments. The judgment of the court below can, therefore, not stand on the findings made that Conway was the defendants' agent, and not plaintiff's agent, in any particular and for no purpose.

The difficult question, however, in the case, is, Does the evidence show that Conway had authority to receive payments of the principal for the plaintiff? The burden was on the Gowanses to prove that Conway had either express or apparent authority to receive the payments in question for the plaintiff. There is again no proof to show that he had direct or express authority to receive payments of the principal. The question then is, Have the defendants sustained the burden of proof that Conway had such an apparent or ostensible authority as to reasonably induce them to believe that he was authorized to receive payments of the principal? Counsel for respondent invoke the rule that a payment of the principal, in part or in full, to an alleged or an assumed agent who has not the possession of the securities at the time of the payment, nor express or special authority to receive the payments, is not binding on the creditor. There is no doubt that a number of cases so hold.

The rule in that regard, as stated in 1 Jones on Mortgages, 5th ed. § 964, is as follows: "Even authority to collect the interest upon a mortgage does not afford ground for inferring authority to collect the principal, where the agent is not intrusted with the possession of the securities. The mortgagor is bound to know the extent of the agent's authority. If he pays the principal to an agent, he must be prepared to prove express authority. He pays to an agent at his peril. The rule has been strictly adhered to in all the adjudged cases that the possession of the securities by the agent is the indispensable evidence of his authority to collect the principal."

In the case of Eaton v. Knowles, 61 Mich. 625, 28 N. W. 740, it is said: "The rule is well settled that, when a person makes payment upon non-negotiable securities to a person assuming to act as agent, he should see to it that the securities are in the possession of the person claiming to be agent; otherwise he may be compelled to pay the same again, unless he can show that the money was actually paid over to the principal, or that the agent was specially authorized to receive payment."

App. 433, the following language is used: "The collection of other securities, or even a part of the existing debt, is not sufficient to raise an implied authority in the agent to receive payment. . . . Express authority to collect interest is not sufficient to authorize the collection of the principal. . . . The rule has been strictly adhered to in all the adjudged cases that the possession of the securities by the agent is the indispensable evidence of his authority to collect the principal."

The following, among other cases which might be cited, also support this doctrine: Smith v. Kidd, 68 N. Y. 136, 23 Am. Rep. 157; Lawson v. Nicholson, 52 N. J. Eq. 821, 31 Atl. 386; Lane v. Duchac, 73 Wis. 646, 41 N. W. 962; Western Security Co. v. Douglass, 14 Wash. 215, 44 Pac. 257; Crane v. Gruenewald, 120 N. Y. 274, 17 Am. St. Rep. 643, 24 N. E. 456.

These cases all proceed on the theory that an apparent or an ostensible authority cannot be inferred of one assuming to act as the agent of another in receiving payments of the principal, who has not, at the time of the making of such payment, the securities in his possession, and who has not direct or special authority for so acting. That is to say, in order to imply such authority, in the absence of proof of direct or special authority, it is held by these cases that two things are essential and indispensable: (1) Possession of the securities by the supposed agent, with the consent of the mortgagee at the time of the payment; and (2) knowledge of such possession on the part of the mortgagor or debtor at the time of the making of the payment.

On the contrary, there are cases supporting the rule that the fact that the note and mortgage were not in the possession of the supposed agent when he collected the principal is not conclusive of the questions of agency and authority, but is a matter of evidence, to be weighed and considered in connection with all the facts and circumstances in evidence. Thomson v. Shelton, 49 Neb. 644, 68 N. W. 1055; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Walter, 51 Neb. 182, 70 N. W. 938; Harrison v. Legore, 109 Iowa, 618, 80 N. W. 670; Quinn v. Dresbach, 75 Cal. 159, 7 Am. St. Rep. 138, 16 Pac. 762; Morgan v. Neal, 7 Idaho, 629, 97 Am. St. Rep. 264, 65 Pac. 66; Fowle v. Outcalt, 64 Kan. 352, 67 Pac. 889; Reid v. Kellogg, 8 S. D. 596, 67 N. W. 687.

In all these cases a finding of apparent or ostensible authority of the alleged agent to collect and receive payment of the principal was upheld, notwithstanding the fact that the assumed agent did not have in his possession the note or mortgage at the time of the making of the payment. Of course, in these cases it was held that there were other sufficient facts and circumstances shown to justify the presumption of such apparent authority of the assumed agent. We believe these cases state the better rule. They proceed on the theory, not that some one particular fact, such as the failure of the assumed agent to have possession of the securities, is determinative or conclusive of the question of agency and authority, but on the broader doctrine, well stated in Johnston v. Milwaukee & W. Invest. Co. 46 Neb. 480, 64 N. W. 1100, that "where a principal has, by his voluntary act, placed an agent in such a situation that a person of ordinary prudence, conversant with business usages and the nature of the particular business, is justified in presuming that such agent has authority to perform, on behalf of his principal, a particular act, such particular act having been performed, the principal is estopped, as against such innocent third person, from denying the agent's authority to perform it."

It, however, is said that the ruling in the case of Quinn v. Dresbach, supra, was based on a statute which provided that "ostensible authority is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess." But, as there observed by the court in that case, "this is the embodiment of a well-established principle of the common law, which has been called 'the foundation of the law of agency.'" The principle invoked in these cases, and as expressed in some of them, is but the application of the maxim declared many years ago by Mr. Justice Ashhurst, in the case of Frith v. Leroux, 2 T. R. 70, that "we may lay it down as a broad general principle that, wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it." The fact, therefore, that Conway did not have the securities in his possession at the time when the Gowanses paid the principal to him, which was then well known to them, is not to be regarded as conclusive of the question of Conway's agency, or of his ostensible authority, but is, as matter of evidence, to be considered with all the other facts and circumstances in the case. The fact that an alleged agent did not have in his possession the securities at the time the debtor paid the principal to him is, as matter of evidence, entitled to great weight. And we think it may be said, generally that such fact, when considered as evidence, may be alone sufficient to require a finding that an agent, though he has express authority to negotiate the loan and collect the interest, and thereunder performs such acts, nevertheless has not the ostensible authority to collect or receive any part of the principal, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) and that the debtor has not the right reasonably to presume that he had such authority. To the contrary, there may be instances where the agent has express authority to collect the interest, and has possession of the securities with the consent of the creditor, and the fact of such possession is known to the debtor when he pays the principal to such agent, but where, nevertheless, the debtor because of other facts and circumstances, may not be justified in presuming that such agent had ostensible authority to collect and receive the principal, or any part of it. If this were a law case, and the court or jury, from all the evidence here shown, had found either way on the question of Conway's apparent or ostensible agency and authority to receive and collect the moneys here in question we would not feel justified in disturbing the finding or verdict on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support it. But, this being a case in equity, brought here on an appeal on questions of both law and fact, it is our duty, under the Constitution, to determine not whether there is sufficient evidence in the record to support the findings, but whether the findings, as made, are such as were called for by the evidence adduced. True, in the case of McKay v. Farr, 15 Utah, 261, 49 Pac. 649, it was decided shortly after the adoption of the Constitution that while this court had the "power under the Constitution to review questions of fact in an equity case, still, when such cases have been regularly tried before a court of chancery, and facts found on all material issues, we will not disturb such findings unless they are so manifestly erroneous as to demonstrate some oversight or mistake which materially affects the substantial rights of the appellant." In support of this rule, cases from the territorial supreme court are cited which were decided long prior to the adoption of the Constitution. The court evidently was mindful of the maxim that "the practice of the court is the law of the court," regardless of the Constitution; that, since it was the practice of the territorial supreme court before the Constitution to so regard the facts in an equity case, the state supreme court would continue to do so notwithstanding the Constitution, which conferred not only the power, but also imposed the duty on the court, in an equity case, to review the facts as well as the law. The rule thus announced in effect, amounted to the exercise of no greater or different power in an equity case than was exercised in a law case. This rule was substantially departed from in the case of Wilson v. Cunningham, 24 Utah, 167, 67 Pac. 118, where, although the court repeated, the language above quoted, it nevertheless said: "We do not wish to be understood, however, that we are concluded by the findings of the trial court," though there be a conflict in the evidence. "We do not mean that we have abdicated our supervision and control over facts in equity cases. . . . When the testimony preponderates on one side or the other in such a way as to convince this court that the court below has erred, its judgment will be reversed." The court there, however, further observed that when there is a great or irreconcilable conflict in the testimony, or where it is evenly balanced, the findings which the trial court made will ordinarily be sanctioned by this court by an affirmance. When there is a substantial conflict in the evidence upon which a finding of fact has been made by the trial court, in our review of the facts to determine whether the findings made were such as were called for by the evidence, proper consideration must be given to the trial court's opportunity to observe the conduct and demeanor of the witnesses in giving their testimony, to test their faculty of memory, and their intelligence and capacity to understand and comprehend the things testified to by them, and to observe other things which may affect the weight of the testimony and the credibility of the witnesses. But it does not follow that a finding made by the trial court, in an equity case, on a conflict in the evidence, necessarily requires our approval. The parties on appeal are entitled to our judgment on the facts, and it is our duty to give it. In the case in hand, all the testimony of the witnesses was given by deposition. The trial court's opportunity to pass on the weight of the testimony and the credibility of the witnesses was, therefore, no better than ours. Furthermore, the finding made by the trial court, that Conway was not authorized to receive the moneys in question for the plaintiff, was based on the finding that Conway was defendants', and not the plaintiff's, agent. In this regard the court found "that Porter J. Conway was not, at any time, the duly authorized or credited agent or representative of the plaintiff, and therefore was not authorized to act, and did not act, as the agent of the plaintiff, and that the payments made by the said defendants to said Conway were made voluntarily, and without authorization from plaintiff."

On the question whether the defendants were justified in believing that Conway had the apparent or ostensible authority to receive such payments for the plaintiff, and whether the plaintiff, by his acts and conduct in the premises, held Conway out in such manner as reasonably to induce the defendants to believe that Conway had such apparent or ostensible authority,—the very thing upon which the court ought to have made a finding,—it made no finding, unless it shall be said that, from the fact that Conway did not have the possession of the securities, it must be conclusively presumed, as matter of law, that he had no apparent or ostensible authority to receive payments of the principal for the plaintiff. But we have held no such conclusive presumption of law can properly be indulged. Treating the fact that Conway did not have the possession of the securities as matter of evidence, giving it due weight, and considering it in connection with all the other facts and circumstances in evidence, we are of the opinion, on the facts, that the defendants were justified in believing that Conway had the apparent or ostensible authority to receive the moneys in question for the plaintiff. In reaching this conclusion, we are influenced by the facts that, though the plaintiff had not given Conway express authority to act for him in the transactions referred to, he, nevertheless, had knowledge that Conway acted for him in the negotiation of the loan and in the collection of interest, and that the plaintiff ought reasonably to have expected that the defendants might well believe that Conway had the authority to do these things; that the plaintiff was notified that Conway was negligent and had failed to account with reasonable promptness for the moneys collected by him for the plaintiff, not only on account of the Gowans note, but also for moneys collected by him for the plaintiff from others, and that the plaintiff was warned not to trust Conway too far; and that, notwithstanding the plaintiff's knowledge that Conway was collecting money for him from the Gowanses, and that he failed to promptly account for it, nevertheless the evidence, without conflict, shows that the plaintiff remained silent and continued to permit Conway to participate in the transactions and to collect moneys for him without objection. The plaintiff, having received information of Conway's derelictions, ought to have taken some action in the premises, and should not have acquiesced in Conway's continuing to collect money for him. When the plaintiff, thus knowing of Conway's remissness, permitted him to act for him in these matters without objection, he ought not now to be heard to complain. We think, under the circumstances, the principle that, "when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it," should be applied. In reaching this conclusion, we are also not unmindful that Milner, a witness for the plaintiff, testified that he wrote and mailed a letter to the Gowanses, requesting them not to pay Conway, but to pay the witness, as he was plaintiff's agent. He testified that he did not keep a copy of the letter, and testified several times that he could not fix the date when he wrote and mailed it, but finally answered "Yes" to a leading question propounded to him by plaintiff's counsel, if it was not prior to July 12, 1899, the time when the Gowanses made the first payment on the principal. The mailing of a letter postpaid and properly addressed to a person shown to reside in a city or town to which the letter was addressed creates no legal presumption, but a presumption or inference of fact, that it reached its destination. 1 Elliott, Ev. § 107. The testimony of the witness Milner is therefore some evidence that the letter testified to by him was received by the Gowanses in the due course of mail. The defendants, however, testified that no such letter as testified to by Milner was received by them. On such question we think the evidence preponderates in favor of the defendants, and it is not reasonable to presume that they, after receiving such information, would have paid any part of the principal to Conway.

We are therefore of the opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to vacate the judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, and to enter a judgment in favor of the defendants Hugh S. & Betsy Gowans, requiring the plaintiff to surrender and cancel the note and trust deed, and to satisfy the same of record, and to surrender and transfer the certificate of water right mentioned in the pleadings, and which also had been transferred to plaintiff by the Gowanses, as security for the debt. Costs to appellants.

It is so ordered.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT

ARCHIBALD I. LAWRENCE

v.

OLIVER H. TOOTHAKER et al.

Public contracts — personal liability.

1. Members of a board of education, who, without authority, attempt to bind the city by a contract for services on a school building, do not render themselves personally liable for the services so rendered if the facts were equally within the cognizance of the other contracting party.

Same — limitation of power — imputed knowledge.

2. One entering into a contract with a board of education which attempts to bind the municipality is chargeable with knowledge of the official limitation upon the power of the members.

Same — implied warranty of power.

3. Members of a board of education undertaking to contract on behalf of the municipality do not impliedly guarantee that they have the requisite power, where all the facts and circumstances surrounding the case are known to the other contracting party.

Case Note. — Personal liability of public officer on contract which he attempts to make for public in excess of his authority.

This note does not include those cases where, although it appeared that the person sought to be held liable was a public agent, it did not appear that the contract on which he was sought to be held liable was entered into without authority.

Whatever may be the rule as to the individual liability of persons who, as agents for private parties, enter into a contract which is not within the scope of their authority, without doubt it is the general rule that, when public agents, in good faith, contract with parties having full knowledge of the extent of their authority, or who have equal means of knowledge with themselves, they do not become individually liable unless the intent to incur personal responsibility is clearly expressed, although it should be found that, through ignorance of the law, they have exceeded their authority. Houston v. Clay County, 18 Ind. 396 (contract by township trustees for the erection of a bridge, who, without authority of law, provided for part of its payment by the proceeds of a tax thereafter to be collected by virtue of a vote of the township); Newman v. Sylvester, 42 Ind. 106 (contract for improvement of a street, which had been let by the common council under the misapprehension that the street was within the corporate limits of the city); Murray v. Carothers, 1 Met. (Ky.) 71 (contract for the building of a bridge, which the commissioners had no authority to enter into because order therefor was made by the county judge without the concurrence of a majority of the justices of the county); Southworth v. Flanders, 33 La. Ann. 190 (passing by mayor and administrators of city of ordinance unauthorized by law, by which the recorder of mortgages was authorized to obtain copies of all unrecorded and unexpired tax judgments and have them recorded); Humphrey v. Jones, 71 Mo. 62 (execution of note by director of school district, for the benefit of the district, in good faith believing himself authorized to bind the district); Sanborn v. Neal, 4 Minn. 126, Gil. 83, 77 Am. Dec. 502 (giving of note by trustees of school district in payment of debt); First Nat. Bank v. Becker County, 81 Minn. 95, 83 N. W. 468 (unauthorized issuing of orders by officers of organized county for EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Superior Court for Coos County, made during the trial of an action brought to hold them personally liable on a contract made by them on behalf of a municipality. Sustained.

A fire destroyed a schoolhouse in the town of Berlin. Defendants, acting as a school board, requested plaintiff, an architect, to prepare plans for a new building as quickly as possible. A contract was agreed upon by which defendants attempted to bind the municipality for the value of plaintiff's services. Defendants subsequently canceled the contract, and plaintiff, having failed to hold the municipality liable for his services, brought this action to hold defendants personally liable.

official services, election expenses, jury fees, and other expenses of unorganized county); Henry v. Henry, 73 Neb. 746, 103 N. W. 441, 107 N. W. 789 (procuring of loan by administratrix and executing mortgage without authority of law); McCurdy v. Rogers, 21 Wis. 198, 91 Am. Dec. 468 (contract to pay bounty for enlistment in military service, which bounty was beyond the amount authorized); Olifiers v. Belmont, 12 Misc. 160, 33 N. Y. Supp. 275, reaffirmed without opinion in 159 N. Y. 550, 54 N. E. 1093 (contract by secretary of committee appointed by mayor for celebration of discovery of America, for manufacture and delivery of lampions); 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 381.

In Huthsing v. Bousquet, 2 McCrary, 152, 7 Fed. 833, it was held that supervisors who, without intending to bind themselves personally, and without authority of law, offer a reward for the apprehension of robbers and the return of the money stolen, cannot be held personally liable for such reward, since, as the court said, the person seeking to recover the reward must have had knowledge that the supervisors had no such authority. The court, in this case, also took occasion to say further: "It has been suggested that the defendants offered the reward without any formal meeting and resolution of the board authorizing it. This would be material if there had been any statutory authority empowering the board, at a regular or called session, to offer the reward in question; but since if, at an authorized session, a resolution of the board offering the reward would have been utterly without authority and void, it can make no kind of difference that the defendants acted without such formal meeting and authority. If there had been statutory authority, and the defendants had acted, in offering the reward, without actual authority conferred by the board, the plaintiff could charge them upon the contract as agents acting without or transcending their authority, because, in that case, the want of authority depending on a matter of fact, not law, notice of the 23 L.R.A. When the officers of a municipal corporation, acting in good faith, attempt to enter into a municipal contract, under an innocent mistake of law that they have legal authority to do so, in which mistaken impression the other party shares, no liability attaches to the officials personally.

A similar case, and holding to the same effect, is Schieber v. Von Arx, 87 Minn. 298, 92 N. W. 3, where county commissioners, without authority of law, offered a certain sum for the finding of a missing man.

For the same reason, commissioners of highways, who, in a proceeding to lay out a highway, had been unable to agree with a landowner as to the damages he would sustain, and who had, without authority of law, submitted the matter of damages to arbitration, were held, in Mann v. Richardson, 66 Ill. 481, not to be individually liable, although, in pursuance thereof, the commissioners had executed their bond in their individual names, containing an express covenant to abide by and perform the award, if it should be made in writing under the hands and seals of arbitrators and by the day stated, the court finding that the conditions of the bond were never fulfilled.

In McHenry v. Duffield, 7 Blackf. 41, an action was brought against the members of a building committee, founded on an instrument which, by its terms, showed that there was due a certain person a certain sum for work done on the building; this instrument being signed by the committee "in behalf of the trustees." The court, in holding that the action would not lie, said: "No suit on the instrument before us can be sustained against the defendants, because it does not contain any acknowledgment by them individually. If they were authorized by the trustees to execute it, the suit should be against the trustees. If they were not so authorized, they are liable in case for acting in the matter without authority."

In Duncan v. Niles, 32 Ill. 532, 83 Am. Dec. 293, a county judge, without authority from the county, executed an instrument purporting, for value received, to bind the county to pay a certain sum of money to a certain person; the instrument was signed by the judge, describing himself as county judge of the county. Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence is not sufficient to support a finding that, at the time the contract was made, the defendants intended to bind themselves personally, or that the plaintiff understood they did. No express promise on the part of the defendants was made, and it was not suggested by the plaintiff that the defendants were to be deemed the responsible contracting parties. Nor is there any evidence that the defendants suppressed any material facts relating to their authorization to bind the city. Both parties acted in good faith, upon the assumption that the defendants were authorized to make the contract as representatives of the city; and, in accordance with that understanding, the plaintiff gave credit to the city. It may be conceded that the defendants, as the board of education, had no authority to contract with the plaintiff for and in behalf of the city, and that the attempted exercise of such authority was futile. But it does not follow that the defendants bound themselves to pay for the plaintiff's services. Ogden v. Raymond, 22 Conn. 379, 384, 58 Am. Dec. 429. The board's want of statutory power to do what it attempted to do was as much within the cognizance of the plaintiff as that of the defendants. Richards v. Columbia, 55 N. H. 96, 99; Sprague v. Cornish, 59 N. H. 161. The plaintiff was chargeable with knowledge of their official limitations; and, having voluntarily contracted with them in their official capacity, and given credit to the city for the performance of the contract, he is in no position to claim that the defendants are personally responsible on the contract, in the absence of an express promise by them to incur that responsibility, unless the law would imply a promise of guaranty that they had the requisite power. But, "where all the facts and circumstances surrounding the case are known to both the agent and third party, but there is a mutual mistake as to a matter of law,—as the principal's liability or the legal effect of the agent's written authority,—the agent cannot be held personally responsible by reason of the mere fact that the principal cannot be held, unless the agent, by some apt expression, guarantees the contract or assumes it himself." 2 Clark & S. Agency, 582b; Jeffs v. York, 10 Cush. 392. And this principle of law is equally applicable when public officers, like the defendants, assume to bind the public by their contracts with third parties. Their authority is statutory; and whether their attempted exercise of it in a particular case is authorized is ordinarily a question of law, which the other contracting party has ample opportunity to investigate and decide for himself. If, for any reason, he is unwilling to incur that risk, an express guaranty by the other that he acts within the scope of his authority would be necessary to render the latter liable on the contract. Underhill v. Gibson, 2 N. H. 352, 9 Am. Dec. 82; Brown v. Rundlett, 15 N. H. 360; Farnam v. Davis, 32 N. H. 302. Cases like Weare v. Gove, 44 N. H. 196, do not conflict with this result. It was there expressly recognized (page 197 of 44 N. H.) that the agent cannot be held "where the promisee, being fully informed of the facts upon which the assumed authority rests, forms his own judgment, and contracts for and relies upon the engagement of the principal alone. In such a case it would be unjust that the agent should be bound, because such was not the contract."

As the reported evidence negatives the idea that the parties intended that the defendants should be individually liable on the contract, and as there is no evidence that they guaranteed their authority or were guilty of any fraud upon the plaintiff, the defendants' motion for a verdict should have been granted.

Exception sustained. Verdict set aside.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

GEORGE W. SMYTH, Respt.,
v.

BROOKLYN UNION ELEVATED RAIL-ROAD COMPANY et al., Appts.

(193 N. Y. 335, 85 N. E. 1100.)

Appeal — intermediate affirmance — effect.

1. The unanimous affirmance by the appellate division of what purports to be a finding of fact as to the legal effect of a legal instrument will not prevent a review by the court of appeals of the question of law involved in the construction of the instrument.

Grant — license — construction.

2. The execution by an abutting owner, who also owns the fee of the street, to a corporation operating an elevated railroad therein, of an instrument consenting to the maintenance and operation of the railroad, and releasing it on behalf of the grantor, his successors and assigns, from all demands for compensation for the maintenance and operation of the road, is a grant of an easement in the street, and not a mere license.

Estoppel — release.

3. A release by an abutting property owner who also owns the fee of the street, on behalf of himself and his successors in title, of a corporation operating an elevated railroad therein from any claim for compensation arising from the maintenance and operation of the railroad, estops such successors from claiming compensation for the operation of the road, either in eminent domain

Case Note. — Remedy of abutting owner as affected by his consent to the construction of a railroad or street railway in street.

A full discussion of the question of the remedy of an abutting owner as affected by his consent to the construction of a railroad or street railway in a street is found in a case note to Wolfard v. Fisher, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 991. Since the writing of that note, aside from SMYTH v. BROOKLYN UNION ELEV. R. Co., but little authority of value has been found.

In Taylor v. Erie City Pass. R. Co. 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 292, it was held that where an owner of land abutting on a road consents to the occupation of the road by a street railway, and licenses the company "to occupy and extend their line of railway with the necessary turnouts, and operate the same along such road," such license, after the construction of the railway, becomes irrevocable, and the railway company cannot be enjoined from subsequently extending the length of a switch, where it appears that such extension is not unreasonable un-proceedings or in an equity suit to enjoin such operation until compensation is paid.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for King's County, granting an injunction against the maintenance and operation of a railroad in front of plaintiff's premises until compensation was paid. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles L. Woody, with Mr. George D. Yeomans, for appellants:

The consent to the construction and operation is a complete bar to injunctive relief.

In Staton v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 147 N. C. 428, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 449, 61 S. E. 455, it was held that one who delays seeking an injunction against the operation of a railroad in a public street for a period of seventeen years, until its removal would seriously affect public interests, will be denied such relief.

In Shaw v. New York Elev. R. Co. 187 N. Y. 186, 79 N. E. 984, the writing of the words, "I am in favor of an elevated road over the middle of the street, but not on the walk," upon a paper circulated among property owners, in behalf of the railroad company, underneath a heading which, if subscribed without any qualifications or limitations, would have amounted to a general consent to the construction of the road, was recognized, assuming it to be a consent, as merely a qualified and conditional one, which did not cut off a claim for damages for the subsequent construction and operation of the road upon the sidewalk.

The release from the payment of any compensation arising from or connected with the maintenance and operation of the railroad is, of itself, a complete bar.

Mr. Cyrus V. Washburn, for respondent:

The instrument creates no interest in land, as it gives a more revocable license.

The clause as to compensation is a release only of the past or rental damages arising from the maintenance and operation of the road up to the date of the instrument.

Willard Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is the familiar suit of a property owner for a conditional injunction against the maintenance of an elevated railroad and for damages incurred by reason of its past maintenance and operation. Two pieces of property are involved. As to one of them, the plaintiff's right to recover was undisputed, and it was conceded that he was entitled to an award of $1,000 on account of the damage to that piece. As to the other, however, the defendants relied upon a written instrument, executed by the plaintiff's predecessors in title, as a bar to the action; and the determination of the present appeal depends upon the effect which should be given to that instrument. If it is nothing more than a revocable license, as has been held at special term and by the appellate division, the defendants concede that the judgments below were right. If, on the other hand, this constituted an effective grant of the easements now claimed by the plaintiff, or an estoppel against the plaintiff's claim for relief, the judgment in his favor is too broad so far as the injunction is concerned, and is too large by the sum of $400.

The title of the plaintiff to the property in question, which is situated on Fulton street in the borough of Brooklyn, was derived from the Brooklyn City Railroad Company, and extends to the middle of the street. On the 3d of June, 1893, the Brooklyn City Railroad Company, as party of the first part, executed and delivered to the Kings County Elevated Railroad Company, the predecessor of the defendants, as party of the second part, an instrument in writing, under seal, which recited that the Kings County Elevated Railroad Company then maintained and operated its elevated railroad in front of the premises, and that the Brooklyn City Railroad Company had agreed that it might so maintain and operate the same, and further provided as follows: "Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and the sum of $1, paid by the party of the second part to the party of the first part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, said party of the first part doth hereby consent that the party of the second part may pass all depots, stables, power stations on the said above-described premises, and maintain its elevated railroad structure on and over said street, and operate its elevated railroad thereon, as the same is now constructed, without compensation therefor to the party of the first part. And the party of the first part, for itself, its successors and assigns, hereby releases and discharges the party of the second part, its successors and assigns, from any and all claims and demands for any such compensation arising from or connected with such maintenance of said structure, and the operation of its railroad, as now constructed and operated." The trial court found that the said consent "was not intended as a grant, and gave the defendant no easements or interests in the land involved in this case; that it created a mere license as between the parties thereto, and that the plaintiff is not thereby precluded from maintaining this action as to said premises, and that said elevated railroad was neither constructed nor put in operation upon the faith of said consent." The learned counsel for the respondent insists that, in view of the unanimous affirmance of this finding by the appellate division, the court of appeals is without jurisdiction to review this case. In other words, that we cannot pass upon the legal effect of the instrument of consent. As to this objection, it is only necessary to point out that the finding, although denominated a conclusion of fact, is, except the last clause therein contained, only a statement of conclusions of law. The exception to this finding, therefore, brings up a question of law which can be reviewed in this court.

We are unable to agree with the courts below in the construction which they have placed upon the instrument in question. When that instrument was executed and delivered, the Brooklyn City Railroad Company appears to have been in occupation of the property for its corporate purposes. The Kings County Elevated Railroad Company had erected its elevated railroad structure in front of the premises, and had operated its trains over the same for many years. If the instrument had been intended to be a mere license, revocable at will, it is difficult to perceive any adequate reason for its execution so far as the future was concerned. Thus viewed, it effected no change in the legal relation of the parties. The pre-existing oral license was just as good. When, however, we consider the situation of both parties to the instrument and the language of the paper itself, it seems to us quite clear that it was the intent of the property owner to give much more than a license. The party of the first part consented that the party of the second part might "maintain its elevated railroad structure on and over said street, and operate its elevated railroad thereon, as the same is now constructed, without compensation therefor to the party of the first part." This phrase is vitally significant. "Compensation" is the word used in the constitutional provision which regulates the taking of private property for public use. Const. 1894, art. 1, § 7. The term, as used in this consent, could have no natural application to the release of any claim for past damages. That was dealt with in a subsequent part of the instrument. The phrase indicates that the parties contemplated the continued invasion of the property owner's easements in the street without insisting upon the payment therefor to which the property owner would otherwise have been entitled.

We have here, as in the case of White v. Manhattan R. Co. 139 N. Y. 19, 34 N. E. 887, a full, unconditional, and absolute consent given by the property owner for the maintenance and operation of an elevated railroad in front of his premises. The learned court below, however, distinguished the effect of the release in this case from that in the White Case, in that the plaintiff there was a mere abutter, while, in the present case, the plaintiff's predecessor in title was the owner of the fee. There is doubtless a distinction between the two cases. The mere abutter has only an easement in the street; and, when he gives a consent for the construction and maintenance of the railroad, he releases or abandons so much of the easements as is interfered with or taken by the railroad. Where the abutter also owns the fee of the street in front of his land, the railroad takes from him an easement in the land in the street. But this distinction in circumstance leads to no difference in the effect to be attributed to the consents in the two cases. Both easements of the mere abutter and the fee of the street are alike within the constitutional protection, and neither can be acquired by a railroad company except by the procedure prescribed by the Constitution, unless the owner voluntarily seeks redress in a court of equity. The invasion of the easements of the abutter can be authorized only by grant or prescription for twenty years, and the easement in the fee of the street can be conferred only in the same manner. The same rule of construction should therefore apply to the instruments in both cases. The defendant, it is true, was, at the time of the execution of the instrument, merely a trespasser; but it was not in the situation of an ordinary trespasser. It had the power and authority to maintain its railroad provided it acquired by condemnation the necessary property rights. Of course, it did not intend to abandon its costly structure in the city streets. Neither the parties nor anyone else contemplated such a course of conduct. All understood that practically, though not in law, the abutters, whether owning the fee of the street or not, would obtain not the removal, of the structure, but compensation for their rights. What the plaintiff's predecessor intended to release was the right to compensation, not merely for any past entry, but for the acquisition of its property rights by the railroad company, which would otherwise be compelled to institute condemnation proceedings to ascertain the amount of that compensation. Assuming, but not conceding, that the instrument would be inoperative as a grant, certainly it was effective as an estoppel for any compensation that might be awarded in condemnation proceedings. The plaintiff can be entitled to no greater relief in this action in equity than he would have been had the defendant instituted proceedings to condemn the property.

The judgment should be modified by excluding from the operation of the injunction that portion of the defendant's railroad in front of the plaintiff's property, running 20 feet from the corner of South Portland avenue, and by reducing the award of damages from $1,400 to $1,000, with costs to the appellants in this court.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

EMILY H. HATHORN et al., Respts.,
v.
NATURAL CARBONIC GAS COMPANY,
Appt.

Water — mineral reservoir — waste — injunction.

1. A landowner who has tapped, by wells located on his land, a reservoir of mineral water extending under a large area, will be enjoined from drawing it by means of pumps or other apparatus for the purpose of securing for the market a supply of gas arising from the water, thereby wasting great quantities of the water, and destroying or impairing its flow from springs located on the lands of others, and destroying or impairing the valuable character of the water for purposes for which it had been habitually used.

Same — estoppel.

2. That one has marketed water naturally flowing from springs on his land does not deprive him of the right to equitable relief against the forcible pumping of the water from the common reservoir, and letting it go to waste, for the purpose of securing for sale a gas connected therewith.

Subterranean water — pumping — injunction.

3. A landowner cannot constitutionally be forbidden by the legislature from pumping water or gas arising therefrom from wells located on his property, which reach a common reservoir, absolutely or merely because he thereby interferes with the flow of water from his neighbor's well.

Same — waste.

4. A landowner may constitutionally be forbidden by the legislature to pump from wells located on his property mineral water from a common reservoir reached thereby, for the purpose of securing gas arising therefrom for sale, and to waste the water to the injury of the interests of the public and of the owners of springs on neighboring lands.

Statute — partial invalidity.

5. Provisions of a statute forbidding a landowner to pump mineral water and a gas arising therefrom from wells on his property, absolutely or to the injury of the owners of springs connected with the common reservoir, or so that the flow or quality of the water in any spring or well is diminished, which are unconstitutional, are so disconnected from a provision forbidding the collecting of the gas from the water for sale by pumping it in unnatural quantities and wasting it, to the injury of the public interests, or those of the owners of neighboring wells, that the latter provision can be upheld although the others fall.

Subterranean water — rock wells — discrimination.

6. A statute forbidding the pumping of mineral water and gas arising therefrom from a common reservoir is not invalid as contravening the constitutional provision guaranteeing equal protection of laws, be-

Case Note. — Constitutionality of statutes to prevent waste of subterranean water, natural gas, or oil.

One phase of the general question as to the constitutionality of legislation passed to promote the conservation of natural resources is touched upon in the note to Opinion of Justices, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 422. Another phase is presented by the opinion in HATHORN v. NATURAL CARBONIC GAS Co. and the present note. That opinion, in adopting the view that the landowner may constitutionally be forbidden by the legislature to pump, by means of wells located on his property, mineral water from a common reservoir, for the purpose of securing gas arising therefrom for sale, and the wasting of the water to the injury of the interests of the public and of the owners of springs on neighboring lands, has added much weight to the doctrine already maintained by a number of cases, that the public at large, as well as immediate adjoining landowners, have an interest which may be protected by statute, in those minerals and substances which, from their nature, gather in one subterranean reservoir, and the diminution or consumption of which, taken from any part, reduces correspondingly the common supply.

A case illustrative of this is State v. Ohio Oil Co. 160 Ind. 21, 47 L.R.A. 627, 49 N. E. 809, where it was held, following Townsend v. State, 147 Ind. 624, 37 L.R.A. 294, 62 Am. St. Rep. 477, 47 N. E. 19,—a case sufficiently set out in HATHORN v. NATURAL CARBONIC GAS Co.,—that a statute making it unlawful to permit the escape of natural gas into cause it is applied only to wells bored into rock, where the conditions are such that pumping in the rock wells is less needful than in those sunken in dirt, while it is much more exhaustive and destructive of common rights.

Statute — enforcement — mineral water.

7. The people may maintain a suit to restrain violation of a statute forbidding a wasteful pumping of water and a gas connected therewith from mineral wells, to the injury of the public interests.

Same — individual complainant.

8. Taxpayers who own springs connected with a common reservoir of mineral water have sufficient interest in the preservation of the public rights, apart from mere private relief which they may secure as individuals, to be entitled to maintain an action to enforce a statute forbidding the pumping of the water and gas for sale through well connected with such reservoir, to the injury of public interests, where the pumping results in a waste of an important and valuable natural product, imperils the value of a large amount of property, and interferes with a just and reasonable use by all members of the community of a common supply of the natural product, and tends to precipitate disputes and litigation.

Injunction — preliminary— conflicting evidence.

9. Although some of the facts stated in a complaint for an injunction are denied by affidavits presented on behalf of defendant, the court may, nevertheless, grant a preliminary injunction, if the questions of fact raised are purely for the consideration of the court.

the open air from a well for longer than two days after it is constructed is not unconstitutional. This case, after a second appeal, was affirmed pro forma on the authority of the above opinion, in Ohio Oil Co. v. State, 150 Ind. 698, 50 N. E. 1125, which was then taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it was affirmed in 177 U. S. 190, 44 L. ed. 729, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576,— a case also fully set out and reviewed in the HATHORN CASE.

In Com. v. Trent, 117 Ky. 34, 77 S. W. 390, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 209, in construing a statute which was passed to prevent the wasting of petroleum, natural gas, salt water, and to provide for the plugging of all abandoned wells, the court said: "The position that the defendants may do what they please with the gas after it is reduced to possession by them cannot be maintained; for, as the gas goes out of the gasometer, its place is taken by other gas coming from the well. Property is the creation of law. The use of property may be regulated by law. The legislature may protect from waste the natural resources of the state, which are the common heritage of all. The right of the owner of property to do with it as he pleases is subject to the limitation that he must have due regard for the rights of others. To allow the storehouse of nature to be exhausted by the waste of the gas would be to deprive the state and its citizens of the many advantages incident to its use; that the legislature may prevent this is well settled."

In Hague v. Wheeler, 157 Pa. 324, 22 L.R.A. 141, 37 Am. St. Rep. 736, 27 Atl. 714, it was said, obiter, that it is doubtless true that the public has a sufficient interest in the preservation of oil and gas from waste to justify legislation upon the subject.

For a case upholding the constitutionality of a statute forbidding the use of natural gas for illuminating purposes in what are known as "flambeau lights," see Townsend v. State, supra, sufficiently reviewed in the HATHORN CASE.

In Ex parte Elam, 6 Cal. App. 233, 91 Pac. 811, it was contended that an act passed for the prevention of the waste and flow of water from artesian wells, and prescribing penalties therefor, and also defining waste and artesian wells, was violative of the Constitution of the United States, and of those sections of the state Constitution which forbid the depriving of property without due process of law. It was held, however, that since the act related to waters the right to the use of which was common to a large portion of the community, and affected the general public right, and the right to legislate in regard to its use and conservation, referable to the police power of the state, the above constitutional provisions had no application. It was also contended that the statute was contrary to that part of the state Constitution forbidding the granting of special privileges or immunities, in that no provision was made as to waters pumped from subterranean sources. The court, in coming to the conclusion that this section of the Constitution was not violated, said: "As we have before attempted to show, no surface owner possesses the right to extract the subterranean water in excess of a reasonable and beneficial use upon the land from which it is extracted. Any additional extraction is not in the exercise of a right, if, by such exercise, the rights of others are injuriously affected. Nor can an appropriator take more water than he can beneficially use. Hence, it follows that no discrimination is made between parties entitled to the exercise of a common right. Under the act in question, all may exercise their full legal right with reference to this water. As to the right to use any portion of that which belongs to the public, legislative control is applicable; and if, as a matter of fact, public rights are abused by the improper extraction of this public water by means of pumps, it is presumable that the legislature, in the exercise of its proper functions, will, in due time, arrest such waste." It was finally contended that the statute APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, modifying and affirming an order of a Special Term for Saratoga County, restraining defendant from using pumps, etc., for the purpose of increasing the flow of certain subterranean percolating waters and gas from certain deep wells situated on defendant's land. Affirmed.

Statement by Hiscock, J.:

This is an appeal, by permission, on certified questions, from an order of the appellate division, third department, entered September 25, 1908, modifying, and, as modified, affirming, an order of the special term, granting a preliminary injunction against the appellant during the pendency of this action. The action was brought by the respondents as owners of lands in the town of Saratoga Springs, New York, whereon were springs wherefrom naturally flowed waters holding in solution natural mineral salts and an excess of carbonic acid gas, to restrain appellant from accelerating and increasing, by means of pumps and other apparatus, the flow of similar water and gas from their deep wells in said town, and whereby, as claimed, the flow from the springs of the respondents and others was destroyed or diminished. A preliminary injunction was granted by the special term, restraining appellant from performing the acts complained of, and this order, after a modification not substantially affecting its results, was affirmed by the appellate division.

The appellant demurred to the complaint, and, under these circumstances, the appellate division granted leave to appeal, and certified to us the following questions:

(1) Is chapter 429, p. 1221, Laws 1908, a constitutional enactment?

(2) Does the complaint state a cause of action under Stat. 1908, chap. 429, p. 1221?

(3) Does the complaint state a cause of action other than that under the statute hereinafter mentioned?

(4) Did the supreme court have power to grant the preliminary injunction?

The complaint, which is involved in these questions, contains but one count, and is claimed by its framers to set forth a cause was violative of that state constitutional provision forbidding the passing of local or special laws, and of the provision that all laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation; but since, as the court said, the distinction between wells having a natural flow and those not so constituted is natural, and reasonably indicates the necessity or propriety of legislation restricting the former class, and the constitutional provision as to uniformity is satisfied when the law operates uniformly upon all persons standing in the same category, the statute was also not violative of the above two constitutional provisions.

However, that the police power does not justify legislation prohibiting the waste of water from artesian wells, to the injury of the wells of neighboring proprietors, was held, in Huber v. Merkel, 117 Wis. 355, 62 L.R.A. 589, 98 Am. St. Rep. 933, 94 N. W. 354, a case sufficiently set out and reviewed in HATHORN v. NATURAL CARBONIC GAS CO. The court, in this case, after reviewing the Indiana cases (supra) said: "However sound this principle may be as applied to natural gas or oil, we have failed to find an authority in the books that holds that percolating waters in the ground are the common property of surface owners. On the other hand, the holdings are unanimous to the effect, either that such water is the absolute property of the landowner in whose land it happens to be, or that the right of the landowner to use or divert it while in his land is an absolute right." In noting this distinction between natural gas or oil and percolating waters, the court cited Manufacturers' Gas & Oil Co. v. Indiana Natural Gas & Oil Co. 155 Ind. 461, 50 L.R.A. 768, 57 N. E. 912, where, in holding in substance 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) that the natural right of landowners in natural gas is simply to use such portion as will, by natural laws of flowage, rise in their wells, and not to increase that flow by artificial means, to the detriment of the flow of others, it was said: "Natural gas is a fluid mineral substance, subterraneous in its origin and location, possessing in a restricted degree the properties of underground waters, and resembling water in some of its habits. Unlike water, it is not generally distributed, and, so far as now understood, it can be used for but few purposes; the most important being that of fuel. Its physical occurrence is in limited quantities only, within circumscribed areas of greater or less extent. If it could be dealt with as subterranean waters, there would be little difficulty in determining the rules by which the rights of landowners and other persons interested in it should be governed. But the difference between natural gas and underground waters, whether flowing in channels or percolating the earth, is so marked that the principles which the courts apply to questions relating to the latter are not adapted to the adjustment of the difficulties arising from conflicting interests in this new and peculiar fluid." This distinction between natural gas and subterranean waters, as set out in this last Indiana case, if well founded, said the court, in Huber v. Merkel, supra, deprives all the prior Indiana cases on the subject of the control of the use of natural gas of any significance as applied to the use of subterranean waters.

of action both at common law and under the statute referred to. The substance of the material allegations purporting to set forth a cause of action at common law is as follows: Aside from formal matters, they assert the ownership by plaintiffs of certain premises in the village of Saratoga Springs, on which, for about forty years, there has been a spring of mineral water, holding in solution natural mineral salts and an excess of carbonic acid possessing great medicinal virtue and of high value, and that during all this time, and until the commission by the defendant of the alleged wrongful acts complained of, said spring naturally and freely flowed to the surface in a continuous stream; that plaintiffs, during many years, have been engaged in bottling and marketing the products of said spring, incurring great expense therein, and deriving great profit therefrom; that said carbonic acid gas is, for various specified reasons, a necessary and valuable element in said waters; that, prior to the commencement of this action, the defendant, being the owner of a tract of land situate in said village nearly a mile distant from plaintiffs' premises, drilled thereon several deep wells into the rock beneath the surface of its lands, and by means of "powerful pumps, suctions, and other artificial contrivances" accelerated and increased the flow from said wells of mineral waters and carbonic acid gas similar to those produced at plaintiffs' spring, whereby they were enabled to, and did, draw and secure an unreasonable amount of water and gas; that in each case such waters and gas were drawn from a supply percolating through the rocks under the surface of the land, and that the waters and gas thus percolating under the respective tracts of the parties to this suit, as well as through a large additional area where other springs were located, were part of a single system, and constituted one common source of supply for all the wells and springs; that the effect of defendant's acts in accelerating and forcing the flow of water and gas from its wells by such artificial means has been to seriously affect and decrease the flow of water and gas at the springs of plaintiffs, and of other people throughout the town, and to depreciate the character and quality of the water produced thereat; that defendant has not utilized the water and gas thus drawn by it from its wells in connection with or in increasing the enjoyment of its land, or for any purpose connected therewith, but has extracted from the water the carbonic acid gas, which it has marketed generally throughout the country, turning the water containing the other minerals in great quantities to waste; that, by reason of these various acts, the plaintiffs have been greatly damaged.

In addition to these allegations there are various others, which, in connection with them, are claimed to set forth a cause of action under chapter 429, p. 1221, Laws 1908. This act is entitled, "An Act for the Protection of the Natural Mineral Springs of the State, and to Prevent Waste and Impairment of Its Natural Mineral Waters." It contains, in substance, the following prohibitions: (1) Against pumping or by any artificial contrivance whatsoever in any manner accelerating the natural flow, or producing an unnatural flow, of that class of mineral waters holding in solution natural mineral salts and an excess of carbonic acid gas from any well made by boring or drilling into the rock, or, by any artificial contrivance whatsoever, in any manner accelerating the natural flow, or producing an unnatural flow, of natural carbonic acid gas issuing from or contained in any well made by boring or drilling into the rock; (2) against performing the acts enumerated in the foregoing provision when the effect will be to diminish, retard, impair, etc., "the natural flow from any mineral spring or any mineral well belonging to any other person or corporation," or "the quality of its waters . . . or the quantity of its carbonic acid gas or mineral ingredients;" (3) against performing the acts enumerated in the first provision for the purpose of extracting, collecting, compressing, liquefying, or vending the carbonic acid gas as a commodity otherwise than in connection with the mineral water; (4) against "the doing of any act or thing whatsoever, whereby the natural flow from any spring or well" of the character described is diminished, retarded, etc.; said act further provides that any citizen of the state may maintain an action to restrain any person or corporation from committing any of the prohibited acts in any city or town in which said citizen is a taxpayer, etc. The substantial allegations, in addition to those already summarized, by which the plaintiffs seek to make out a cause of action under this statute, allege, in substance, their qualifications as taxpayers; a violation in terms by defendant of each of the prohibitions of the statute above quoted; that there is a special pressure of gas in the rock strata into which defendant's wells are bored, causing water and gas to flow to the surface, which is not exerted in the soil above the rocks, and that the withdrawal of gas from such strata tends to destroy the flow of the springs and impair the quality of the water; that, in consequence of the mineral springs of plaintiffs and other persons in said town, a large amount of money has been invested in Saratoga Springs, in the way of hotels and boarding houses, hospitals and sanitariums, for the accommodation of visitors seeking health from the use of said mineral waters, and employment has been given to a large number of people; that the people at large are interested in the maintenance and preservation of such springs; that, by the unlawful acts of the defendant, the flow of plaintiffs' spring and that of other springs throughout the town has been injuriously affected and the quality and value of the waters flowing therefrom impaired and a large amount of water wasted; that, by reason of these facts, many persons have been injured, and will continue to be injured unless said unlawful acts are stopped.

Mr. Alton B. Parker, with Messrs. Morris & Plante, for appellant:

The plaintiffs are not entitled to equitable relief because of the pumping for commercial purposes, as they have marketed the water flowing from their wells.

The plaintiffs have sufficient interest to maintain the action.

People v. Ballard, 134 N. Y. 269, 17 L.R.A. 737, 32 N. E. 54; Kansas v. Colorado and Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co. supra.

Hiscock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The object of this action is to restrain the appellant from using pumps and other apparatus for the purpose of accelerating and increasing the flow of subterranean percolating waters and gas through deep wells which it has sunk upon its premises in the town of Saratoga Springs. The respondents insist that their complaint, which has been summarized in the foregoing statement, sets forth a cause of action, both at common law and under the provisions of the statute entitled, "An Act for the Protection of the Natural Mineral Springs of the State, and to Prevent Waste and Impairment of Its Natural Mineral Waters," being chapter 429, p. 1221, Laws 1908. The appellant, on the other hand, by demurrer, challenges it as not setting forth a cause of action on either theory. I shall endeavor, first, to apply to the pleading thus attacked the test of common-law principles, and the question whether, measured by them, it does set forth a cause of action, may be stated in a more concrete form applicable to the specific facts involved in this action. Thus stated, it will be whether a landowner has the right, by the use of pumps and other apparatus, greatly to accelerate and increase the natural flow of subterranean percolating mineral waters and gas through deep wells, bored into a widely extended common supply of such substances, not for any purpose connected with the enjoyment of his lands, but for the purpose of procuring from the waters a supply of gas to be marketed throughout the country, and with the result of wasting great quantities of mineral waters, and of destroying or impairing the natural flow of such waters and gas in and through the springs of other landowners throughout a large area, and of destroying or impairing the valuable character of such waters for the purposes for which they have been habitually used.

The earlier decisions in this and other cases laid down the general rule that a landowner might not be enjoined from doing an act on his own premises which resulted in diverting or even wholly destroying the flow of percolating waters from or upon his neighbor's lands. Ellis v. Duncan, 21 Barb. 230; Pixley v. Clark, 35 N. Y. 520, 91 Am. Dec. 72; Delhi v. Youmans, 45 N. Y. 362, 6 Am. Rep. 100; Bloodgood v. Ayers, 108 N. Y. 400, 2 Am. St. Rep. 443, 15 N. E. 433; Hal-deman v. Bruckhart, 45 Pa. 514, 84 Am. Dec. 511; Greenleaf v. Francis, 18 Pick. 117; Frazier v. Brown, 12 Ohio St. 294. In thus holding, they but followed the rule laid down in the leading case of Acton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 324, wherein was approved the principle "which gives to the owner of the soil all that lies beneath his surface . . . that the person who owns the surface may dig thereon, and apply all that is there found to his own purposes, at his free will and pleasure; and that if, in the exercise of such right, he intercepts or drains off the water collected from underground springs in his neighbor's well, this inconvenience to his neighbor falls within the description of damnum absque injuria, which cannot become the ground of an action." It will hardly be profitable to consider all of the different reasons which led the courts to adopt these principles, but it is important to bear in mind that they were invariably applying them to cases in each of which the party complained of had interfered with the enjoyment by another of percolating waters by some act which was directly and naturally connected with the improvement or enjoyment of his own land. Thus, in the Acton Case, the act which resulted in the interference complained of consisted in mining operations on a man's own land. In the case of Ellis v. Duncan, the person intercepting the flow of percolating waters on his neighbor's land had done so by digging a trench or ditch and opening a quarry on his premises. No question was presented in these cases of a landowner depleting or exhausting a common supply of underground waters by artificial methods for purposes not in any way connected with the enjoyment or use of his own lands.

But, with the increased demands upon natural resources, such as water, this question did begin to arise. It seems to have been first suggested in England, in the case of Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. Cas. 349. There the question arose whether the flow of percolating waters on another's land might be diverted or destroyed by pumping for purposes of supplying a municipality with water; and, while it was finally held that this might be done, it was only after the right had been seriously questioned. In this state it was first discussed, though not actually involved, in Smith v. Brooklyn, 18 App. Div. 340, 46 N. Y. Supp. 141, and it was there stated by Judge Hatch that the right in this state had never "been upheld in the owner of land to destroy a stream, a spring, or well upon his neighbor's land, by cutting off the source of its supply, except it was done in the exercise of a legal right to improve the land, or make some use of the same in connection with the enjoyment of the land itself, for purposes of domestic use, agriculture, or mining, or by structures for business carried on upon the premises." Finally, in the case of Forbell v. New York, 164 N. Y. 522, 526, 51 L.R.A. 695, 79 Am. St. Rep. 666, 58 N. E. 644, the question reached this court, and the necessity was recognized, not for an alteration of the rules which had been applied by earlier cases to the facts then presented, but rather for an enlargement and extension of such rules, so that they would be applicable to new conditions. That case, for the first time in this state, at least, laid down the rule of the reasonable use of percolating waters, which I think is applicable to, and controlling of, the facts in this case. There the city of New York tapped waters percolating under some lands purchased by it, and which were part of a connected system or supply extending over a large area, and then, by powerful apparatus, so forced the flow of this water as to exhaust the supply which had formerly supplied plaintiff's land, and this was done for the purpose of furnishing a supply of water for the defendant. The court, reviewing many earlier cases passing upon the right of a landowner to enjoy the subsurface waters under his premises, said: "In the cases in which the lawfulness of interference with percolating waters has been upheld, either the reasonableness of the acts resulting in the interference, or the unreasonableness of imposing an unnecessary restriction upon the owner's dominion of his own land, has been recognized. In the absence of contract or enactment, whatever it is reasonable for the owner to do with his subsurface water, regard being had to the definite rights of others, he may do. He may make the most of it that he reasonably can. It is not unreasonable, so far as it is now apparent to us, that he should dig wells, and take therefrom all the water that he needs in order to the fullest enjoyment and usefulness of his land as land, either for purposes of pleasure, abode, productiveness of soil, trade, manufacture, or for whatever else the land as land may serve. He may consume it, but must not discharge it to the injury of others. But to fit it up with wells and pumps of such pervasive and potential reach, that, from their base, the defendant can tap the water stored in the plaintiff's land, and in all the region thereabout, and lead it to his own land, and, by merchandising it, prevent its return, is, however reasonable it may appear to the defendant and its customers, unreasonable as to the plaintiff and the others whose lands are thus clandestinely sapped and their value impaired." The principles thus adopted in the Forbell Case have been fairly upheld in the courts of other states. Gagnon v. French Lick Springs Hotel Co. 163 Ind. 687, 68 L.R.A. 175, 72 N. E. 849; Richmond Natural Gas Co. v. Enterprise Natural Gas Co. 31 Ind. App. 222, 66 N. E. 782; Willis v. Perry, 92 Iowa, 297, 26 L.R.A. 124, 60 N. W. 727; Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 116, 64 L.R.A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766.

The situation described by the complaint in this action is relatively of the same general character as that with which the court dealt in the case cited. One proprietor, by artificial and unusual methods, has so increased the flow of percolating waters and gas upon its lands that it is obtaining a greatly increased proportion of a common supply at the expense of its neighbors; and it is doing this in order to supply a public market for a portion of these products, while the others are wasted. The only important feature distinguishing the cases is the element of waste, present in this one and absent in the earlier one. If these facts, resting now merely on the allegations of a pleading, shall be established by evidence, the trial court will, in my opinion, be fully authorized to draw the conclusion that they disclose a case of unreasonable and improper conduct by the appellant in the premises, and make out in favor of respondents a sufficient cause for appeal to, and relief by, a court of equity. It has been 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) suggested that the Saratoga waters are of a peculiar character, and more in the nature of minerals than waters, and that therefore the use of them by the landowner should be governed by different rules than those which ordinarily apply to the use of subterranean waters. It may be answered to this suggestion that subterranean waters have always been treated as a mineral in the decisions relating to their use and enjoyment, and that no distinction in this case can be predicated upon the peculiar character and quantity of the salts and gases which happen to be in solution. Westmoreland & C. Natural Gas Co. v. De Witt, 130 Pa. 235, 249, 5 L.R.A. 731, 18 Atl. 724; People's Gas Co. v. Tyner, 131 Ind. 277, 280, 16 L.R.A. 443, 31 Am. St. Rep. 433, 31 N. E. 59.

The case of Huber v. Merkel, 117 Wis. 355, 62 L.R.A. 589, 98 Am. St. Rep. 933, 94 N. W. 354, has been pressed on our attention by the appellant, both as sustaining its right at common law to draw water and gas as it has been doing, and also as denying the right of the legislature to pass the statute next to be considered. In that case the court was construing the constitutionality of a law providing, in substance, that any owner or operator of an artesian well, who permitted it to discharge more water than was reasonably necessary for his use, thereby materially diminishing the flow of water in any other artesian well in the same vicinity, should be liable for damages. In the course of its consideration of this law it was stated: "So it seems inevitable that, in this state, at least, the right of a landowner to sink wells, and gather and use percolating waters as he will . . . is a property right, which cannot be taken away from him or impaired by legislation, unless by way of the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or by the police power;" and it was then held that the statute was not a proper exercise of police power, and was unconstitutional. It is to be said of this case, as greatly distinguishing it from the present one, that it was dealing with the natural flow of percolating waters, and not with a flow unnaturally forced by artificial means. If, however, some of the broad statements made in the opinion should be deemed pertinent to such facts as are disclosed here, and to sustain the right of a proprietor to use at will subterranean waters under the circumstances disclosed in this case, it must be said, as was intimated in the Wisconsin case itself, that the courts of this state and of that one disagree on this subject.

It also is especially urged that respondents have been forcing the flow of water through their springs, and marketing the same, and that therefore, under the doctrine of Merrick Water Co. v. Brooklyn, 32 App. Div. 454, 53 N. Y. Supp. 10, affirmed, 160 N. Y. 657, 55 N. E. 1097, relief should be denied to them. It is a sufficient answer to the first branch of this contention to say that we are now measuring respondents' rights by the allegations of their complaint, and that such allegations are to the effect that, before the acts complained of, they were enjoying a natural flow of waters through their springs to the surface of the ground, and that it is this which has been interfered with. So far as the second branch is concerned, if they were seeking to restrain the mere marketing of the products of appellant's well, it might be a sufficient answer to say that they were doing the same thing; but I fail to see how the sale of waters naturally flowing in their springs fairly or equitably forbids them from restraining appellant from continuing, by artificial means, the increased and wasteful flow of waters and gas, which is the thing complained of. In conclusion on this branch of the case it may be added that we have not been concerned with the inquiry whether the pleader originally intended to set forth a cause of action at common law, or whether, if he did, he has burdened his statement thereof with many superfluous and inapplicable allegations. The sole question presented to us is whether, between the beginning and end of the complaint, there may be found those allegations which, taken together, make out a case for relief under common-law principles; and that question, as already indicated, should, in my opinion, be answered in the affirmative.

We are next led to a consideration of the question whether respondents' complaint sets forth a cause of action under the statute which has been referred to. Independent of the query whether the respondents as taxpayers have an interest which, even under the authorization of the statute, will enable them to maintain this action, and which will be considered by itself, this question also largely resolves itself into a second one, and that is whether the statute is constitutional. If it be so, aside from the special question suggested, it is not, as I understand it, seriously contended that the complaint does not state a cause of action. In brief, and in addition to various facts already commented on, it alleges the situation of respondents as persons authorized by the statute to bring the action; the violation of each and all of the prohibitions of the statute; resulting waste of great quantities of mineral waters, and impairment, both of the quantity and quality, of the supply of water formerly flowing in the wells of respondents and other persons throughout the Saratoga area; and substantial and extensive injury, present and future, to property owners in that community and to the public. The underlying contention of the appellant with respect to this branch of the case is that the prohibitions of the statute are unconstitutional; first, because they unlawfully deprive it and others of the use and enjoyment of their property; and, second, because, being applicable only to wells driven into the rock, they create unlawful distinctions, and disregard that equality of rights which should prevail amongst citizens and property owners. I shall consider these objections in the order stated.

As already stated, these prohibitions are four in number, and in effect they, respectively, forbid accelerating or increasing the flow of percolating waters or natural carbonic acid gas, such as are found at Saratoga Springs, from wells bored into the rock, by pumping or any artificial contrivances whatsoever, first, absolutely and without qualifications; second, when the result of so doing will be to impair the natural flow or the quality of such waters or gas in the spring or well of another person; third, when the object of so doing is to extract and collect the carbonic acid gas for the purpose of marketing the same; and, fourth, prohibit the doing of any act whereby the flow or quality of the waters described, or of the carbonic acid gas or other mineral ingredients therein, in any spring or well, is diminished, etc. It was substantially admitted by the respondents that the last prohibition was so broad and unqualified as to be unconstitutional and inoperative, and that, therefore, may be eliminated from our consideration. The constitutionality of the other provisions must substantially be tested by reference to the rights of a landowner in underlying percolating waters, independent of this statute. Those rights have already been discussed; and, if proper conclusions have been reached, we have it that such a landowner may, by pumps or otherwise, draw on the waters percolating under the surface of his lands for a purpose naturally and legitimately connected with the improvement and enjoyment of his lands, even though it interferes with others; but that an unreasonable attempt to force and increase the flow of such waters, for the purpose of diverting them to some use entirely disconnected with such improvement and enjoyment, and whereby the flow of such waters under the lands of others is destroyed or diminished, may be restrained as unlawful. When these rules are applied, it seems to me that the first two prohibitions of the statute must be condemned and the third one upheld. The former not only prohibit pumping waters and gas described where the result will be to interfere with the spring of another person, but forbid such acts absolutely, even though they interfere with nobody. Their application is not limited to waste or commercial uses, but, under them, as they are plainly and explicitly written, a landowner in any part of the state is prohibited from extracting, by means of the simplest and most modest contrivance, waters from a well bored on his premises for the most legitimate and natural purpose connected with the use of his premises, provided the well happens to strike rock, and provided the water contains mineral salts and carbonic acid gas; and this whether such act interferes or not, in an infinitesimal degree, with the supply of some other person. It seems to me that this is such a clearly unlawful interference with well-established property rights already discussed that amplification of the idea is unnecessary.

Of course, the principle is not overlooked that the presumption is in favor of the legislative act, although it must be admitted that this presumption is somewhat weakened at this point by the common concession that at least one unconstitutional prohibition has been incorporated into this statute. Nevertheless, applying this presumption to these provisions, and utilizing every reasonable rule of construction in furtherance of the presumption, I am unable to reach a conclusion favorable to them. It will not do to say that they simply contemplate, and have reference to, the particular conditions prevailing at Saratoga Springs, and do not mean what they seem to, for the statute is general, and applies throughout the state. But, even if we accept this view of legislative intent, there must be a limit to those processes of interpretation by which definite expressions may be squared with assumed purposes, and, in my judgment, this limit must be transgressed if we uphold what has been written here. We are bound to consider what may be, as well as what is presently being, effected under a statute. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289. The present one, at best, and under a reasonable construction, may at times accomplish unexpected results, and it does not seem best at the outset to attempt to cure plain defects in it by amendments which are more properly a subject for legislative enactment than for creation by judicial interpretation.

The principles which lead to the condemnation of the two provisions just discussed lead to the approval of the third provision as constitutional and proper. As we have seen, the landowner has no vested right unnaturally and unreasonably to force the flow of percolating waters for the purpose of marketing them, or for any purpose not connected with the use or enjoyment of his land.

This being so, it was entirely proper for the legislature to adopt the provision in question, defining and regulating the rights of persons desiring to use mineral waters like those at Saratoga Springs, and calculated to prevent such use thereof as would either result in waste of the natural resources of the land, to the injury of general and public interests, or in the unreasonable impairment of the rights of others entitled to draw from a common source. The allegations of the complaint establish that both of these injurious results have flowed from the use which appellant is making of its wells. But, of course, the right of the legislature to adopt such a provision as is now being questioned was not limited to a case of present demonstrated injuries from the acts prohibited. It had the power of discretionary and anticipatory legislation extending over a broad field, and the right, within its limits, to regulate such conduct of its citizens as, being inherently of a more or less indeterminate character, might still result in injury to the public. With the light thrown by the allegations of the complaint on the matter to which this provision relates, I should have no doubt that the latter was within the powers of the legislature, even if it were a new step in the realm of police or regulative legislation. But it is not of a new order, and, for the purpose of maintaining this proposition, I shall not discuss a great variety of legislative enactments held valid, which, by analogy, seem to sustain this one, but shall come immediately to authorities which directly sustain the present exercise of legislative power. In Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. (page 829), it is said: "The police power of a state, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others." This doctrine was quoted with approval in People ex rel. New York Electric Lines Co. v. Squire, 107 N. Y. 593, 605, 1 Am. St. Rep. 893, 14 N. E. 820. In Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 85, it is said: "Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations, established by law, as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient." In Townsend v. State, 147 Ind. 624, 37 L.R.A. 294, 62 Am. St. Rep. 477, 47 N. E. 19, there was subject to consideration a statute forbidding "the use of natural gas for illuminating purposes in what are known as 'flambeau lights,' as a wasteful and extravagant use thereof and dangerous to the public good. The constitutionality of the statute was upheld, and it was said: "While our republican government guarantees the right to pursue one's own happiness, yet that government is charged with the duty of protecting others than appellant in the pursuit of their happiness, and hence the inalienable right to pursue one's own happiness must necessarily be subject to the same right in all others. Hence, when that right is asserted in such a manner as to conflict with the equal right to the same thing in others, it is not an inalienable right, nor a right at all, but is a wrong." In Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 209, 44 L. ed. 729, 739, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576, it was held that a statute making it unlawful for any person owning or controlling a gas or oil well to permit the flow of gas or oil from such well, except under certain restrictions tending to prevent waste and depletion of the general supply, was constitutional. Many things were said by Justice White in the discussion of that case which are applicable to the present one, but I shall only quote a single paragraph. After reviewing the many cases, he says: "On the other hand, as to gas and oil, the surface proprietors within the gas field all have the right to reduce to possession the gas and oil beneath. They could not be absolutely deprived of this right, which belongs to them, without a taking of private property. But there is a coequal right in them all to take from a common source of supply the two substances which, in the nature of things, are united, though separate. It follows from the essence of their right, and from the situation of the things as to which it can be exerted, that the use by one of his power to seek to convert a part of the common fund to actual possession may result in an undue proportion being attributed to one of the possessors of the right, to the detriment of the others, or by waste by one or more, to the annihilation of the rights of the remainder. Hence it is that the legislative power, from the peculiar nature of the right and the objects upon which it is to be exerted, can be manifested for the purpose of protecting all the collective owners, by securing a just distribution, to arise from the enjoyment by them of their privilege to reduce to possession, and to reach the like end by preventing waste." Each of the provisions which have been discussed is so complete and independent of the others that there is no difficulty in upholding the statute in respect to one, although we condemn the others.

The second constitutional objection to the statute is that it violates the provision of the Federal Constitution prohibiting any state from denying "to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." This contention is based on the fact that the provisions of the statute affect only wells bored or drilled into the rocks. It is not, and of course cannot be, urged that these provisions do not affect equally all wells of a certain general description. The statute simply makes a classification of wells, and it is conceded that this may be done if such classification is based on some sufficient reason, and not on mere caprice or arbitrary election. The rule on this subject, cited with approval by appellant itself, is laid down in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 155, 41 L. ed. 666, 668, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255. Justice Brewer there says: "But it is said that it is not within the scope of the 14th Amendment to withhold from states the power of classification, and that, if the law deals alike with all of a certain class, it is not obnoxious to the charge of a denial of equal protection. While as a general proposition, this is undeniably true . . . yet it is equally true that such classification cannot be made arbitrarily. . . . These [citing certain illustrations] are distinctions which do not furnish any proper basis for the attempted classification. That must always rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily and without any such basis." Under the admitted allegations of the complaint, it seems to me clear that a proper basis existed for the classification made by the legislature with respect to wells sunk in the rocks, and prohibiting the pumping and forcing of water and gas to the surface through such wells. In the fifteenth and sixteenth paragraphs of the complaint are allegations that the excess of carbonic acid gas existing in and filling the cavities of the rocks underlying Saratoga Springs, by reason of its confinement therein, exerts a great pressure, which tends to expel the waters and gas from the cavities of said rocks, and cause them naturally to flow to the surface; and that, when the gas escapes from the rocks into the superincumbent soil, its power to exert such pressure is gone, and it ceases to possess any efficiency as an agent to effect the flow of said mineral water; that the mineral springs in said town are dependent for their existence upon the pressure of carbonic acid gas confined in said rocks, and the withdrawal of the gas from the latter tends to destroy the force which brings the water into the natural springs, and to destroy the conditions upon which the existence of said springs depend. It thus appears that the conditions prevailing in the wells bored into the rocks are very different from those prevailing in wells sunk into the dirt; that there is less need for pumping in the former than in the latter, and, conversely, that pumping in the former will be much more exhaustive and destructive of common rights than if applied to the shallower wells. The legislature was entitled to anticipate that the same conditions which apply to Saratoga Springs might be applicable to other wells tapping precisely similar springs in other parts of the state, and, within the broad discretion conferred upon it to prevent, not only existing, but anticipated, evils, it clearly was justified in making the distinction between different wells which it did make and the classification complained of. It may be suggested that it would have been legal and much safer to pass a special act dealing with known conditions at Saratoga Springs rather than a general act which may include unexpected situations elsewhere in the state. This was a question of policy, to be settled by the legislature, which may still prevent or cure any undesirable results by appropriate amendment of the present law.

I come next to that contention of the appellant which lies rather outside of the act itself, and which is, that the respondents as taxpayers have no such interest or standing as entitles them to maintain an action under it. They concededly are of the description of persons expressly authorized by the statute to maintain such an action, and I do not understand it to be questioned but that, if the people themselves might maintain this action, they may authorize any person such as the respondents to maintain it in their place and stead. Therefore the question becomes whether the people have a sufficient interest in these matters, so that they might maintain an action to enforce observance of the statute which the legislature, representing them, has passed. It seems to me that their right so to do must be affirmed on two grounds. In the first place, I understand it to have been held, in People v. Ballard, 134 N. Y. 269, 291, 17 L.R.A. 737, 32 N. E. 54, that the legislature by express provision may effectively authorize the people, or a person in their stead, to maintain an action like this, in the absence of some restriction in the Constitution, even though the action should be deemed to relate to private interests. That action was brought by the attorney general in the name of the people, against a domestic business corporation and its trustees, to remove the latter from their position for misconduct, and compel them to account for and pay over to the corporation the value of the property belonging to it, by them unlawfully transferred. One of the questions involved and discussed was whether the attorney general was authorized to bring the action in the name of the people, in his discretion, and this question involved a construction of certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the purpose of determining whether they did expressly authorize such action. Judge Vann, writing the majority opinion, concluded "that the legislature intended to authorize the attorney general to bring such an action . . . [as has been described] whenever he was convinced not only that it could be maintained, but also that the interests of the public would be promoted thereby;" and that this question of what the public interests required was committed to the absolute discretion of the attorney general. Judge Landon, writing for the minority, queried: "Is it reasonable to suppose that the legislature, by the statutes in question, intended to authorize such governmental intervention?" and said: "I concede that it is within the legislative power, in the absence of constitutional restriction, to provide for governmental intervention in private affairs." Page 299 of 134 N. Y. It was held that the statute under review conferred upon the attorney general the absolute power, whenever he deemed it wise, to commence an action in the name of the people, although relating to the administration of the private business of a corporation; and that, this being so, the action was well brought. But, in the second place, if we should assume that an action may be brought by the people, or by some person authorized to act for it, only where it appears, as stated by Judge Landon, "that the public interests are thereby to be protected, or in some substantial way promoted, apart from the mere private relief to be awarded to individuals" (page 302 of 134 N. Y.), I think that the requirements of such rule would have been satisfied by the respondents under the admitted facts now before us.

Let us recall very briefly some of the things liable to result from the acts prohibited by the statute in question, as illustrated by experience at Saratoga Springs. The pumping of waters and gas for the purpose of extracting and vending the latter has resulted in the waste of great quantities of waters, and of all the minerals held in solution therein, except some or all of the gas. Thus, it has not only resulted in a waste of an important and valuable natural product, but, because of the connected sources of supply underlying a large area, the rights of other persons than the violators desiring to draw from this common source have been unreasonably and unjustly destroyed or diminished, and the value of a large amount of property imperiled. I have already endeavored to point out that this situation was one of sufficient public interest so that the legislature might deal with it, as it has done, by statute. It seems almost necessarily to follow that this protection of public interests would so continue as to permit the people to enforce obedience to its statutes after the same have been passed. But, as an independent proposition, as was pertinently asked by Judge Vann in the Ballard Case, supra, "While the people have no pecuniary interest . . . have they no interests that need protection?" Page 292 of 134 N. Y. Only one answer, in my judgment, can be made to this question when it is asked, and that is that they have a substantial interest in the enforcement of the statute, furnishing an all-sufficient basis for the maintenance of this action. They have an interest in the preservation of natural products like these mineral waters, and it fairly may be said that they have a substantial and enforceable interest in preserving the just and reasonable use, by all the members of a community, of a common supply of a natural product, and in so curtailing the attempts of one or a few to get an unjust proportion thereof that the rights of other members of the community will not be interfered with, and that disputes and litigation shall not be precipitated, and that large amounts of property shall not be endangered.

These principles do not seem to be novel, but, on the other hand, to be sustained by ample authority. The case of Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 44 L. ed. 729, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576, has been referred to in other connections. It may be well here to call attention to the fact that the action was brought in behalf of the state by the attorney general, without any relator, to enforce a statute intended to prevent the waste of gas or oil. What was said, however, would amply sustain the right of the state, if questioned, to maintain an action both preventing waste and securing just distribution to collective owners of such mineral waters. Apparently no one doubted the authority of the state to maintain the action, for no such question seems to have been presented. In Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter, 209 U. S. 349, 52 L. ed. 828, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529, an action was brought by the attorney general of New Jersey to enforce a statute prohibiting the transportation of water into any other state. Again, the right of the state to maintain such an action does not seem to have been questioned by anyone, but to have been fully affirmed, when it was said: "It sometimes is difficult to fix boundary stones between the private right of property and the police power when, as in the case at bar, we know of few decisions that are very much in point. But it is recognized that the state, as quasi sovereign and representative of the interests of the public, has a standing in court to protect the atmosphere, the water, and the forests within its territory, irrespective of the assent or dissent of the private owners of the land most immediately concerned." Page 355 of 209 U. S. If these views are correct, a cause of action has been alleged under the statute.

Some argument has been made that causes of action have been improperly joined in the single count of the complaint before us. No such question is presented to us for consideration, or involved in the questions which are presented.

The fourth and final question which has been certified to us relates to the power of the supreme court to grant the preliminary injunction which issued herein. This order was granted on the pleadings, including the verified complaint, and numerous affidavits. While some of the affidavits presented in behalf of the appellant doubtless denied, and therefore raised an issue of fact with, some of the allegations of the complaint, such questions of fact were purely for the consideration of the court granting the injunction. Resolving them in favor of the respondents, as it was entitled to do, and manifestly did do, the court was fully authorized on the facts, and within the principles which we have approved, to grant the injunction in question.

These views lead to an affirmance of the order appealed from, with costs, and lead us to answer the second, third, and fourth questions which have been certified to us in the affirmative, and the first one in the affirmative to the extent hereinbefore indicated.

Haight, J., dissenting:

The facts and history of this case are correctly stated in the opinion of Hiscock, J. This action was brought to restrain the defendant from pumping water from the wells upon its premises, and extracting therefrom the carbonic acid gas which is contained in such waters. At common law the owner of land is entitled to all of the solids that lie beneath the surface, and all of the liquids, other than surface streams, including gas, that percolate or flow through the soil or rocks, that he is able to reduce to possession, and to use the same for his own purposes, at his free will and pleasure; and if, in boring a well thereon, he intercepts an underground spring that destroys his neighbor's well, no cause of action arises on the part of his neighbor. Atton v. Blundell, 12 Mees. & W. 324, 351; Chasemore v. Richards, 7 H. L. Cas. 349; Ellis v. Duncan, 21 Barb. 230, affirmed, 26 How. Pr. 601; Pixley v. Clark, 35 N. Y. 520, 91 Am. Dec. 72; *Dellhi v. Rep. 576; Angell, Water Courses, §§ 109-114.

It will be observed from the cases cited that the foregoing rule obtains, not only with reference to water which is used for enriching the soil and for domestic purposes, but also to mineral waters, saline, alkaline, and sulphuric, including petroleum oil and gas which percolates or flows through the earth beneath the surface, with but a single exception. In the case of Forbell v. New York, 164 N. Y. 522, 51 L.R.A. 695, 79 Am. St. Rep. 666, 58 N. E. 644, the city of Brooklyn, before it became consolidated with the greater city of New York, had acquired 2 acres of land in the county of Queens, upon which it had constructed a station, in which was sunk a number of wells through which, by means of powerful suction pumps, it had drawn the waters in the earth, not only from its own land, but from a large territory surrounding it, and, by means of conduits, conveyed the water to the city of Brooklyn, where it was sold and distributed to the inhabitants thereof for domestic purposes. In that case it was found as a fact that the effect of the powerful suction pumps was to so lower the underground water table in the lands surrounding that owned by the defendant as to render such lands unfit for cultivation and the growing of crops, thus resulting in great damage to the owners of such lands. This court held, and I think properly, that the facts of that case were so exceptional that they presented a situation not contemplated by the common law or the prior cases recognizing the rights of the landowner to make such use of the water under the soil of the land as he saw fit, and that consequently the owner was entitled to damages; but, in so holding, the court was careful to limit the exception to the peculiar facts of that case, and to reaffirm the common-law rule as to other cases, in order that the owner may have "the fullest enjoyment and usefulness of his land as land, either for purposes of pleasure, abode, productiveness of soil, trade, manufacture, or for whatever else the land as land may serve." Page 526 of 164 N. Y.

Water, as it descends from the clouds, is nearly pure and consists of hydrogen and oxygen. It replenishes the earth, causes vegetation to grow, and becomes an essential part of animal life. It is evaporated by heat or the rays of the sun, becomes a part of the air we breathe, and when condensed it falls upon the earth, enriching the soil, and producing springs, brooks, creeks, and rivers that flow upon the surface. Pure water is colorless, odorless, tasteless, and a transparent liquid. These waters are distinguishable from those which are ordinarily known as "mineral waters," which are impregnated with foreign ingredients, such as gas, sulphur, iron, and salt, which give them a peculiar flavor. The mineral waters that are produced by the springs of Saratoga are impregnated with carbonic acid gas, and hold in solution salts which render them practically useless for domestic purposes, but which possess medical properties beneficial to health when taken in limited quantities. It therefore does not appear to me that the rule adopted in the Forbell Case has any application to that presented by the complaint in this action. The fundamental difference is that, in the former case, the land was dried up by reason of the suction of the water from it, and thus rendered incapable of producing vegetation, to the damage of the owner, while, in this action, the pumping of the water from the seams in the rock does not impair the usefulness of the soil for vegetation, but only tends to deprive the springs and wells upon the premises of the other owners of the gas necessary to make them flow. It is the gas, not the water, that is the bone of contention. It, like natural gas and petroleum oil, has become of great commercial value, and its production a prominent industry. If the rule in the Forbell Case does apply to the facts presented in this case, and a person can be restrained from abstracting the gas from the waters which he pumps from his own premises, it would seem to follow that an owner might be enjoined from pumping salt water from his premises for the purpose of extracting the salt, or the pumping of wells for the purpose of extracting petroleum or gas. None of these products are beneficial to the soil, for they are destructive of vegetation, and their only value consists in their being separated from the soil, conveyed away, and marketed for other purposes. To hold that any citizen may so restrain the owner of lands may result in the destruction of many of our great manufacturing establishments, and operate to paralyze some of the most important industries of the country. I think that the rule which prevails with reference to salt water, petroleum, oil, and gas cannot be distinguished in principle from that which should control with reference to the mineral waters of Saratoga Springs. To my mind, the rule which obtains with reference to those commodities is settled by the authorities.

In the case of Hague v. Wheeler, 157 Pa. 324, 22 L.R.A. 141, 37 Am. St. Rep. 736, 27 Atl. 714, the defendant had bored a well upon his premises for the purpose of obtaining gas, but had failed in obtaining it in sufficient quantities to obtain a purchaser thereof for commercial use. The plaintiffs, who were operating gas wells upon adjoining premises, entered upon the defendant's lands and shut in the gas by closing the well. The defendant threatened to remove the cap and permit the gas to escape, and thereupon the plaintiffs brought an action to obtain an injunction to prevent him from so doing. At that time there was no statute in Pennsylvania regulating the use that should be made of gas. The court held that, in the absence of such a statute, an injunction would not issue; that the owner could make such use of the gas that flowed from his well as suited his pleasure; and, if he permitted it to waste, the plaintiff had no cause for complaint. Mr. Justice Williams, in delivering the opinion of the court, further says: "The owner of the surface is an owner downward to the center until the underlying strata have been severed from the surface by sale. What is found within the boundaries of his tract belongs to him according to its nature. The air and the water he may use. The coal and iron or other solid mineral he may mine and carry away. The oil and gas he may bring to the surface and sell in like manner to be carried away and consumed. His dominion is, upon general principles, as absolute over the fluid as the solid minerals. It is exercised in the same manner and with the same results. He cannot estimate the quantity in place of gas or oil as he might of the solid minerals. He cannot prevent its movement away from him towards an outlet on some other person's land, which may be more or less rapid, depending on the dip of the rock, or the coarseness of the sand composing it; but, so long as he can reach it and bring it to the surface, it is his absolutely, to sell, to use, to give away, or to squander, as in the case of his other property. In the disposition he may make of it he is subject to two limitations: He must not disregard his obligations to the public; he must not disregard his neighbor's rights. If he uses his product in such a manner as to violate any rule of public policy, or any positive provision of the written law, he brings himself within the reach of the courts. If the use he makes of his own, or its waste, is injurious to the property or the health of others, such use or waste may be restrained, or damages recovered therefor; but, subject to these limitations, his power as an owner is absolute until the legislature shall, in the interest of the public as consumers, restrict and regulate it by statute."

In the case of Ohio Oil Co. v. Indiana, 177 U. S. 190, 44 L. ed. 729, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 576, the state of Indiana, through its attorney general, had filed a complaint against the Ohio Oil Company, charging it with the violation of a statute of the state which required the confining of natural gas within the pipes of the company, and the prevention of its waste. The oil company claimed that the act was violative of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Justice White, in delivering the opinion of the court, states the general rule quoted from the case of Brown v. Spilman, 155 U. S. 665, 669, 670, 39 L. ed. 304-306, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 245, 247, to the effect that "petroleum, gas, and oil are substances of a peculiar character, and decisions in ordinary cases of mining for coal and other minerals which have a fixed situs cannot be applied to contracts concerning them without some qualifications. They belong to the owner of the land, and are a part of it, so long as they are on it, or in it, or subject to his control; but when they escape and go into other land, or come under another's control, the title of the former owner is gone. If an adjoining owner drills his own land and taps a deposit of oil or gas, extending under his neighbor's field, so that it comes into his well, it becomes his property." He also quotes the rule from the case of Hague v. Wheeler, to which I have referred above, and numerous other cases, and reaches the conclusion that water, petroleum, and gas flowing in subterranean currents are not the subject of property until they are reduced to possession; and then proceeds: "As to gas and and city treasurer, to enjoin the enforcement, as against the plaintiffs, of a certain ordinance passed by the council of said city on March 20, 1905, entitled: "An Ordinance to License and Regulate the Use of the Streets of the City of Columbus, State of Ohio, by Persons Who Use Vehicles Thereon, and to Repeal Certain Ordinances Therein Named." In their petition they aver that they are "farmers and gardeners owning lands and residing in Franklin county, Ohio, outside the limits of the city of Columbus, and that they are also citizens and electors of Franklin county, Ohio, and bring this action on their own behalf and on behalf of all others similarly situated." They further aver that each of them is the owner of real estate and chattel property in said county outside of said city, "on which they pay all taxes, and that they have paid road assessments for free turnpikes in said county, and that they pay in labor and cash, annually, all road taxes and assessments provided by law; that each of them owns a two-horse farm wagon drawn by two horses, which are occasionally driven into said city for the purpose of delivering farm products of their own raising, and for the purpose of transporting merchandise to their homes which they have purchased in said city for their family use; and that each of them owns a buggy drawn by one horse, and that it is necessary for plaintiffs to use their said vehicles occasionally on said streets, and it is also necessary for them occasionally to use their vehicles on said streets in passing under an ordinance declaring that no wagon, dray, or other wheel carriage shall be kept or employed in the city for hire, directly or indirectly, unless the owner or keeper thereof obtain a license therefor, such city could not impose a license tax upon the vehicles of a coal company located in another city, but which had come to the first-named city for the sole purpose of unloading a consignment of coal and delivering it to a party outside the city limits. The court said that to levy such a tax on vehicles of nonresidents whose business or pleasure casually carries them into or through the city would be in derogation of their reserved right to use the highways of the commonwealth, and impose intolerable conditions upon the public, and lead to absurd results.

In Dooley v. Bristol, 102 Va. 232, 46 S. E. 296, an ordinance of a city providing for a license for vehicles carrying freight over the city streets, and providing by another section that any person carrying on a business or profession for which a license is required, without obtaining it, should be fined, was held not applicable to merchants doing business in another state, but delivering merchandise by the use of their own team and vehicle to their customers and to the railway stations located in such city. The court said: "Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the city of Bristol is authorized by its charter to impose a license tax upon persons hauling freight or passengers over its streets, and that § 78 of its ordinance does impose such tax, no penalty is provided for its violation unless the person charged with such violation is engaged in some business, occupation, or profession for the conduct of which a license is required by the defendant in error. The plaintiffs in error, not being engaged in any business or occupation for the conduct of which the defendant in error has imposed upon them a license tax, do not come within the provisions of § 80; and, as that is the only section authorizing a fine to be imposed upon persons using the streets of the defendant city in violation of the provisions of § 78, the judgment complained of was unauthorized, and 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) should have been set aside by the corporation court, and the warrant dismissed."

A case closely related to the above, although, perhaps, not strictly in point in this note, is Plymouth v. Cooper, 135 N. C. 1, 47 S. E. 129, where an ordinance requiring a license of liverymen, and providing that it should include any persons making a contract for hire in town, or to "carry any person with a vehicle out of the town for hire," was held void and not enforceable against a liveryman of another town, who, under contract, went to the licensing city for the purpose of meeting a person and conveying him to another city. The court said: "It is found that the defendant is a resident of the village of Roper, North Carolina, where he is carrying on the livery business, having paid both the state and county tax. There is no allegation that he is carrying on the livery business at Plymouth, or that he is in the habit of taking people out of Plymouth. As far as we can see, this is his first passenger, and he was carrying him under a contract made at Roper, or at Elizabeth City; certainly while neither of the parties were at Plymouth. It seems there is no harm in taking people into Plymouth in a vehicle, provided you put them out and leave them there. People may pay a man to bring them into town, but must walk home unless they conclude to make the town their permanent residence, or can get some local inhabitant to take them away. This may sound like a reductio ad absurdum, but it is a plain statement of the possible operation of the ordinance if sustained and carried to its legitimate result. Suppose a man living in Roper were compelled to visit Plymouth for an hour or two on some business. He could hire the defendant to carry him into the town, but he could not return by the same vehicle. Again, a man might hire a conveyance to take him from Roper to some place beyond Plymouth. If Plymouth lay directly in the way, he would have to go out of his way to drive around the town, or get out and hire a Plymouth man to take him the rest of the way. Surely, the legislature never intended any such result, nor should the courts place such a con-through the city, and to convey their children to the public schools and university;" further, "that it is necessary for them to come to the city of Columbus semiannually for the purpose of paying their taxes, also for rendering jury services if their names be drawn from the jury wheel, or to market the products of their farms and gardens; and that the nearest, best, and only convenient market for the sale of the products of their farms, or for them to buy merchandise for their family use, is in the city of Columbus, and that it is necessary for them, in paying their taxes, or rendering jury services, or in passing through said city, or in attending said schools . . . or in purchasing and securing supplies for their own sustenance, to bring their vehicles within the corporate limits of said city of Columbus, and to use their vehicles on said streets."

The petition sets out the provisions of said ordinance, § 2 of which provides that "no vehicle shall be used upon the streets of said city of Columbus, Ohio, unless a license to use such vehicle upon the streets has been obtained in accordance with the provisions of this ordinance by the owner, user, or person having the control of said vehicle." Section 3 provides "that any person who shall use, or, being the owner or controller thereof, shall permit to be used, any vehicle upon the streets of the said city of Columbus, Ohio, contrary to the provisions of this ordinance, shall be guilty of an offense, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished in the manner hereinafter provided." Section 4 provides the steps to be taken to obtain a license to use the streets, and the certificate to be issued in pursuance of the payment of the license fee, and further provides that "each applicant for a license shall, before he is entitled to receive the same, pay to the city treasurer the proper annual license fee, or the proportion thereof, as hereinafter provided." The fifth (5) section fixes the annual license fee as follows:

1.—On each barouche, sulky, cab, coupé, buggy, runabout, carriage, trap, surrey, or phaeton drawn by one horse	$ 1 50
2.—On each one-horse vehicle not before mentioned	2 00
3.—On each runabout, cab, coupé coach, barouche, buggy, carriage, surrey, trap, or phaeton drawn by two horses	3 50
4.—On each two-horse vehicle not before mentioned	6 00
5.—On each vehicle drawn by three horses	8 00
6.—On each vehicle drawn by four horses	10 00
7.—On each vehicle drawn by more than four horses	10 00
8.—On each automobile, locomobile, autocar, or similar vehicle used by one or two persons	5 00
9.—On each automobile, locomobile, autocar, or similar vehicle, used by three or more persons	7 50
10.—On each automobile, locomobile, autocar, or similar vehicle, used in hauling goods or freight	7 00
11.—On each motorcycle or autocycle	2 00
12.—On each push cart	1 00
13.—On each bicycle	50
14.—On each vehicle hauling a street piano or street organ	1 00

Section 6: "That each license issued in accordance with the provisions hereof shall expire on the last day of December following its issuance." Provision follows for procuring license during the remainder of the current year, and the amount to be paid therefor. Tags or checks of certain material must be used by the licensee in a certain place or displayed in a certain manner. Section 12 provides that "the money paid into the city treasury from said license fees shall be credited to a fund to be known as the 'vehicle fund,' and shall be first applied to the expenses of issuing said licenses and furnishing said numbers and tags, and then, struction upon the law as to legalize such action. It would require a liveryman who had paid all the taxes at his home to pay an additional tax in every town to which he happened to send a vehicle, even if only once a year."

So, in New York v. Hexamer, 59 App. Div. 4, 69 N. Y. Supp. 198, an ordinance providing for the licensing of public cartmen, truckmen, hackmen, etc., was held not to apply to a person engaged in conducting a livery stable in another state, who, at intervals, sent his carriages to the licensing city for the sole purpose of meeting the steamers of a transatlantic line, and conveying the passengers to their respective destinations.

There is another class of cases, although not strictly in point in this note, in which it was contended that the particular ordinance was invalid because it failed to provide for the taxing of vehicles of nonresidents or a certain class of nonresidents who habitually use the streets of the city. Several cases, however, among possibly others, have held that the failure to include the vehicles of nonresidents or those of a class of nonresidents did not render the ordinance invalid. Kersey v. Terre Haute, 161 Ind. 471, 68 N. E. 1027; Sterling v. Bowling Green, 26 Ohio C. C. 581; Ft. Smith v. Scruggs, 70 Ark. 549, 58 L.R.A. 921, 91 Am. St. Rep. 100, 69 S. W. 679.

For cases on validity of license tax on vehicles used in business for which a general occupation tax is required, see case note to Newport v. Fitzer, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 279.

Discrimination as to amount of tax or license fee on different vehicles, as affecting validity of tax, see case notes to Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Hot Springs, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1035, and Fiscal Ct. v. F. & A. Cox Co. 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 83.

if any remain, shall be used only for the actual repair of the streets of the said city of Columbus, Ohio." It is provided in § 15 that any person using any vehicle upon said streets without a license, or without a check or tag attached thereto, etc., as required by the ordinance, shall be guilty of an offense. Section 16 provides "that any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than five dollars ($5) and not more than fifty dollars ($50), and shall pay the costs of prosecution."

The petition protests the validity of said ordinance on several grounds, among which are: (1) That it was enacted for the purpose of raising revenue, and not for the regulation of the use of the streets, and is therefore a tax for revenue. (2) It discriminates against farmers and gardeners who raise and sell the products of their own farms and gardens, in favor of brewery wagons, coal wagons, heavy drays, transfer wagons, and trucks carrying heavy loads and used constantly upon the streets, against the vehicles with light loads used occasionally upon the streets; that it is unjust, unfair, unreasonable, and exorbitant, in restraint of trade, and is against public policy. (3) It is unconstitutional and void, and is not of uniform operation. (4) That the defendants construe said ordinance so as to apply to the plaintiffs, and threaten to arrest plaintiffs if they use said streets without said license and paying for the same. The petition prays that defendants be enjoined from enforcing said ordinance against plaintiffs and against other farmers and gardeners similarly situated who market the products of their own farms and gardens in said city, etc.

The answer of the city admits the facts set out in the petition,—but not the legal conclusions therein,—and avers that, unless restrained, it will enforce said ordinance or so much as is valid, and that it had taken the official opinion of the city solicitor as to its enforcement against persons living outside said city, and as to whether any of them could be excepted from its operation. The city, so the answer says, being in doubt about the soundness of the opinion rendered by the solicitor, prays this court for a construction of said ordinance as to its validity and scope in relation to such nonresidents of the city as the plaintiffs. On hearing, the court of common pleas found the ordinance to be constitutional, but that it does not apply to or embrace nonresidents of the city, and that the plaintiffs and all farmers and gardeners similarly situated are entitled to the relief prayed for.

The case was taken on appeal to the circuit court and there tried. Besides the admissions found in the pleadings, the following facts were agreed upon: (1) The amount of public funds of the city of Columbus required per annum to furnish the necessary clerical services, the license blanks, tags, and numbers to issue the license, and to put into operation ordinance 21,927, will amount to $3,000 per annum, and no more. (2) Between August 13 and November 8, 1906, both dates included, licenses have been procured by owners of vehicles within the city limits as follows: One-horse buggy, 2,649; one-horse wagon, 3,167; two-horse buggy, 144; two-horse wagon, 1,294; three-horse wagon, 9; four or more horse wagon, 7; automobile, one or more persons, 212; automobile, three or more persons, 218; automobile for freight or goods, 8; motor or motorcycle, 7; push cart, 108; bicycle, 2,935; street piano or organ, 7. (3) When petition was filed, there were in Franklin county about 4,000 farmers and gardeners outside the limits of the city of Columbus who raise and market the products of their own farms and gardens, and that each owns on an average one two-horse wagon, and one buggy, pleasure carriage, or spring wagon drawn by one horse. There are other farmers and gardeners living in counties adjoining Franklin, who haul the products of their farms and gardens to the city of Columbus. (4) The use of vehicles mentioned in the ordinance tends to wear out said streets, and necessitates the constant care and repair thereof, the actual cost of which cannot be accurately determined, but will not be less than $50,000. (5) Money is required annually for police regulation, because of the use of said streets by vehicles, to prevent fast and reckless driving, blockades, and protect pedestrians at crossings, cost of same estimated at $30,000 per year. A license is not exacted from the owners of street cars operated in the city. Coal wagons and beer wagons drawn by two horses on said streets run on an average over ten hours per day and draw maximum loads at times exceeding 6 tons. Two-horse farm and garden wagons that are used on the streets draw maximum loads of about 2 tons. The circuit court found the foregoing to be the facts, and held as conclusions of law: "(1) That said ordinance does not contravene the Constitution of the state of Ohio or of the United States. (2) Its terms and conditions apply to nonresidents as well as residents of the city of Columbus, Ohio, according to the facts of each case; viz., to those who, in the sense of a continued or repeated practice 'use' the streets with the vehicle described; (3) The plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief sought." The petition was dismissed at costs of the plaintiffs. The case is here to obtain a reversal of the judgment so rendered.

Price, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Columbus and its executive officers rely on subdivision 9, § 1536-100, Rev. Stat., as authority for the passage of the ordinance involved in this proceeding. That subdivision reads: "(9) To regulate the use of carts, drays, wagons, hackney coaches, omnibuses, automobiles and every description of carriages kept for hire or livery-stable purposes; and to license and regulate the use of the streets by persons who use vehicles, or solicit or transact business thereon; to prevent and punish fast driving or riding of animals, or fast driving or propelling of vehicles through the public highways; to regulate the transportation of articles through such highways, and to prevent injury to such highways from overloaded vehicles, and to regulate the speed of interurban, traction, and street railway cars within the corporation." Other subdivisions preceding and following, and which compose said section, furnish the general powers of municipalities. There are other powers mentioned in §§ 1536-100 and 1536-102, Rev. Stat., but they need not be quoted or considered in determining the law of this case. Under the above provision, it is claimed the council of the city of Columbus has passed and threatens to enforce an ordinance requiring any and every one who would enter upon and use any of the streets of such city with any vehicle described in the ordinance, either for hire or livery-stable purposes, as in the first clause of the above subsection, or for any purpose as specified in the second class, to apply for and obtain a license and pay the prescribed license fee before such person can lawfully use the streets, and to use such vehicles on the streets without the license is a misdemeanor (so says the ordinance), for which the owner or controller of the vehicle may be fined in a substantial sum with costs. The city authorities assert that this ordinance is enforceable not only upon resident users of the streets, but also against nonresidents of the city who may come in with vehicles named on business of any kind or for purposes of pleasure or social intercourse. In the case at bar, they would enforce the ordinance against farmers and gardeners who reside and conduct the farming and gardening outside the city, but who desire to market in the city part of the products of their farms and gardens; and who may visit the city to pay taxes or render jury service, or attend court as a litigant or witness. Or, if the spirit of visitation would lead the nonresident user of the vehicle to pass through Columbus on the proper way to reach another city, town, or county, he must obtain a license to use Columbus streets, or go around the city on some other route.

It is one of the findings of the circuit court, and also a fact agreed upon, that, when the action on review was commenced, there were 4,000 farmers and gardeners residing outside the city, but in Franklin county, who raise and market the produce of their farms and gardens, and that each owns on an average one two-horse wagon and one pleasure carriage or spring wagon, drawn by one horse. As it has been found that each of the 4,000 farmers owns on an average one two-horse wagon and a one-horse buggy or spring wagon, these farmers would be required to pay $32,000 of the estimated $50,000 to keep the streets in repair,—certainly a liberal draft on nonresidents who may use the streets often or seldom. There were and are other farmers and gardeners living in the counties adjoining Franklin county, who haul the products of their farms and gardens to the city of Columbus.

The petition alleges, and the answer admits, that the plaintiffs were required to pay taxes annually or semiannually in the said city as the county seat, and their vehicles were used at such times for that purpose, and at other times, as to some of them, at least, plaintiffs used the vehicles to convey their children to schools in the city. There is no exception or exemption of anyone, no matter how circumstanced, if he desires to use one or more of the designated vehicles on the streets of Columbus. "You must pay before you enter" is the warning displayed to every nonresident owner of vehicles. We do not mean that pay is exacted on each use of the streets; but there must be a license to cover the period of such use, be it for a year or part of a year. If he enters without a license, he is liable to a fine ranging from $5 to $50. When asked for a reason for such demands, it is said the use of the vehicles mentioned in the ordinance tends to wear out said streets, and necessitates constant care and repair thereof, and so the court found; but it is not and perhaps could not be found, how much the nonresident owners contributed to the improvement of the streets by means of general road taxation, yet they are classed with residents who may constantly use the streets with heavier vehicles bearing heavier burdens. It is further said in defense, and so found, that it will cost about $3,000 per annum to furnish necessary clerical services, the license blanks, tags, and numbers to issue the license and put the ordinance into operation, and it is also found that the care and repair of the streets will cost not less than $50,000 per annum. Does the statute quoted authorize the ordinance in this case if it applies to nonresidents, and is the ordinance reasonable? The plaintiffs are not tradesmen, draymen, hack drivers, peddlers, hucksters, or members of a profession within the city, but they are producers, living on their own farms, and operating farms or gardens outside of the city limits.

These farmers own real and personal property outside the city, on which they pay all taxes and assessments provided by law, and these vehicles are a part of such personal property so taxed, and both their real and personal property is subject to taxes to keep in repair the public highways in their vicinity, toward which property within the city contributes little if anything. Moreover, the owner of vehicles who resides in the city has free use of the country roads, and without let or hindrance may operate them on such roads whenever and as often as he may choose. The high-speed automobile or touring car of a city resident can rush along the country highway as a terror to the farmer, and nothing is exacted but what he pays the state at large for license, of the benefit of which the farmer can receive but a trifle, if anything. The big brewery wagon can be freely used to deliver beer to villages within or without the county, and heavy moving vans may traverse the country roads in pursuit of that line of business, and the country folk can put up no bars to prevent it, or exact a fee for the privilege. The ordinance therefore lacks the spirit of reciprocity, and imposes a burden upon the farmer in addition to the one he must bear alone.

Another observation is also in order. If the city of Columbus may enforce such ordinance against nonresidents, so may any other municipal corporation, of which there are several within Franklin county, and, if such measures should be adopted by them or some of them, a farmer whose way to Columbus lies through such town or city would be required to pay further tribute to repair streets. And, as it is found that farmers and gardeners living in counties adjoining Franklin county haul the farm and garden products to Columbus, each municipality through which such farmer would pass could demand the payment of a license fee for the use of the streets until license would become prohibition. What Columbus can legally do in this respect any other Ohio municipal corporation can do,—demand an entrance fee as a condition to the use of the public highway. If such farmer uses one of the vehicles named to pass through Columbus and Franklin county on a mission of business or pleasure, even occasionally or once in a year, he is required to obtain the license. While it may be within the law for a municipal corporation to require its resident citizens to pay a license fee for their use of the streets (but we do not so decide), we are not ready to hold that it can bar from its streets nonresidents, and that it may fine one who has the temerity to disregard the exaction of the fee. It has been said that it is but fair for the plaintiffs and others like them to pay something towards keeping up street repairs, because they market their farm and garden products in the city; Columbus being their nearest and best market. At first glance, this sounds rather plausible, and, if the city is self-sustaining and is independent of the trade and business of such farmers, the authority to demand license fee might be on better footing. But the city, shut up to itself, would die. It obtains most of its sustenance for man and beast from the farmers and gardeners without its limits, and it needs their trade, and to furnish what the city needs vehicles must be used on the streets. Merchants of all classes are largely patronized by such persons, and the commodities of one are exchanged for the commodities of the other, or money, the medium of exchange, is paid by one to the other. Therefore the city is not independent and self-sustaining. It needs the farmer as much as the farmer needs the city.

We are greatly impressed with the view that, as to the plaintiffs, the ordinance is unreasonable and unfair. We are not favored with a reference to any case in which this court was called upon to decide the present question. Counsel cite Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63, 12 N. E. 463, as some authority, but in that case an act of the legislature was under consideration. It was entitled: "An Act to Provide a License on Trades, Business, and Professions Carried on in Cities of the First Grade of the First Class, and Providing the Enforcement and Collection of Fines and Penalties for Carrying on Business without a License, and for Other Purposes." 80 Ohio Laws, p. 129. One of the questions discussed was the invalidity of the law because it was not of uniform operation, though on a general subject. Another claim was that it was invalid because the last clause of § 29, amended by 81 Ohio Laws, p. 78, excepted from its provisions farmers marketing the products of their farms in the city.

Marmet was a citizen of Cincinnati, and was arrested on the charge that he had used vehicles upon the streets of Cincinnati without first obtaining a license therefor. It is not necessary to review the points considered and decided in that case, because the contentions here are very different and on facts and under circumstances unlike those in the Marmet Case. This court sustained the act, including said exception as to the farmers. In the history of the case, at bar, we observe that the court of common pleas held that the ordinance is constitutional, but that it does not apply to nonresidents of the city. The circuit court held that the ordinance is constitutional, and "applies to nonresidents as well as residents of the city of Columbus, according to the facts of each case; viz., to those who, in the sense of a continued or repeated practice, 'use' the streets with the vehicles described." This line of demarcation is very vague and settles nothing, and it is reasonable that both parties now want the question squarely met and decided. We have light from decisions made in other jurisdictions, to which we will give some attention.

In Bennett v. Birmingham, 31 Pa. 15, it appears that, by an act of the legislature, the burgess and town council of Birmingham were authorized to direct all owners of carts, wagons, etc., using the paved streets of said borough, to pay such moderate license for such use as they might, by ordinance, direct. It was held that this did not authorize the imposition of a tax on drays, wagons, etc., owned by nonresidents of Birmingham, and used in carrying goods and produce through the borough from an adjoining township to Pittsburgh. "The act in question only authorizes the taxation of vehicles belonging to citizens of Birmingham, and those of other persons carrying on some business or occupation in the town of Birmingham, by means of such vehicles. Such statutes and ordinances are contrary to the usual course of taxation and embarrassing to the public, and ought to be strictly construed." The ordinance excepted travelers and also farmers bringing their own produce to market. In the opinion of the court, Lowrie, J., among other pertinent things, says: "There are, no doubt, inequalities in the burdens which different locations have to bear in regard to roads; but it is impossible to make any better of it by such ordinances as this. If Birmingham may tax all St. Clair township for passing on the streets to Pittsburgh, then St. Clair township ought to be allowed to tax all the people further out,—and so with all others similarly situated. There are six or eight municipal corporations at this place, and there is no justice in one more than another having such ordinances; and, if they all have them, what is the result? No man having his business in an adjoining township can drive to town in relation to it without paying a license for his cart or wagon to some one or more corporations, while the people of these corporations can drive through the country at pleasure and without license. And then a citizen in one town cannot get a bag of flour hauled across the line into another without finding a drayman who has been able to pay a license for both, nor hire a hack to drive out into the country, without seeing that it has a license for each of the towns through which it has to pass." The entire opinion is worth consideration, and is directly in point. In Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679, the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts had under consideration the validity of certain regulations made by the mayor and aldermen of the city of Boston. The first paragraph of the syllabus and opinion relate to the kind, size, etc., of vehicles that might be used on the streets, and the right to designate certain streets for certain kinds of vehicles, etc. In the second and third paragraphs it is held that the statute (which is copied in the report of the case) did not authorize the mayor and aldermen of Boston to require payment of money to the city by persons resident of Roxbury, who set up and drive omnibuses and stage coaches from Roxbury to Boston and from Boston to Roxbury, for the conveyance of persons for hire, as a tax or duty upon such vehicles, before using the same. In St. Charles v. Nolle, 51 Mo. 122, 11 Am. Rep. 440, we find the following proposition stated by the supreme court of that state: "So much of the ordinance of the city of St. Charles requiring a license tax for wagons used for pay as attempted to impose a tax upon wagons of outside residents engaged in hauling into and out of the city was void as not being authorized by the charter of that city, and the legislature could give the city council no authority to pass such an ordinance. The tax, being upon outside citizens, and for the benefit of those living in the city, would be in effect taking property for private use; that is, for the use of a particular community of which the outside citizens form no part."

The legislature of New Jersey enacted a statute authorizing the council or other governing body of a city, incorporated borough, etc., to make ordinances, to license and regulate cartmen, hacks, milk wagons, etc., carriages and vehicles used for transportation of goods of any kind, etc., and to fix the rate to be paid for license. Cary v. North Plainfield, 49 N. J. L. 110, 7 Atl. 42, is a case where the city of Plainfield, in that state, passed a license ordinance under favor of above statute. Cary was licensed for that city where he resided, and he was hired to go into the borough of North Plainfield for two loads of furniture, to be brought into said city of Plainfield. The borough of North Plainfield had a similar ordinance for license for that locality, which Cary did not observe, and he was arrested for its violation. In the opinion of the supreme court of that state, it is said: "The inconvenience attendant upon the exercise, by every municipality of the state, of the power of excluding from its limits all unlicensed vehicles engaged in transporting goods or passengers for hire, is manifest. Its legitimate operation would require the owners of such vehicles to obtain licenses, not only from the authorities of the place where their business has its headquarters, but also from every neighboring town into which their casual engagements might call them, or else to unload their vehicles at the border line. A general law having effects so burdensome or so absurd is not to be anticipated, etc. Its terms are satisfied by holding that license taxes are to be imposed only by that municipality in which the business or occupation is carried on or conducted." After citing Com. v. Stodder, supra, the court adds: "But, when a power to tax for revenue is claimed, something more than mere temporary presence in the borough must be shown. It must appear that the business to be taxed is carried on in the municipality; and occasional passage or transportation into, through, or out of the borough, incidental to the pursuit of a business elsewhere established, cannot fairly be regarded as localizing the business there," etc. The court held Cary not liable. In East St. Louis v. Bux, 43 Ill. App. 276, we find the following: "In a controversy touching the violation of a municipal ordinance requiring truckmen and other common carriers to be licensed . . . the penalty provided for was intended to be imposed upon those only who carried on a business within a given municipality without a license, and that defendant, who hauled goods from another city, wherein he was licensed, to a depot within the boundaries of complainant, could not be considered as having been guilty of a breach of said ordinance." The authority to license conferred upon municipalities by the statute is construed as limited to those who engage in or carry on business in East St. Louis. Bux, the defendant in error, resided in Belleville, and carried on his business there under a license. Another case from Illinois is Collinsville v. Cole, 78 Ill. 114, of which the headnote is the following: "An ordinance that 'there shall be levied upon every hackman, drayman, omnibus driver, carter, teamster, cabman, or expressman, and all others pursuing a like occupation, the sum of $10 for a license,' was held not to embrace a farmer driving his team through the city. The purpose and object of such an ordinance is to impose a tax upon a business, calling, or occupation, and not upon one who may occasionally haul a few loads, in an emergency, for another, when that is not his calling."

The charter of the city of East St. Louis gave the city power "to license, tax and regulate and control wagons and other vehicles conveying loads in the city; to prescribe the width and tire of the same, the weight of loads to be carried, and the rates of carriage." In Joyce v. East St. Louis, 77 Ill. 156, the supreme court of that state held that such authority as to license applied "only to such vehicles in respect of which it is proper and customary with municipal authorities to prescribe rates of carriage; viz., those used by common carriers in the city for hire;" and "one using a vehicle not for hire, but only in the course of his ordinary private business, does not come within the reason or necessity of any such municipal regulation." Akin to this is the decision in Farwell v. Chicago, 71 Ill. 269. See also Chicago v. Collins, 175 Ill. 445, 49 L.R.A. 408, 67 Am. St. Rep. 224, 51 N. E. 907. The ordinance involved in the last case was said to be founded on authority conferred by the statute of Illinois known as the "general incorporation act," under which the city was organized. Clause 9, § 1, art. 5, chap. 24, Rev. Stat. 1893, confers power to regulate the use of streets. An ordinance was passed providing that all vehicles used upon the streets of the city, including those for private use, for pleasure, etc., should pay an annual license fee, and that anyone using a vehicle on the street without first obtaining a license should be fined. The parties who procured an injunction against the enforcement of that ordinance were owners of bicycles or carriages, not used for traffic or carrying merchandise for hire, but for private use and as a means of locomotion from place to place. The supreme court held the ordinance to be illegal. In the opinion, on page 455 of 175 Ill., supra, the court said: "The streets and alleys of a city are held in trust by the municipality for the use of the public, for purposes of travel thereon, and as a means of access to and egress from buildings abutting thereon or lots adjacent thereto. The right to travel on and along the streets of a city belongs to the general public, and does not belong to its denizens alone. The right to travel being in the general public everywhere, all persons have a right to pass along and use the streets and alleys of a city in all their parts, the full width and length thereof. The municipality, which is a mere trustee of the public, and holds the streets and alleys in trust for that public, cannot deny the right of the public to use the streets and alleys. It cannot assume an exclusive ownership, and deny the rights of the beneficiaries under their trust, and arrogate to itself a power greater than that of a mere trustee, and prevent the use of the streets and alleys by individual members of the public. The right of the public to use the streets is the right to use them for purposes of travel in the recognized methods in which the public highways of the state are used. Any method of travel may be adopted by individual members of the public which is an ordinary method of locomotion, or even an extraordinary method, if it is not of itself calculated to prevent a reasonably safe use of the street by others. If a right exists in a city council to impose a license fee by way of tax on every person using wheeled vehicles thereon, it may in like manner impose such license fee for such use of the streets in every other manner of locomotion or travel, and reach the man on horseback or the pedestrian walking along the same." And on page 456 of 175 Ill., it is said: "The city council may regulate the use of the streets and alleys to the extent that it may require sidewalks exclusively reserved for use by pedestrians, and exclude certain character of loads, and regulate the width of tires on vehicles used on a certain character of pavements, and provide that the rate of speed shall be much less on certain streets than on others, and otherwise regulate the use of the streets, having in view solely the welfare and safety of the public. The city may also regulate certain occupations, such as hackmen, draymen, expressmen, and the like, for such regulation is of a police character, having reference to the general welfare, as a means of preventing improper exactions and extortions; and, for the same reason, a license may be exacted for vehicles used in the transportation of goods and merchandise, or of passengers, or for other purposes of traffic; but such license is an occupation license, and not one for the use of the streets. The license in the latter named case is designed to operate upon those who hold themselves out as common carriers, and a license may be exacted from such as a proper exercise of police power; but no reason exists why it should be applied to the owners of private vehicles used for their individual use exclusively, in their own business or for their own pleasure as a means of locomotion." See Garden City v. Abbott, 34 Kan. 283, 8 Pac. 473. There are other cases that can be cited to same effect, and there are also cases which hold somewhat at variance from principles heretofore laid down in this opinion. In a multitude of cases we have examined, the words "license" and "tax" are used interchangeably, and some courts treat of them as meaning the same thing. But, when they endeavor to sustain the law or ordinance requiring a license, they locate the authority under the police power of the state, and not its taxing power, for by such shifting of authority some constitutional limitations are avoided. In other cases the charter or enabling act of the city expressly defined the power to license or tax, as in Tomlinson v. Indianapolis, 144 Ind. 142, 36 L.R.A. 413, 43 N. E. 9. And it is but fair to say that the statutory authority for the ordinance, its terms and scope, must be consulted in order to properly weigh the force of numerous adjudications. Again, the right to exact a vehicle license tax or fee has been carefully distinguished from imposing a license on various trades and professions carried on within a municipal corporation, as is held in Chicago v. Collins, supra.

We have given this case that careful and patient consideration its grave importance demands, and we are unable to agree with the circuit court in its conclusions. Its judgment fixes no satisfactory or distinct line of demarcation as to who will be affected by the ordinance. It leaves open the way for new controversies, because no one can clearly determine whether he is of the number required to pay for a license or not. We make the ground clear in so far as the plaintiffs in error are concerned, and hold that the nonresident farmers and gardeners cannot be compelled to pay for a license to use the streets in going to and fro from their homes to the city for the purpose of marketing their products and trading with the merchants of the city, or in visiting the city on business or pleasure. As to them, the ordinance is unreasonable and invalid. Its ambition should be for a "greater Columbus" rather than for a walled city.

Crew, Ch. J., and Summers, Davis and Shauck, JJ., concur.

Spear, J., dissenting:

The ordinance is to license and regulate the use of the streets of Columbus by persons who use vehicles thereon. The opinion of the circuit court, by Wilson, J., in Pegg v. Columbus, 10 Ohio C. C. N. S. 199, is to the effect that, construing the term "use" as a continued and repeated practice, the ordinance applies to those who, in the above sense, use the vehicles described. This construction would apply to nonresidents as well as to residents, and must be settled in each case according to the facts.

Applying this limitation as to the construction and enforcement thereof directed by the circuit court, I am of opinion that the ordinance is relieved of any charge of unreasonableness, and may be sustained. On this ground I favor an affirmance of the judgment of the circuit court, and dissent from the judgment of reversal.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

JENNIE LARSON, Appt.,

v.

SALT LAKE CITY et al., Respts.

(34 Utah, 318, 97 Pac. 483.)

Physical examination — power to compel.

A court of law has no inherent power to compel a plaintiff in an action at law to recover damages for personal injuries to submit, in advance of trial, to a physical examination by defendant's physician.

(September 12, 1908.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. M. Sullivan, W. A. Lee, and A. T. Sanford for appellant.

Messrs. Young & Snow and H. J. Dinny for respondents.

Straup, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by her by the negligence of the defendants. It was alleged in the complaint that, by reason of the negligent acts, the plaintiff "was rendered unconscious, her left leg and ankle badly bruised and injured, her back, spine, and nervous system disordered, her face and nose scarred and disfigured, and that she was otherwise made sick, sore, and lame; that she was confined to her bed for many weeks, and required the services of a physician and surgeon; and that her injuries were permanent and lasting." The defendants filed general denials. Before trial, one of the defendants, the Big Four Advertising Company, applied to the court for an order requiring the plaintiff to submit to an examination by a competent physician and surgeon, to be appointed by the court, in order that the character and extent of plaintiff's injuries, and whether her disabilities, if any, were due to the causes set forth in the complaint, might be ascertained and determined. The name of such a physician was suggested and his appointment requested by the defendant. The Case Note. — Power to compel plaintiff in a suit to submit to a physical examination.

This note supplements the note to McQuigan v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 14 L.R.A. 466, where the earlier cases will be found. It was stated in that note that the decisions are in hopeless conflict upon the question of the right of defendant to demand, and the power of the trial court to enforce, a surgical examination of plaintiff's person, either before or during the trial of his action for personal injuries. This question has since been passed upon by the same and other courts many times with little advance, if any, toward common ground.

Examination before trial—personal-injury cases.

Since the preparation of the note referred to, it has been held that, in the absence of statutory authority, a court has no power to order a plaintiff, in a personal-injury action, to submit to a physical examination by a physician out of court, for the purpose of enabling the physician to qualify himself to be called as a witness by the defendant if the latter sees fit. Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer, 129 Ind. 401, 28 N. E. 860; Stack v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 177 Mass. 155, 52 L.R.A. 328, 83 Am. St. Rep. 269, 58 N. E. 686; May v. Northern P. R. Co. 32 Mont. 522, 70 L.R.A. 111, 81 Pac. 328, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 605; Easler v. Southern R. Co. 60 S. C. 117, 38 S. E. 258.

Likewise it has been held that it has no power to make such order for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the injuries of a plaintiff who has alleged that he was injured by the negligence of another. Kingfisher v. Altizer, 13 Okla. 121, 74 Pac. 107; Austin & N. W. R. Co. v. Cluck, 97 Tex. 172, 64 L.R.A. 494, 104 Am. St. Rep. 863, 77 S. W. 403, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 261; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Sherwood (Tex. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.))

Civ. App.) 67 S. W. 776; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Brown (Tex. Civ. App.) 75 S. W. 807; St. Louis & S. W. R. Co. v. Lindsey (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 87; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Butcher (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 819 (reversed on another ground in 98 Tex. 462, 84 S. W. 1052); International & G. N. R. Co. v. Gready, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 536, 82 S. W. 1061; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Rogers (Tex. Civ. App.) 117 S. W. 939.

In Austin & N. W. R. Co. v. Cluck, supra, it was held that the enforcement of such an order would be a violation of the constitutional provision against unreasonable seizures and searches.

But in an equal number of other jurisdictions it has been held that trial courts have the inherent power to order a medical examination by experts, of the person of a plaintiff seeking a recovery for personal injuries, if the examination is applied for and made before entering upon the trial. Western Glass Mfg. Co. v. Schoeninger, 42 Colo. 357, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 663, 126 Am. St. Rep. 165, 94 Pac. 342; Denver City Tramway Co. v. Roberts, 43 Colo. 522, 96 Pac. 186; Wanek v. Winona, 78 Minn. 98, 46 L.R.A. 448, 79 Am. St. Rep. 354, 80 N. W. 851; Harvey v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 26 W. N. C. 231.

Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer, supra, was expressly overruled in South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 54 L.R.A. 396, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200, 60 N. E. 271, where it was held that the power should be exercised in favor of defendant's motion, made before trial, where defendant had no other method of determining the extent of the injury, and the examination could be made without pain or danger to plaintiff. This view was reaffirmed in Aspy v. Botkins, 160 Ind. 170, 66 N. E. 462.

An interlocutory order for an examination of a woman by medical experts appointed by the court may be made in her action to re-plaintiff objected to the granting of the order, on the grounds, principally, that the court was without authority to make or enforce the order, and that the physician suggested by the defendant was prejudiced and biased. In ruling on the objection, the court observed that both the plaintiff and the defendant had the right to select their own witnesses; that the plaintiff had the right to select a physician of her choice, and the same privilege ought to be extended to the defendant, unless the reputation of the physician was such that he ought not to be selected. The court, however, required a showing to be made as to the necessity for the examination, which showing was to the effect that the defendant applying for the order had no information, except as was alleged in the complaint, concerning the character or extent of the alleged injuries. Thereupon the court made an order requiring the plaintiff, at a time specified, and at her home, or at some place to be designated by her, to submit to an examination to be made by the physician and surgeon suggested by the defendant, the plaintiff's physician and attorneys, if she desired them, to be present at such examination. The plaintiff refused to comply with the order, whereupon the court, at a subsequent time, dismissed the case. Judgment was entered accordingly, from which this appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff.

The questions presented, therefore, are whether the court had the power to make the order, and whether it was authorized cover damages for personal injuries. Dimenstein v. Reichelson, 2 Pa. Dist. R. 825; Lane v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co. 21 Wash. 119, 46 L.R.A. 153, 75 Am. St. Rep. 821, 57 Pac. 367.

Where plaintiff has alleged permanent injury to her uterus and bladder and fracture of the hip bone through negligence of defendant, the court has power, upon motion of defendant, seasonably made before trial, to order an examination of plaintiff's person by medical experts. Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 12 N. D. 61, 102 Am. St. Rep. 564, 95 N. W. 153.

In Burns v. Toronto R. Co. 13 Ont. L. Rep. 404, 9 Ont. Week. Rep. 277, it was held that the court had no power to order a medical examination of plaintiff to enable defendants to pay into court such amount as they might think sufficient compensation for his personal injuries.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Dees (Fla.) 48 So. 28, it appears that, by statute, the trial courts in Florida, in actions to recover damages for personal injuries, are given the discretionary power to require the injured party, either before or at the trial, to submit to a physical examination.

In Lyon v. Manhattan R. Co. 142 N. Y. 298, 25 L.R.A. 402, 37 N. E. 113, it was held that a statute which authorized the court, in granting an order for the oral examination of the plaintiff before trial in personal-injury cases, to direct that he submit to a physical examination by one or more physicians or surgeons, to be designated by the court, if the defendant applies therefor, did not violate any of the express or implied restraints upon legislative power to be found in the fundamental law.

In McGovern v. Hope, 63 N. J. L. 76, 42 Atl. 830, it was held that a statute was constitutional which authorized a physical examination on or before the trial, and apart from, and independent of, an examination of the plaintiff as a witness before the trial.

In People ex rel. Mosher v. Roosa, 43 App. Div. 611, 60 N. Y. Supp. 244, it was held 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that, in a mandamus proceeding to determine relator's right to the office of chief of police, the court has no inherent power to order a physical examination of relator, although it is averred in the return to the writ that he is physically disabled and incapacitated to perform the duties of the office.

In Pitt v. Dunlap, 54 Misc. 115, 105 N. Y. Supp. 846, an action for damages for breach of promise to marry, it was held that the court had no power to order a physical examination of plaintiff, although she had alleged that she was seduced and was pregnant by defendant.

In the absence of statute conferring upon a judge at chambers jurisdiction to hear and pass upon a motion asking for an examination of the person of the plaintiff, he has no such power at chambers. Ellsworth v. Fairbury, 41 Neb. 881, 60 N. W. 336.

Examination at the trial.

In the following cases it was held that the court had no power to make or enforce an order requiring plaintiff at the trial, in an action for personal injuries, to submit to a physical examination by a physician of the defendant's selection (Kellyville Coal Co. v. Moreland, 121 Ill. App. 410; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Downs, 122 Ill. App. 545); or by disinterested medical experts, to be designated by the court (Illinois C. R. Co. v. Griffin, 25 C. C. A. 413, 53 U. S. App. 22, 80 Fed. 278; Richardson v. Nelson, 221 Ill. 254, 77 N. E. 583; Joliet Street R. Co. v. Call, 143 Ill. 177, 32 N. E. 389; Pronskévitch v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 232 Ill. 136, 83 N. E. 545; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Story, 104 Ill. App. 132).

In Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Rice, 144 Ill. 227, 33 N. E. 951, it was held that the power could not be exercised "for the purpose of ascertaining whether he is now in the condition to which he testified,—that is permanently ruptured."

But a decided majority of the cases hold that a court has the power upon the trial, in actions for personal injuries, to require the plaintiff to submit to a physical examinato dismiss the case on plaintiff's refusal to comply with it. Upon these questions the authorities are in hopeless conflict. They are collected and referred to in note to § 4, p. 1022, 5 Current Law, 64 Cent. L. J. 428, 14 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 364, and in the case of May v. Northern P. R. Co. 32 Mont. 522, 70 L.R.A. 111, 81 Pac. 328, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 605, where the power to make the order was denied; and in the cases of South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 54 L.R.A. 396, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200, 60 N. E. 271, and Johnston v. Southern P. Co. 150 Cal. 535, 89 Pac. 348, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 841, where the power was asserted. Upon noting and reviewing the cases from the different jurisdictions in Current Law, supra, it is said: "If the last announcements of these several courts may be taken to indicate the law in their respective states, a review of the decisions discloses that the power of trial courts to compel such examination is asserted in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Washington, and Wisconsin, and denied in the Federal and territorial courts and in Illinois, Massachusetts, and Texas, and was denied in New York until specifically granted by direct legislative enactment. The bare assertion that trial courts possess this power, in the absence of any legislation, and without common-law precedents, has led to the greatest possible confusion among the decisions of the very courts asserting it. (1) What is the source of the action by physicians selected by the court, for the purpose of ascertaining the location and extent of the injuries (Ottawa v. Gilliland, 63 Kan. 165, 88 Am. St. Rep. 232, 65 Pac. 252; Dickinson v. Kansas City Elev. R. Co. 74 Kan. 863, 86 Pac. 150; Fullerton v. Fordyce, 121 Mo. 1, 42 Am. St. Rep. 516, 25 S. W. 589); if no serious physical or mental injury is likely to be done plaintiff (United R. & Electric Co. v. Cloman, 107 Md. 681, 69 Atl. 379); if such examination can be had without danger to plaintiff's life or health, and without the infliction of serious pain (Belt Electric Line Co. v. Allen, 102 Ky. 551, 80 Am. St. Rep. 374, 44 S. W. 89); and it fairly appears that the ends of justice require it, and that knowledge of necessary and material facts can be brought to light only by such examination (Belle of Nelson Distilling Co. v. Riggs, 104 Ky. 1, 45 S. W. 99).

Thus, where plaintiff has alleged that his personal injury is permanent, the court has power to order him to submit his person to an examination of medical experts to ascertain if, in their opinion, his injury is permanent. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Dobbins, 60 Ark. 481, 30 S. W. 887, 31 S. W. 147.

Where a plaintiff has alleged that his personal injury is permanent, and has had physicians of his own selection to testify as to the extent of the injury, the court has power, on the application of the defendant, to order a physical examination of plaintiff in the presence of plaintiff's physicians and reputable physicians named by defendant. Johnston v. Southern P. Co. 150 Cal. 535, 89 Pac. 348, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 841.

The court has power to compel plaintiff to submit her injured hand to defendant's medical witness for examination in the presence of the jury on the trial of an action for such injury, since it would occasion no indecency or shock to plaintiff's sense of delicacy. Graves v. Battle Creek, 95 Mich. 266, 19 L.R.A. 641, 35 Am. St. Rep. 561, 54 N. W. 757.

an action for personal injury, after the jury had been impaneled, the circuit court of the United States, sitting in New Jersey, had the power, upon the application of the defendant, to order a surgical examination of the plaintiff, since a New Jersey statute conferred such power upon its courts, and § 721 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 581) provided that state statutes should be rules of decision in trials at common law in Federal courts in cases in which they apply. As appears in the note to 14 L.R.A. 467, this court had previously held, in Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 250, 35 L. ed. 734, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000, that courts were not inherently vested with such power.

Application of the rules.

In those jurisdictions where it is held that the court has the power to order a physical examination, it is generally held that the defendant has no absolute right to demand the enforcement of such an order, but that the motion therefor is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Dobbins, supra; Western Glass Mfg. Co. v. Schoeninger, 42 Colo. 357, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 663, 126 Am. St. Rep. 165, 94 Pac. 342; Aspy v. Botkins, 160 Ind. 170, 66 N. E. 462; Ottawa v. Gilliland, 63 Kan. 165, 88 Am. St. Rep. 232, 65 Pac. 252; Belt Electric Line Co. v. Allen, 102 Ky. 551, 80 Am. St. Rep. 374, 44 S. W. 89; Belle of Nelson Distilling Co. v. Riggs, supra; United R. & Electric Co. v. Cloman, 107 Md. 681, 69 Atl. 379; Logan v. Agricultural Soc. (Mich.) 121 N. W. 485; Marler v. Springfield, 65 Mo. App. 301; Paul v. Omaha & St. L. R. Co. 82 Mo. App. 500; Murphy v. Southern P. Co. (Nev.) 101 Pac. 322.

As to when a refusal of an order for a physical examination amounts to an abuse of discretion, see case note to Western Glass Mfg. Co. v. Schoeninger, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 663.

Where plaintiff, in an action for an injury to his knee, voluntarily exhibits it to the jury while on the witness stand, the court, without the aid of any statute, has power? (2) To what extent may it be carried? (3) May the defendant demand the order as a matter of right? And (4) how will the court enforce obedience to its order? Singularly enough, the first of these questions appears to have received little or no consideration." The courts asserting the power have quite generally held that the defendant has not the absolute right to the order, but that the motion therefor is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and that the application should be made before entering upon the trial; that the defendant has not the right to designate the physician by whom the examination is to be made, but that the examination should be ordered and conducted under the direction of the court whenever it fairly appears that important facts concerning the injury are only to be disclosed by such an examination, and that it may be made without injury to plaintiff's health, or the infliction of serious pain, or indignity to, or an unreasonable or indecent exposure of, his person; and that while the court has no right, in the enforcement of the order, to compel the plaintiff to actually submit to the examination, the court may, nevertheless, upon plaintiff's refusal to do so, dismiss the case or delay the proceeding until he complies with the order, or the court may decline to permit any evidence to be given to establish the injury. A few courts have held⁴ that, on plaintiff's refusal to comply with the order, the court may punish him as for a contempt.

In many cases where courts have asserted the power, it will be seen, as has been suggested, the existence of the power was either assumed or merely asserted. In others, the courts, instead of discussing the source of the power, or undertaking to state by what authority such a power is exercised, have undertaken to give reasons why trial courts ought to have such a power, and why it ought to be exercised by them. The same thing is true of some text writers. Thus, in § 859 of Thompson on Trials, the author inherent power, upon the motion of the defendant, to require him to submit to an examination by physicians before the conclusion of the trial. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Kendall, 167 Fed. 62.

But, in Mills v. Wilmington City R. Co. 1 Marv. (Del.) 269, 40 Atl. 1114, where plaintiff had exhibited his injured leg to the jury, and, during the noon recess, voluntarily submitted to an examination by physicians selected by counsel for defendant, it was held that the court had no power, upon reconvening, to compel him to submit to a further examination before the jury, to aid the physicians in their explanations of the injury while on the witness stand.

Where the court is committed to the doctrine that it has no inherent power to order an examination, the plaintiff will not be held to have waived his right, or in any way affected the established rule, by voluntarily submitting to an examination by physicians of his own selection, and having them testify as to his condition at the time of such examination. Cole v. Fall Brook Coal Co. 159 N. Y. 59, 53 N. E. 670.

For earlier cases upon the question of waiver of right to object to physical examination, see case note to Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Anglin, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 386.

In Whitaker v. Staten Island Midland R. Co. 76 App. Div. 351, 78 N. Y. Supp. 410, where it appeared that the court had appointed a physician to make a physical examination of plaintiff before trial, but, by stipulation of the parties, another physician was substituted, who made the examination, and testified at the trial without objection, it was held, upon a new trial of the action, that it was error to order another physical examination by a physician appointed by the court, since the physician who had examined plaintiff was still available as a witness, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) and the defendant had waived its statutory right to have plaintiff examined by a physician appointed by the court.

A case will not be reversed and a new trial granted merely because, upon a subsequent trial, defendant would have the right to have his physicians examine the plaintiff, under a statute which became operative after the trial. Cole v. Fall Brook Coal Co. supra.

Where a statute provided that, "where the defendant shall present to the court or judge satisfactory evidence that he is ignorant of the nature and extent of the injuries complained of," the court or judge "shall" order that such physical examination be made, the court must make the order where such ignorance has been made to appear, if the affidavit is, in other respects, sufficient. Green v. Middlesex R. Co. 10 Misc. 473, 32 N. Y. Supp. 177, affirmed without opinion in 70 N. Y. S. R. 885, 35 N. Y. Supp. 1107; Tirpak v. Hoe, 53 Misc. 532, 103 N. Y. Supp. 795.

Where it has been held that the court has no power to direct a physical examination, and a statute is subsequently passed giving the court such power, the statute will be strictly construed. Goldenberg v. Zirinsky, 114 App. Div. 827, 100 N. Y. Supp. 251; Bowe v. Brunnbauer, 13 Misc. 631, 34 N. Y. Supp. 919.

And where the statute authorizes the court to designate the physicians or surgeons who are to make the examination, the court cannot, in its order, permit defendant to have its own medical adviser present. Goldenberg v. Zirinsky, supra.

And the order cannot legally command the plaintiff's attorney to produce plaintiff for examination, where there is no authority in the statute authorizing the court to enforce such an order against the attorney. Bowe v. Brunnbauer, supra.

says: "In modern trials of civil actions for physical injuries, the question has frequently arisen whether the court has power to order an inspection of the body of the plaintiff or person injured, for the purpose of ascertaining the nature and extent of the injuries. Some of the courts, carrying in their minds no higher conception of a judicial trial than the conception that it is a combat in which each of the gladiators is permitted, within certain limits, to deceive and trick the antagonist and the umpire, have denied the right of the defendant to have an order for such inspection. Other courts, taking the more enlightened view that the object of a judicial trial is to enable the state to establish and enforce justice between party and party, have held that it is within the power of the trial court, in the exercise of sound discretion, in proper cases, upon an application seasonably made, under proper safeguards designed to preserve the rights of both parties, to order such an inspection, and to compel the plaintiff or injured person to submit to it." The same thought is expressed in less intemperate language in the case of South Bend v. Turner, supra, where it is said: "Courts are instituted by the state to administer impartial justice to contending parties. In such contests it is the duty of the court to bestow upon the litigants equal and exact justice. This cannot be done without the court first obtaining the exact and full truth concerning the matters in controversy. Hence, from this duty of the court to dispense exact justice is essentially implied all power necessary to its performance, which includes the power to make subservient to its order all persons and things that will afford the most reliable evidence." On page 3020, 3 Wigmore on Evidence, it is said: "There is and will be no end to the variety of frauds invented; and it will be an ill day for justice when the courts cease to meet new frauds by new applications of old remedies. Quite apart

The court is without power to make an order requiring plaintiff to appear before the court for a physical examination, where the statute provides that the order shall require him to appear before the judge or a referee. Ibid.

The order cannot require that the examination be made on the day following the order, where the statute requires that not more than twenty, nor less than five, days, shall intervene between the granting of the order and the examination. Ibid.

And the order should not direct or permit the taking of the testimony before a trial of the physician who made the examination. Wood v. Charles W. Hoffman Co. 121 App. Div. 636, 106 N. Y. Supp. 308, affirming 56 Misc. 66, 106 N. Y. Supp. 940.

In Potter v. Hammondsport, 112 App. Div. 91, 98 N. Y. Supp. 186, it was held that a statute which provided for a physical examination of a female plaintiff "before physicians or surgeons of her own sex" meant that the examination should be made by female physicians, and not merely in their presence.

But, in Lawrence v. Samuels, 16 Misc. 501, 38 N. Y. Supp. 976, it was held that plaintiff had waived this right by making no effort to have the order modified so as to provide for an examination by a physician of her own sex. This was reversed, however, in 17 Misc. 559, 40 N. Y. Supp. 686, where it was held that a female plaintiff was entitled, as of right, to have inserted in the order the provision that a female physician make the examination, without making any special application for it as a favor or privilege.

The order authorized by statute will not be denied merely because plaintiff makes affidavit that he believes that its object is to annoy and harass him. Sewell v. Butler, 16 App. Div. 77, 44 N. Y. Supp. 1074.

The court will not order the examination authorized by statute if plaintiff stipulates, for use upon the trial, that he has entirely recovered from the injuries referred to in his complaint and from their effect. Ibid.

Enforcing the order.

Compliance with an order to submit to a physical examination may be enforced by staying the trial or dismissing the case. Lane v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co. 21 Wash. 119, 46 L.R.A. 153, 75 Am. St. Rep. 821, 57 Pac. 367; Western Glass Mfg. Co. v. Schoeninger, supra; Wanek v. Winona, 78 Minn. 98, 46 L.R.A. 448, 79 Am. St. Rep. 354, 80 N. W. 851; Smith v. New Jersey & H. River R. & Ferry Co. 123 App. Div. 493, 108 N. Y. Supp. 415.

In Wanek v. Winona, supra, the court said: "No one claims that he [plaintiff] can be compelled to submit to such an examination; but he must either submit to it or have his action dismissed."

At the examination, care should be exercised to avoid all unnecessary inconvenience and annoyance to the plaintiff (Lane v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co. supra); or exposure of his or her person (McGovern v. Hope, 63 N. J. L. 76, 42 Atl. 830).

When desired, the examination should be made in the presence of the counsel and friends of the party to be examined. Lane v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co. supra.

Both parties should be given an equal opportunity to have qualified witnesses present at the examination. McGovern v. Hope, supra.

The expense of such examination should be borne by the party requesting it. Lane v. Spokane Falls & N. R. Co. supra.

from the general impolicy of granting to a party the license to conceal truth by any form of refusal, there is in this class of cases the added consideration that corporal injuries are to-day notoriously a subject of frequent fraud and misrepresentation; so that the privilege to withhold the exhibition of the alleged injury may amount in such cases to nothing less than a judicial license for fraud." In the case of Wanek v. Winona, 78 Minn. 98, 46 L.R.A. 448, 79 Am. St. Rep. 354, 80 N. W. 851, the court observes: "To allow the plaintiff in such cases, if he sees fit to display his injuries to the jury, to call in as many friendly physicians as he pleases, and have them examine his person, and then produce them as expert witnesses on the trial, but, at the same time, deny to the defendant the right in any case to have a physical examination of plaintiff's person, and leave him wholly at the mercy of such witnesses as the plaintiff sees fit to call, constitutes a denial of justice too gross, in our judgment, to be tolerated for one moment." And in other cases language may be found similar to that expressed by Mr. Justice Beck in the case of Schroeder v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 47 Iowa, 375, and in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brewer in the case of Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, 141 U. S. 258, 35 L. ed. 740, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1003, to the effect that every party "has a right to demand the administration of exact justice;" that, "if truth be hidden, injustice will be done;" that "the end of litigation is justice, and knowledge of truth is essential thereto;" and that, since the plaintiff may make any, not indecent, exposure of his person in the court room in the presence of the jury, to show the extent of his injuries, and may call his personal friends and his own physicians into a room, and there permit them a full examination of his person, in order that they may testify as to what they see and find,—to deny the defendant the right to make a similar examination permits the plaintiff to disclose the real facts to the jury, if his interests require, and to withhold such a disclosure if it is against his interest.

These may all be cogent reasons and appropriate addresses to be considered by legislative bodies why courts ought to have such a power, and why it ought to be exercised by them; but they are very far from pointing out anything which in any wise tends to show from what source such a power is derived, or by what authority it may be lawfully exercised. It is readily conceded that the "end of litigation is justice, and that knowledge of the truth is essential thereto," and that courts are organized "to establish and enforce equal and exact justice" between the litigants. Such plastic phrases and pointless truisms, however, do not argue anything, nor elucidate or answer the point of inquiry. To say that the action of courts may be invoked when, in their discretion, the exercise of a power will promote justice, is to say that courts are self-constituting and their power self-creating. No one would seriously contend that courts generally have the power to make and enforce orders which, in their discretion, will bestow equal and exact justice. The power of courts is not measured by so flexible a yardstick. There are many things over which it may be expedient on the part of courts to exercise a discretionary power, but concerning which courts have constantly refused to act because of a want of power. Courts are creatures of the law. The power of state courts is generally derived from Constitutions and laws of the state. The power of our courts is derived from the Constitution and the laws of this state, and the common law, so far as it is not repugnant to, or in conflict with, the Constitution and laws of the United States and the Constitution and laws of this state. Whenever the power of a court is invoked, in order that it may be lawfully exercised, it is essential to point to some constitutional provision or some legislative enactment or the common law authorizing it,—not necessarily to some express provision or enactment, but to some provision where the right to exercise the power invoked is fairly implied, or where it may be necessarily inferred from the nature and constitution of the tribunal itself. It is conceded that there is no constitutional provision nor legislative enactment giving the court power to make the order in question. The ruling of the court is not, nor can it be, defended on any such ground. It is also conceded, and it has been many times declared by the courts asserting the power, as well as by the courts denying it, that there is no common-law precedent where such action of the court was ever exercised by law courts. That no such power was possessed or exercised by the courts of common law is well pointed out by Mr. Justice Holloway in the case of May v. Northern P. R. Co. 32 Mont. 522, 70 L.R.A. 111, 81 Pac. 328, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 605, and by Mr. Justice Gray in the case of Union P. R. Co. v. Botsford, supra, and reaffirmed by Mr. Justice Peckham in the case of Camden & Suburban R. Co. v. Stetson, 177 U. S. 172, 44 L. ed. 721, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617, where, in the case last named, it is said: "It is settled in this court that no power to make such an order exists at common law; in other words, the court has no inherent power to make it." True, some courts have said that the exercise of the power is analogous to that exercised by courts in bills for discovery. But bills for discovery were brought in equity for the discovery of facts resting in the knowledge of the opposite party, or of deeds, writings, or other things in his custody or power, seeking no relief in consequence of the discovery, but seeking discovery merely to enable the party asking it to prosecute or defend an action at law in another court, arising out of contract or out of torts to property. The authorities are in conflict as to whether a bill of discovery, in the absence of a statute, will lie in aid of actions based on purely personal torts. 6 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 733. By an early English decision (Glynn v. Houston, 1 Keen, 329), and in Robinson v. Craig, 16 Ala. 50, it was held that the bill would not lie in aid of such actions. In a recent decision (Reynolds v. Burgess Sulphite Fibre Co. 71 N. H. 332, 57 L.R.A. 949, 93 Am. St. Rep. 535, 51 Atl. 1075), where the English and American cases are reviewed, it was held that the bill would lie in aid of such actions as well as actions of torts to property. To what extent the decision was influenced by statute need not now be considered; for, conceding that the bill, in the absence of a statute, would lie in aid of an action based on purely a personal tort, it nevertheless must also be conceded that law courts had not the authority to exercise the power of discovery in the law action, or in any proceeding supplemental thereto, but, to authorize the exercise of the power, it was essential to seek relief in a court of equity. Because it was necessary to resort to equity to exercise the power conclusively demonstrates that such a power was not possessed by the law courts. A power exercised by a court of equity is not a precedent for the exercise of the same power by a court of law. Says Mr. Best, in his work on Evidence, international ed. 1893-94, § 624: "The common law laid down as a maxim, Nemo tenetur armare adversarium suum contra se, and, in furtherance of this principle, it generally allowed litigant parties to conceal from each other, up to the time of trial, the evidence on which they meant to rely, and would not compel either of them to supply the other with any evidence, parol or otherwise, to assist him in the conduct of his cause." See also 2 Elliott on Evidence, § 1385, where the same principle is stated. Hence there arose the equitable remedy of bills for discovery to assist the prosecution or defense of an action pending in the law court. Such remedy being somewhat circuitous and expensive, the legislature, by 14 & 15 Vict. chap. 99, § 6, and by subsequent common-law procedure acts, empowered the superior and other courts of common law, on application made for such purpose by either party in any pending action, to order the inspection and production of any document or writing, or the inspection and examination of real or personal property, in the custody or under the control of the opposite party. And it is generally conceded that, in the absence of some legislative enactment, common-law courts were without power to compel the inspection or production of books and papers out of court, or the inspection of a document not counted or pleaded on, and not held in trust for the moving party, or the examination or survey of property. It is only in virtue of statutes that law courts now possess and exercise such powers. Such a power has been expressly conferred upon our courts by the laws of this state. The legislature has provided in what manner books, papers, documents, and other things may be inspected and produced, property examined and surveyed, property and premises viewed by the jury, oral examinations or interrogations of a party in action or proceeding may be had before trial, and has otherwise promulgated and established general principles and rules of evidence and means of its production in judicial investigations. It is not claimed that these enactments authorized the court to make the order, or that the order was made in virtue of them.

There can be no doubt that, in the absence of a statute, a law court is not authorized to compel the plaintiff, before trial, to appear before a notary public, or a commissioner appointed by the court, and there make answer to pertinent interrogatories propounded to him concerning his injuries, or concerning any other material issue in the case. If a statute is necessary to confer such a power upon the court, we do not see from what source it obtains the power to compel the plaintiff, before trial, to submit his person to a physical examination, and make answers to proper questions propounded to him by the physician making the examination. Or, if a statute is necessary to authorize a court to order an inspection and examination of property before trial, we see no good reason why a statute is not likewise necessary to authorize the court to compel a plaintiff in a personal-injury case to submit his person, before trial, to a physical examination. To say that the court has such a power in order to give the parties equal means to obtain information concerning the injury, and to afford them equal opportunity to lay before the jury the real facts, and to prevent fraud, and to promote justice, is merely asserting reasons why courts ought to have such a power. Such kind of argument could as appropriately have been made when, in the absence of statutes, the power of the court was invoked for the inspection and production of a paper or document which was in the possession and under the control of one of the parties, and which was secretly withheld by him, or for the inspection and examination of property. It may be that, in some instances, the plaintiff may have better means than has the defendant of ascertaining and producing the facts concerning the character and extent of the injuries. In other instances the defendant may have better means than the plaintiff of ascertaining and producing the facts concerning the alleged acts of negligence. It is not infrequent, in all kinds of suits, that particular facts in issue are peculiarly within the knowledge of one of the parties, or that one has better means than the other of ascertaining and producing the facts. The fact that a party having peculiar knowledge of a matter fails to bring it forward may raise a presumption or justify an inference in favor of his adversary's claim; or, if he withholds certain evidence with respect thereto, the inference may be justified that, if it had been produced, it would have been unfavorable to his cause; but it furnishes no basis authorizing the court to make an order requiring him to divulge his knowledge before trial to his adversary, or to supply him with the means of obtaining it. In the case of Reynolds v. Burgess Sulphite Fibre Co. supra, the doctrine was recognized that the defendant in an action at law to recover for a death caused by its alleged negligence could not be compelled to allow the plaintiff to inspect the broken parts of machinery, defects in which were alleged to have caused the death, but a bill of discovery was filed to obtain inspection of the fragments of machinery, to aid the action pending in the law court. It might as well be said that the court, in the absence of a statute, as well had the power to compel the defendant to allow plaintiff, before trial, to inspect his private records and documents, if relevant to the issue, or to examine machinery and devices in his possession and under his control, defects in which are alleged to have caused plaintiff's injuries, as the power to compel plaintiff, in the absence of some statute authorizing it, to submit his person, before trial, to an examination on behalf of the defendant, in order that he may ascertain the extent and character of the injuries and qualify witnesses to testify concerning them. The very courts which, in the absence of a statute, assert the existence of the power to compel the plaintiff to submit to such an examination, assert, with equal emphasis, that an order of court that a veterinary surgeon may be sent on the premises of a party against his will, to examine a horse whose condition was in dispute in an action brought to recover damages for breach of warranty in the sale of the horse, provided the owner or any person he might select would accompany such surgeon, was in excess of the power of the court. Says the learned court: "The mare in question was in possession of the plaintiff and upon his premises. The order compelled the plaintiff to permit the parties to enter upon his premises to make the examination, and by a party whom the plaintiff objected to as coming there. The court had no power to compel the plaintiff to submit to such an invasion of his premises. If the plaintiff refused to let the mare be examined at that time, or to have his premises visited for that purpose, it was his right." Martin v. Elliott, 106 Mich. 130, 31 L.R.A. 169, 63 N. W. 998. Why not here invoke the oft-repeated judicial pronouncements that the "end of litigation is justice," and that "courts are organized to enforce equal and exact justice between the parties;" that to permit the physical examination of the mare to be made by veterinary surgeons selected by plaintiff, and to leave the defendant "wholly at the mercy of such witnesses as the plaintiff sees fit to call, constitutes a denial of justice too gross . . . to be tolerated for one moment?" Why, in such instance, assert that compelling the plaintiff to allow a veterinary surgeon to enter his premises to make a physical examination of his horse was an unauthorized invasion of his rights, but to compel a plaintiff, especially a woman, to allow a physician and a stranger, against her will, to enter her home and there compel her to lay bare her body and submit it to his touch, and if, on her refusal to submit to such compulsory stripping and exposure, the doors of the courts shall be closed to her, is not also an unauthorized invasion of rights?

It might be considered a more advanced system of jurisprudence if, in judicial investigations, each litigant were required, before trial, not only to lay bare his respective claims and defenses, but also the particular kind of evidence by which it would be sought to support them, and to place each other in the same position with respect to ascertaining and producing evidence, not only as to a particular issue in a particular class of cases, but as to all material issues in all cases. But such a system does not now exist, nor has it ever existed. Litigants come before the court, not as "friends at court," who have, in advance of the trial, revealed to each other all the evidence possessed by them and the source and means of obtaining and producing it, but they come as opposing suitors, where neither is bound to arm his adversary against himself, nor furnish him with an instrument to enable him to maintain or defend his cause; not as "belligerent combatants," but as legal adversaries, asserting and demanding rights, and seeking to have them vindicated and defended in accordance with law and the prescribed rules and principles which have been established for the orderly conduct of judicial investigations. Experience has demonstrated that truth will be better disclosed, and justice more evenly administered, by courts confining their powers within the bounds of prescribed authority, and by adopting the prescribed manner of presenting evidence, and following the well-established rules and principles affecting judicial investigations, than by assuming supposed inherent powers from mere judicial pronouncements to go forth in search of truth and to do equal and exact justice, or by conducting judicial investigations in such manner as the court may consider in its discretion will best disclose truth and promote justice. The one leads to an orderly and proper administration of justice; the other, to disorder and confusion. It is further said by Mr. Justice Brewer in his dissenting opinion in the Botsford Case, and repeated by other courts, that "it seems strange that a plaintiff may, in the presence of a jury, be permitted to roll up his sleeve and disclose on his arm a wound of which he testifies; but, when he testifies as to the existence of such a wound, the court, though persuaded that he is perjuring himself, cannot require him to roll up his sleeve, and thus make manifest the truth, nor require him, in the like interest of truth, to step into an adjoining room, and lay bare his arm to the inspection of surgeons." In the first place, the expression was not pertinent to the question then before the court. Furthermore, the power of the court to compel the plaintiff, in advance of the trial, to submit to a physical examination, in order that the defendant may ascertain the extent and character of the injuries, and thus qualify witnesses who may testify concerning them, is one thing. The power of the court, when the plaintiff has testified concerning his injuries, to compel him to exhibit the injured parts to the jury, when to do so does not involve an indecent exposure, is quite another and different thing. While such a question is not now before us, inasmuch as courts have given such instance as a reason why the power of the court in question ought to be exercised, it may not be out of place to briefly notice it. If, in the case supposed, a plaintiff testifies, concerning a wound on his arm, he may, in corroboration of his testimony, exhibit the wound to the jury. He may likewise be required to do so, at the request of the defendant, as a part of the cross-examination, and as affecting plaintiff's testimony. Though the plaintiff does not take the stand, but evidence has been given on his behalf concerning his injuries, he may nevertheless be called by either party and required, in a proper case, to exhibit the injured parts as corroborating or affecting the testimony which has been given concerning the injuries. It may be asked, why has not the court power to compel a physical examination in advance of the trial, but has the power to compel the plaintiff to exhibit his wounds and injuries to the jury at the trial? The answer is simple. It is for the same reason that courts of law could not compel the inspection or production of private papers or documents in the possession or under the control of a litigant, but, if he came into court with the document or paper about him, the court could compel him to produce it. In the one instance, the power to compel one suitor before trial to arm his adversary against himself, or to furnish him evidence to enable him to maintain or defend his cause, was not recognized; in the other, the right of each suitor was recognized to call any person possessed of facts as a witness, and to interrogate him concerning them. The plaintiff may be a witness in his own behalf. He may also be called as a witness on behalf of the defendant. He may be interrogated by either party concerning any fact within his knowledge. If he testifies concerning his injuries, and is asked by either party to exhibit the injured parts to the jury, he, when the disclosure does not involve an indecent exposure, may not, any more than a witness on the stand who has been ordered by the court to produce a document in his pocket, decline to do so. The power which a court has to compel a witness to answer all proper questions propounded to him may also be exercised to compel the plaintiff to exhibit the wound or injury of which he testifies, for the purpose of affecting his testimony. But to say that the plaintiff shall submit his person to a physical examination, in advance of the trial, in order that those examining him may become qualified as witnesses, and put in possession of facts theretofore unknown to them, is quite another and different thing.

In discussing the question whether there is authority for a law court to compel one litigant to furnish the means by which the other may procure evidence, except as has been provided by statute, the court, in the case of May v. Northern P. R. Co. 32 Mont. 522, 70 L.R.A. 111, 81 Pac. 328, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 605, well said: "The plaintiff may be compelled to go upon the witness stand and answer all proper questions put to him, or to produce books and papers in

The action of the trial court in dismissing the action, being based on an order it had no power to make or enforce, cannot be sustained.

1. The question of the unreasonableness of the amount set aside by a testator for a tomb, compared with the value of his estate, so as to come within the operation of an inheritance tax which does not apply to amounts necessary for funeral expenses, cannot be decided on demurrer, since it involves a mixed question of law and fact.

Case Note. — Is money set aside under will, or otherwise, for purposes of caring for grave, erection of tomb or monument, subject to inheritance tax.

Very little authority exists on the question when and under what circumstances money set aside for the purpose of caring for a grave, erecting a tomb or monument is subject to the collection of an inheritance tax; and no case has been found which has given the subject as much attention as MORROW v. DURANT.

In Re Vinot, 26 N. Y. S. R. 610, 7 N. Y. Supp. 517, it was held that a bequest of one half of the income of $2,000 for the maintenance of decedent's burial plot was exempt from the inheritance tax, as it should be looked upon as a personal expenditure for the benefit of the decedent, and as part of the funeral expenses.

So, in Re Fleck, 35 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 67, it was held that a reasonable provision for the care of the graves of a testator and his family, and the cemetery lot, should be considered as part of the funeral expenses, and not subject to the collateral inheritance tax. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

distribution will not be construed to apply to the property so as to impose the tax on money reserved by testator for the erection of a tomb, since such construction would render the statute unconstitutional; but it will be held to designate the property to which the tax shall apply when passing by will or the inheritance laws.

Same — right of state — interference with will.

4. The state cannot, in the absence of fraud or collusion, question the reasonableness of the amount set apart by testator for a tomb for himself, for the purpose of throwing the portion held to be unreasonable into the residuary clause of the will, which will cause it to pass to collateral relatives, and render it subject to the inheritance tax.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Kossuth County in defendant's favor in a proceeding to collect an inheritance tax. Affirmed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

This is a proceeding by the plaintiff, as treasurer of state, to collect from the defendant, as executrix of the will of decedent, Henry Durant, a collateral inheritance tax. The court below ordered a recovery of such tax on certain bequests amounting to $3,980, and no more. The plaintiff appeals.

Rev. 60, so far, at least, as can be ascertained from the case as digested in Pepper & Lewis's Dig. vol. 21, cols. 36,966 and 36,968 (no report of the case being accessible), it was held that a bequest of a decedent to a cemetery association, for the purpose of caring for his own grave, was exempt from the collateral inheritance tax, while a bequest to the same cemetery association "to defray expenses for fences and keeping said cemetery in good order and repair" was held taxable.

In Re Edgerton, 35 App. Div. 125, 54 N. Y. Supp. 700, affirmed without opinion in 158 N. Y. 671, 52 N. So, a reasonable sum spent in the purchase and repairing of a burial lot for decedent has been regarded as a part of the funeral expenses, and therefore exempt from taxation. Re Liss, 39 Misc. 123, 78 N. Y. Supp. 969.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decedent, Henry Durant, died testate in Kossuth county on December 1, 1904, leaving no widow nor direct heirs. By his will he made a number of bequests to collateral relatives, amounting to a sum total of $3,980. By the sixth paragraph of the will, he directed his executrix to "build for me in the cemetery at Algona, Iowa, a tomb which shall not exceed the cost of $2,000 and pay for same out of my estate, when same is completed, that my remains be placed therein to remain." In division 2 of her answer, executrix pleaded this paragraph of the will, and averred, in substance, that after the payment of all legacies and bequests, amounting to $3,980, and after the payment of the debts of the decedent and the expenses of administration, there would remain in her hands a sum less than $2,000, and that she desired and intended to expend it all in the erection of a tomb, in pursuance of such paragraph of the will. To this division of the answer, the plaintiff demurred on the following grounds: (1) That such sum proposed to be expended had not in fact been expended within fifteen months of the date of the death of testator. (2) That the sum of $2,000 is not a reasonable sum for a tomb in an estate of the valuation of the Henry Durant estate, and that only a "reasonable amount can be allowed as part of the funeral expenses in such an estate, and included in the debts to be deducted in accordance with the provisions of § 1467a of Code Supplement." (3) That the sum of $2,000, or any other sum for such purpose, "is a bequest not exempt from the payment of collateral tax, for the reason that it is of a purely personal and selfish nature, and is not a bequest to any person or society exempt from a tax, and that such bequest is void and against public policy." This demurrer was overruled by the lower court. The plaintiff refused to plead further. Thereupon the case proceeded to hearing, and decree was entered, wherein the court made a certain finding of facts, finding, in substance, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover a tax of 5 per centum, with interest, on the sum total of all the bequests amounting to the sum of $3,980. After such finding, the decree provided as follows: "The court further finds that the balance of said estate, aside from said bequests herein mentioned, after the costs and expenses of the settlement of said estate are paid, will be invested in a monument erected in the cemetery at Algona, Iowa, in accordance with the will of said Henry Durant, which was proved and probated in Kossuth county, and that said sum will be less than $2,000."

However, in Re Fay, 62 Misc. 154, 116 N. Y. Supp. 423, it was held, the court disapproving Re Vinot, supra, that a bequest to a cemetery association, the interest to be used in keeping testator's lot in good condition, was subject to the transfer tax. In this case a distinction was drawn between expenditures made by an executor in his own discretion, and a bequest made by a decedent in his last will, to a certain beneficiary, and for a certain specific purpose. The court said that, in the latter case, the property passed to the beneficiary by virtue of the provisions in decedent's will; and, as the statute provides that all property passing by will, with certain exceptions, is taxable, the bequest to the cemetery association would seem to be taxable.

So, in Walters's Estate, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 447, it was held that a bequest to a church in consideration of the latter taking care, for all time, of testator's and his family's graves, was such a legacy as to be subject to the collateral inheritance tax.

In Long's Estate, 22 Pa. Super. Ct. 370, it was held that a legacy of $4,000 to the trustees of a cemetery, to be devoted to the care and repair of certain cemetery lots, as well as the care and repair of monuments to 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

all her relatives, which incidentally involved the care of her own last resting place, could not be considered as in the nature of funeral expenses, and was therefore subject to the collateral inheritance tax. The court, in this case, said: "The interest of the trust fund is to be devoted to the care of two separate and distinct cemetery lots, the repair of the various monuments in said lots, the construction of a new monument to her father when the present one has passed beyond the condition for repair, and, under certain contingencies, for the purchase of new lots in another cemetery, and the removal of the remains of the testatrix and all her relatives, with the several monuments. The lot in which the remains of the grandparents of testatrix were buried was entirely separate from that in which was the grave of her father, beside which the remains of the testatrix are to rest. The manifest intention of the testatrix was to provide a fund, the income of which should be devoted to caring for the last resting place of all her relatives; that this involved caring for her own grave was a mere incident of the general purpose." And see Hurst v. Caernarvon Cemetery Asso. supra.

The plaintiff was not allowed to recover any collateral inheritance tax upon the sum reserved and set aside for the purpose of erecting the tomb. Under the record as made here, this is the only question presented for our consideration, although a number of other questions appear to have been considered on the trial below. Plaintiff's theory is that the cost of erecting a tomb is a part of the funeral expenses, and that under the statute it is classified as a "debt," and that it can be only for "a reasonable sum," and that it must be allowed "within fifteen months from the death of decedent, unless otherwise ordered by the judge or court of the proper county." He contends that the reasonableness of the sum is to be determined by the amount of the estate, and that the amount provided by the will and ordered by the court in this case is unreasonable, in view of the size of the estate.

1. To our minds there are several insuperable obstacles in the way of plaintiff's recovery of a tax on this sum. Whether the amount reserved for the erection of a tomb is "reasonable" is a question of mixed law and fact, to be determined in the light of all the circumstances of the case. No evidence is presented to us in this record, and we have grave doubts whether the appellant is in any position to present such question for our consideration. A ruling on a demurrer can only present a question of law, and this question before us necessarily involves fact as well as law. If the burden was upon the defendant to show affirmatively that the sum reserved was "reasonable," it may be that the question could be raised by demurrer. An important fact in this case, which does appear in the defendant's pleading, is that the will of the decedent expressly provided for this expenditure. In the absence of the superior rights of creditors or of persons having some legal claim upon the decedent, it would seem reasonable to say that this provision of the will raises a presumption of reasonableness as far as the duties of the executrix are concerned. It is a matter of common observation that there are some people who prefer that their remains after death be laid in a "tomb," rather than in a grave. We cannot say that such a preference or desire is unreasonable, as a matter of law or fact. Nor can we say, without evidence, that a suitable tomb for such purpose could be built for a substantially less sum than $2,000. The appellant is under the further burden in this court that it does not appear from this record just what amount of money was reserved for the specific purpose, except that it was "less than $2,000." If the court below necessarily found that the sum reserved was "reasonable," we have before us no evidence from which we can review such finding, and, if we had such evidence, it could not avail the plaintiff, for the reasons appearing later in this opinion.

2. Appellant bases his contention upon the express terms of the statute. We do not think the statute will bear the construction contended for. So far as applicable to this case, § 1467, Code Supp., may be read as follows: "All property within the jurisdiction of this state, and any interest therein which shall pass by will to any person (other than to father, mother, etc.), shall be subject to a tax of 5 per centum of its value above the sum of $1,000 after the payment of all debts." The word "debts," as herein used, is defined in § 1467a as follows: "The term 'debts' in the eleventh line of § 1467 shall include, in addition to debts owing by decedent at the time of his death, and a reasonable sum for funeral expenses, court costs," etc. It has heretofore been held by this court that the clause, "above the sum of $1,000 after the payment of all debts," is descriptive of the estate as a whole, and determines the classification of the estate as a whole, as to whether it is exempt or non-exempt from the tax. Herriott v. Bacon, 110 Iowa, 345, 81 N. W. 701. It does not in any sense measure the amount of an exemption. If an estate does not contain "above $1,000 after payment of all debts," as above defined, it is wholly exempt from the operation of the law. If otherwise, all devises received by collateral persons are subject to the tax, without any exemption whatever. In the estate under consideration, it is undisputed that its value is "above $1,000 after the payment of all debts," and this is so even though the sum of $2,000 reserved for a tomb be deemed as a debt. There being no dispute over the classification of this estate as nonexempt, the clause, "above the sum of $1,000 after the payment of all debts," has no further function to perform, and has no applicability to the issues in this case. It necessarily follows that § 1467a is also without applicability to the issue under consideration, in so far as it defines the word "debts" as the same is used in the original section. The evident purpose of this latter section is that an estate whose value is near the dividing line shall not be carried into the exempt class by extraordinary charges under the guise of funeral expenses (which may properly include a monument, as plaintiff contends), or by the presentation of stale or fictitious claims which are not allowed within fifteen months. No such question is involved in this controversy. The question, therefore, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the tax upon the fund reserved for the tomb, is not governed by the language of this section.

3. It will be observed in § 1467 that the property subject to tax is that "which shall pass by will . . . to any person . . . other than to or for the use of father, mother," etc. The fund reserved in obedience to the will of decedent will not pass "to any person." On the face of the statute, therefore, plaintiff is not entitled to recover a tax upon it. His counsel have foreseen this difficulty, and they bring to our attention § 1467b, Code Supp., which is as follows: "Except as to property passing to the persons, corporations, and societies exempted by section fourteen hundred and sixty-seven (1467) of the Code from the collateral inheritance tax, and real property located outside the state, passing in fee from the decedent owner, the tax imposed under chapter four (4) of title seven (7) of the Code shall hereafter be assessed against, and be collected from, property of every kind which, at the death of the decedent owner, is subject to, or thereafter, for the purpose of distribution, is brought into this state and becomes subject to, the jurisdiction of the courts of this state for distribution purposes, or which was owned by any decedent domiciled within the state at the time of the death of such decedent, even though the property of said decedent so domiciled was situated outside of the state." It is apparent upon the face of this section that it has a much broader purpose than to reach a fund such as that now in controversy. We will not stop to discuss that broader purpose. The contention of the plaintiff is that, by its terms, it qualifies § 1467, in that it applies to "property of every kind," regardless of whether it passes "to any person" or not. It must be conceded that the language of this section will bear such construction; but, if we were to place such construction upon it, it would destroy § 1467 and render it unconstitutional. It has heretofore been held by this court that the constitutionality of our collateral inheritance tax law can be sustained only on the ground that it is not a tax on the property itself, but upon the right to succession to property; and that a tax on the property itself, on the ground that it was acquired by collateral inheritance (which tax was not imposed on other property), would be a violation of the Constitution. See Herriott v. Potter, 115 Iowa, 648, 89 N. W. 91; Re Stone, 132 Iowa, 136, 109 N. W. 455, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1033. Section 1467b may be readily and naturally construed as supplemental to § 1467, and as not qualifying it in any such sense as to render it unconstitutional. Its principal purpose is manifestly to impose a tax upon the right to succession accruing to residents of this state in property situated in other states, which is brought into this state for distribution; and to impose a tax upon the right to succession to property situated without the state, which was owned by a decedent domiciled within the state at the time of his death. Cases of this kind were not expressly provided for in the original section. We hold, therefore, that § 1467b has no application to the case at bar.

4. We do not overlook the fact that, if the amount to be expended for a tomb were reduced, the amount remaining would pass under the residuary clause to collateral heirs, and would thereupon become subject to the operation of the statute; but, in the absence of fraud or collusion on the part of the residuary legatees, this does not furnish to the plaintiff a ground of complaint. It has been held by this court that a legacy to a collateral relative may be waived or renounced in its entirety. Upon such renunciation the right of the state to collect the collateral inheritance tax fails with the legacy itself. Re Stone, supra. In the case at bar, so far as appears here, the residuary legatees concede the propriety and reasonableness of the fund reserved for erecting a tomb to the testator. Their position in the matter is commendable, rather than blameworthy, and we see no ground upon which the plaintiff can stand to interfere therewith. We hold, therefore, that §§ 1467a and 1467b have no application to the issue presented in this case; that the plaintiff, as state treasurer, can collect the tax only upon the property which passes by succession to some of the persons included within the collateral class; that, in the absence of fraud or collusion, he cannot interfere with the waiver by any such person of his rights under the will; nor has he any right to try the question of the reasonableness of an expense under § 1467a, except for the purpose of determining the classification of an estate as exempt or nonexempt from taxation.

5. The last ground of plaintiff's demurrer is not pressed in argument here.

Our view above expressed indicates that we see nothing contrary to public policy in paragraph 6 of the testator's will. Whether it shall be regarded as selfish or not must depend upon the point of view. If it be so conceded, it determines nothing.

The decree of the court below is affirmed.

Case Note. — Power of court to require accounting between members of partnership which is illegal or void, or which has been engaged in illegal business.

This note is in the main confined to cases involving illegal partnerships or illegal business transacted by partnerships; but, as the same general rules are frequently applied in cases of ordinary contracts which are illegal, some cases not involving partnerships have been included because of their value as to the principles applicable to partnerships. For the same reason, some other cases as to which it is difficult to tell whether or not a partnership did exist between the parties to the contract have been included.

The question may arise in any one of three situations: First, where the partnership itself was illegal and the business transacted also illegal; second, where the partnership was illegal, but the transaction itself legal; third, where the partnership was legal, but the transactions involved illegal. However, there appears to be no distinction in the principles applicable to the situation, and no attempt will be made to show in what respect the illegality existed. In some cases a distinction is suggested between acts which were merely illegal, and acts which were criminal; but this distinction is not generally recognized, and is usually made for the purpose of avoiding some case which the court does not wish to follow. As is said in McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 43 L. ed. 1117, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 839, it is difficult to base a distinction of principle upon these differences.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff claims: That about April 1, 1907, he entered into a copartnership with General rule that courts will not consider illegal transactions.

The general rule, upheld by the great weight of authority, subject, however, to several important exceptions recognized by some courts, which will be noted later, is to the effect that the courts will not require an accounting of the affairs of an illegal partnership, or of the illegal transactions of a partnership. The law will leave the parties in the same condition as it found them; and, if either has sustained a loss by the bad faith of a confederate, it is to be deemed but a just infliction for his illegal acts, and he must not expect that a judicial tribunal will, by an exertion of its powers, degrade itself by shifting the loss from the one to the other, or by equalizing the benefits or burdens which have resulted from the illegal and fraudulent transactions.

This general rule has been applied in the following cases, and the language of the courts does not imply that the rule is not universal, although, in most of the cases, under the facts presented, one or the other of the exceptions noted hereafter might be applicable.

Bartle v. Nutt, 4 Pet. 184, 7 L. ed. 825; Wheeler v. Sage, 1 Wall. 518, 17 L. ed. 646; Boyd v. Barclay, 1 Ala. 34, 34 Am. Dec. 762; Chateau v. Singla, 114 Cal. 91, 33 L.R.A. 750, 55 Am. defendant to do a general real estate brokerage and commission business in the city of Osceola, Iowa; that each was to give his entire time to the business and to share equally in the profits and losses; that this partnership continued until about December 1, 1907, when the venture was mutually abandoned. Plaintiff also claims that there has been no settlement or accounting between him and defendant, and that defendant has a large amount of money belonging to the partnership and some furniture, and he (plaintiff) asks an accounting. Defendant's answer was practically a general denial. The case was tried upon these issues, and the trial court found that there was no partnership, and that, if there had been one, according to plaintiff's testimony, such an one would have been contrary to public policy. The petition was therefore dismissed. For appellant it is contended that the trial court was in error in its finding of facts, that the contract of partnership was not contrary to public policy, and that, in any event, there was one deal in the transactions had while the partnership continued which was not in any manner affected by the alleged taint, and as to that plaintiff should have his share of the commission. Plaintiff and defendant at one time lived in the village of Russell, in Clarke county, and while there they entered into a copartnership arrangement for handling real estate in that town and vicinity. By the terms of the agreement they occupied the same office, but each had his separate desk, stationery, etc., and to the outside world there was nothing to indicate a partnership, save that they occupied the same room. The avowed object of this was so that, as they say, they might handle both ends of the deal; that is to say, so that one might represent the buyer and the other the seller, each getting a commission, which they were to pool or divide after the deal was closed. This partnership arrangement continued some five or six months, division and settlement of commissions being made from time to time, until the parties concluded to buy and conduct a clothing store in the town where they were operating, which was done, and this clothing business was conducted for some time. In the meantime, defendant had moved to the city of Osceola, where he

So, in Wheeler v. Sage, supra, the court said that, generally, when a party obtains an advantage by fraud, he is to be regarded as the trustee of the party defrauded, and compelled to account; but, if a party seeks relief in equity, he must show that on his part there has been honest and fair dealing; and if he has been engaged in an illegal business, and been cheated by his partner, equity will not help him.

And, in Shaffner v. Pinchback, supra, the court said: "Plaintiff . . . having embarked his money in an enterprise prohibited alike by the statute, by good conscience, and by public policy, placed himself and his money outside of the pale of the law, and, if he has been despoiled by the failure of his associate to account for the funds placed in his hands for the purpose of carrying on the unlawful business, then both good morals and public policy require that the law should not aid him."

So, in Hunter v. Pfeiffer, supra, it was held that persons who engage in forming partnerships the effect of which is to stifle or diminish competitive bidding on public works must rely for a division of the resulting profits upon those sentiments of honor which are supposed to prevail among all who form combinations which are condemned by the policy of the law.

And a partner cannot recover on a note given him by the other partner, the consideration for which was money advanced for the illegal purpose of betting on horse races as a partnership venture. Spies v. Rosentstock, supra.

Exceptions where the illegal transactions are complete.

Many cases recognize a distinction between those cases in which a court is asked to enforce an illegal contract and those in which a court is asked to deal with property which has been acquired as the result of the execution of such a contract, and hold that, in the latter situation, the court will act. It is claimed for this doctrine, that it does not violate that salutary principle of juridical ethics which declares that a court will never lend its aid in the enforcement of a contract founded in immorality or illegality, for, it is said, in such cases, the illegal transaction being fully completed, the court, in compelling the wrongdoers to divide, does not enforce the original contract between the parties, but proceeds upon an implied promise arising from the reception of the money, and that such implied promise is so entirely distinct from the original arrangement as to be, in legal estimation, free from its taint.

The following cases, within the scope of this note, apply the exception: Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, 16 Wall. 483, 21 L. ed.

opened a real estate office, having associated with him one Houston. Finally, and about April 10, 1907, plaintiff moved to Osceola with the intention of engaging in the real estate business. He met defendant, and, Houston being then away from home, he (defendant) proposed to plaintiff that, if his former partner, Houston, did not come back, he (Fryer) should go into partnership with him (defendant). After waiting a few days, and it appearing to defendant that his relations to Houston were terminated, he proposed to plaintiff that he (plaintiff) come into his (defendant's) office, and that they engage in the real estate business there in Osceola on the same terms as they had theretofore had at Russell. Plaintiff accepted the offer, moved into defendant's office, paid $6 for one half of certain furniture which defendant proposed to sell, and it was agreed that each should pay one half the office and other expenses, and that they should divide the commissions earned. Defendant excepted one deal he then had on hand, but all other matters were taken into the partnership, and plaintiff commenced to pay his part of the rent on May 1, 1907. From May 1st to about the first or middle of July three deals were made. In one, plaintiff received $200 and defendant $275; in another, defendant received $60 and plaintiff nothing; and in the third, plaintiff received $280 and defendant $175. Expenses, etc., down to July 1, 1907, were settled: each putting in his separate expense, and defendant allowing plaintiff $30 of the $60

App. 577; Lewis v. Alexander, 51 Tex. 578; McDonald v. Lund, 13 Wash. 412, 43 Pac. 348.

Thus, in Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, supra, which was an action on the alleged balance of account received for the illegal sale of Confederate bonds, the court said: "It may be that no action would lie against a purchaser of the bonds, or against the defendants on any engagement made by them to sell. Such a contract would have been illegal. But when the illegal transaction has been consummated; when no court has been called upon to give aid to it; when the proceeds of the sale have been actually received, and received in that which the law recognizes as having had value; and when they have been carried to the credit of the plaintiffs, the case is different. The court is there not asked to enforce an illegal contract. The plaintiffs do not require the aid of any illegal transaction to establish their case. It is enough that the defendants have in hand a thing of value that belongs to them. Some of the authorities show that, though an illegal contract will not be executed, yet, when it has been executed by the parties themselves, and the illegal object of it has been accomplished, the money or thing which was the price of it may be a legal consideration between the parties for a promise, express or implied, and the court will not unravel the transaction to discover its origin."

receiving the property, set up the evasion of such laws as a defense to an action for an accounting by the other, as the transaction alleged to be illegal is completed and closed and will not be in any manner affected by what is asked to do as between the parties. The court said that the difference between enforcing illegal contracts and asserting title to money which has arisen from them is distinctly acted upon in Tenant v. Elliott, 1 Bos. & P. 3, and Farmer v. Russell, 1 Bos. & P. 296, and recognized and approved in Thomson v. Thomson, 7 Ves. Jr. 473.

So, in Crescent Ins. Co. v. Bear, supra, the court, after citing a number of the above cases, said: "The authorities referred to maintain not only that when, in an illegal venture, there have been profits made, an account may be had in equity of them by one partner against the other, who has them and is seeking to appropriate them to himself but also that where there has been a loss in the venture, and an adjustment of the accounts between the partners, and an obligation given by the debtor partner to the other, that an action may be maintained on such obligation."

And in Lewis v. Alexander, supra, the court said that it is not clear that either the ends of public justice or any great public policy will be subserved by permitting one of the parties to a scheme to defraud the government, who may be so fortunate as to obtain possession of the illegal gains, to add to his public wrong by excluding the other party from all participation in the proceeds. The court said: "True it is, the law negatively permits this by refusing to lend its aid to either party; but the courts are not inclined to extend the rule beyond the immediate parties or subject-matter of the illegal contract itself." And this case was cited with approval and followed by Pfeuffer v. Maltby, 54 Tex. 454, 38 Am. Rep. 631. And to the same effect was Morgan v. Morgan, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 315, 21 S. W. 154, in which it was held that after an illegal contract made by a man and a woman to live together without marriage had been fully executed, and property had been acquired for the community, the courts would recog-commission. Thereafter plaintiff collected $481 on another deal and defendant $453. Thereafter defendant had what has been called the "Morton and Bosserman Bros. deal," in which defendant, with the consent of both vendor and purchaser, represented both parties, collected $400 from one party and $200 from the other. In connection with this deal, plaintiff having nothing actively to do with it, defendant entered into an office book kept for that purpose an account of his expenses, amounting to $35.15, and upon the same book plaintiff entered some of his office expenses after July 1st. Thereafter defendant had another deal, known as the second "Morton-Bosserman deal." This last was about the middle of August, 1907. There is some doubt about this deal, but, as we understand it, defendant received $300 from one of the parties as commission. Thereafter there was a third and final deal, known as the "Shenandoah light plant transaction." This fell through, as we understand it; but defendant was paid $250 for his services in connection therewith. After July plaintiff was not in the office a great deal, for the reason that he was then engaged in building a house for himself, and he did nothing much for the partnership; and, while he claims one half the commission earned after July 1st, he has never been very insistent upon anything more than his share of the $600 earned on the first Morton-Bosserman Bros. deal.

Defendant denies that he ever entered nize their respective interests in the property.

So, in McDonald v. Lund, supra, it was held that an action for money had and received might be maintained by one partner in a gambling firm against another, where the partnership no longer existed, and the determination of the money due to the plaintiff from the defendant had been reached.

The case of Brooks v. Martin, 2 Wall. 70, 17 L. ed. 732, is frequently cited as an authority for this proposition, and the language of the court would seem to uphold it, but it has been frequently distinguished upon the ground that not only had the transaction been completed, but there had been other investments of the money, and an accounting on the subsequent express promises could be had without in any way bringing into the case the illegal transaction. Under the facts of the case, the decision need not necessarily be referred to the exception to the general rule here discussed, and the bearing of this much-cited case upon the subject will be more fully discussed later.

Exception as to completed transaction repudiated, or limited.

In a number of decisions, however, this doctrine as to an implied promise where the transaction has been completed has been expressly repudiated; and it has been held that a partner is not entitled to an accounting of the affairs of an illegal partnership or of illegal transactions by showing merely that the partnership or transaction has been concluded, and the profits arising therefrom are in the hands of another partner, thus asserting the general rule set out above.

McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 43 L. ed. 1117, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 839; Central Trust & S. D. Co. v. Respass, 112 Ky. 606, 56 L.R.A. 479, 99 Am. St. Rep. 317, 66 S. W. 421; Snell v. Dwight, 120 Mass. 9; Dunham v. Presby, 120 Mass. 285; Morrison v. Bennett, 20 Mont. 560, 40 L.R.A. 158, 52 Pac. 553; Todd v. Rafferty, 30 N. J. Eq. 254; Watson v. Murray, 23 N. J. Eq. 257; Sykes v. Beadon, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 170. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Some of these decisions go to great length in explaining and distinguishing, or rather, in attempting to distinguish, Brooks v. Martin and Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, supra. But apparently these cases went further than the other courts are willing to go, and, being of such high authority, they cannot be ignored or overruled. The effect of the decisions is limited, however, in numerous cases, and even by a later decision in the same court.

Thus in McMullen v. Hoffman, supra, it was held that if a court distributed the profits of an illegal contract or partnership between the members thereof, it practically enforced the illegal contract, and this the court refused to do; and the court held that the doctrine of Brooks v. Martin and Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, supra, should not be extended beyond the facts presented in those cases, and it did not apply where the action was between the original parties, and there was no collateral contract, and no new consideration, and no liability of a third party.

And in Central Trust & S. D. Co. v. Respass, supra, it was held that the decided weight of authority is that a court of equity will not entertain a bill for an accounting of a partnership in a business confessedly illegal, notwithstanding the fact that the partnership has terminated, whatever may be the doctrine where there has been a new contract in relation to, or a new investment of the profits of, such illegal business, or whatever may be the doctrine as to the rights and liabilities of a third person who assumes obligations with respect to such profits.

So, in Snell v. Dwight, supra, it was held that a bill for an accounting of the profits of an illegal venture was founded upon the contract itself, and would not be sustained, although the contract had been carried out. To the same effect was the decision in Dunham v. Presby, supra.

So, in Morrison v. Bennett, supra, it was held that men who associate themselves for the purpose of cheating cannot ask the courts to distribute their booty by adjudging the demands of one against the other, into a partnership with plaintiff, although he admits the sharing of expenses and the division of commission while the parties were engaged in business both at Russell and at Osceola down to July 1, 1907. He says that there was a pool between them as to business where they represented both parties, which, under the circumstances, would clearly amount to a partnership as to these transactions, and that there was to be and in fact was no division of commissions where but one side was represented in the office. The testimony negates this thought, however, for defendant did, prior to July 1st, divide a commission which he in fact earned representing but one side of the transaction. Moreover, in the first Morton-Bosserman deal, in which defendant, with consent of the interested parties, represented both sides, defendant entered upon an expense book kept for that purpose his traveling and other expenses connected with that deal and some other expenses incurred prior thereto on another deal. The matter cannot be explained upon any other theory than that of partnership. Defendant's oral explanation thereof is not satisfactory. Each party has some corroborating testimony; plaintiff producing witnesses who testified to admissions of defendant that plaintiff was his partner, and defendant some who testified to admissions of plaintiff that he was not in partnership with defendant. There is also some testimony as to the acts and conduct of each party which it is claimed tends to support arising out of their quarrels over the plunder; and the court followed the Snell Case, in holding that the doctrine of Brooks v. Martin does not apply, although the transaction is complete, where the action is merely one to divide the profits of the illegal contract, and there are no subsequent or collateral contracts and transactions.

And in Watson v. Murray, supra, it was held that a bill for the accounting of the profits of a firm engaged in the business of lottery would not be sustained. In speaking of McBlair v. Gibbes, 17 How. 232, 15 L. ed. 132, infra, and Brooks v. Martin, supra, the court said: "The distinction between enforcing the execution of an agreement to do an illegal act, and the distribution of the realized profits of the act, made use of in those cases to do justice between the parties, is obviously not to be regarded as one of universal or general application. It would seem needless to say that it cannot be invoked to apportion among criminals the gains resulting from their crimes. No case has been referred to, and none, I am sure, can be found, where the illegal act has been also a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for the protection of the public safety and morals."

And in Todd v. Rafferty, supra, the doctrine of Watson v. Murray was applied where the profits were made by one of the partners fraudulently acting for both vendor and purchaser in certain transactions.

So, in King v. Winants, 71 N. C. 469, 17 Am. Rep. 11, it was held that the court would not help partners in a scheme to defraud the government by not bidding against each other on a public contract, by dividing the profits of their illegal transaction. The court distinguished Brooks v. Martin, supra, upon the ground that, in that case, the court could determine the rights of the parties without reference to the illegal transactions, but, in the case at bar, the court said, "we must hear the proof that, if the plaintiff would not bid against the defendant, as he had intended to do, so as to enable the defendant to get 70 cents a day instead of 40, which he was getting to feed and nurse the sick, then the defendant would 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

give the plaintiff half the profits. And then we are asked to compel the defendant to perform that promise." This decision was affirmed when the case came before the court again upon a petition for rehearing in 73 N. C. 563.

And in Sykes v. Beadon, supra, it was held that it is no part of a court of justice to aid either in carrying out any illegal contract, or in dividing the proceeds arising from an illegal contract between the parties to that contract; and, in the opinion of the court, no action can be maintained for the one purpose more than for the other.

Exception as to an express promise or re-investment.

Another exception to the general rule that courts will not grant relief in respect of illegal transactions is recognized by numerous courts of high authority, which have held that where there is a new express promise, as when the profits from an illegal partnership have been reinvested in a legal business, it is no defense to an action for an accounting by one partner that the source of the profits so invested was illegal. Brooks v. Martin, 2 Wall. 70, 17 L. ed. 732; Lea v. Cassen, 61 Ala. 315; Lestapies v. Ingraham, 5 Pa. 71; Bogges v. Lilly, 18 Tex. 200; De Leon v. Trevino, 49 Tex. 88, 30 Am. Rep. 101; Floyd v. Patterson, 72 Tex. 202, 13 Am. St. Rep. 787, 10 S. W. 526; Wells v. McGeoch, 71 Wis. 196, 35 N. W. 769.

The leading case of this character is Brooks v. Martin, supra, in which it was held that where soldiers' claims for land warrants, which had been illegally purchased by a partnership with money advanced by one partner for that purpose, had been converted into warrants, and the warrants had been sold or located, and there remained in the hands of the other partner lands, money, notes, and mortgages, the results of such illegal partnership business, a bill by the partner furnishing the fund against the other, for an accounting and a division of the proceeds, would be sustained. The reason for the decision is given by the court as follows: "When the bill in the the contention of each. As to these matters we may say that, although defendant argues an estoppel on plaintiff, due to his admissions to third parties, the case lacks one of the essential elements of such an estoppel; that is to say, there is no showing that defendant knew of these declarations, or that he acted thereon to his prejudice. So that the element of estoppel is out of the case. We are constrained to hold that there was a partnership between these parties substantially as claimed by plaintiff. No other conclusion is consistent with the acts and conduct of the parties. We are also constrained to hold that plaintiff practically abandoned the partnership about August 1st, and when he asked for a settlement with defendant he made no claim, as we understand it, to anything more than his share of the first Morton-Bosserman deal.

Our first inquiry of law is, then, assuming that such a partnership is established, was it so inimical to public policy that plaintiff should be denied relief? It will be observed that no commission is now in controversy where these parties represented both sides of the transaction out of which it grew. The defendant represented both parties of the Morton-Bosserman deal, but this was with consent of each party to the transaction, and, in such circumstances, the commission was properly earned and became a legitimate asset of the firm, if there was a partnership. The two subsequent commissions were as free from taint as this first one. So that we may assume for the pur-present case was filed, all the claims of soldiers, thus illegally purchased by the partnership with money advanced by complainant, had been converted into land warrants, and all the warrants had been sold or located. The original defect in the purchase had, in many cases, been cured by the assignment of the warrant by the soldier after its issue. A large proportion of the lands so located had also been sold, and the money paid for some of it and notes and mortgages given for the remainder. There were then in the hands of defendant lands, money, notes, and mortgages, the results of the partnership business, the original capital for which plaintiff had advanced. It is to have an account of these funds and a division of these proceeds that this bill is filed. Does it lie in the mouth of the partner who has, by fraudulent means, obtained possession and control of all these funds, to refuse to do equity to his other partners, because of the wrong originally done or intended to the soldier? It is difficult to perceive how the statute, enacted for the benefit of the soldier, is to be rendered any more effective by leaving all this in the hands of Brooks, instead of requiring him to execute justice as between himself and his partner, or what rule of public morals will be weakened by compelling him to do so. The title to the lands is not rendered void by the statute. It interposes no obstacle to the collection of the notes and mortgages. The transactions which were illegal have become accomplished facts, and cannot be affected by any action of the court in this case."

It will be noted that the court suggests as one reason why the action would be sustained that the transactions had become established facts and could not in any way be affected by the action of the court. As was suggested, this decision has been followed upon this point by numerous cases, but it should be noted that, as shown above, many courts have refused to follow the decision upon this ground, and distinguish it upon the fact that there had been a re-investment of the funds, so that the rights of the parties could be determined without any reference to the illegal transactions.

The same principle is applied in Lea v. Cassen, 61 Ala. 316, where it was held that the voluntary rescission of an illegal contract, which is an attempt to place the parties in statu quo, is a new and independent agreement, unaffected by the original agreement, and will be enforced by the courts.

Where an illegal contract has been executed by the parties themselves and the illegal object of it has been accomplished, the money or thing which was the price of it may be a legal consideration between the parties for a promise, express or implied, and the court will not unravel the transaction to discover its origin. Lestapies v. Ingraham, supra.

And in Bogges v. Lilly, supra, it was held that an injunction would not issue to enjoin the sale of real estate under a deed of trust given by one partner as security for money advanced by the other to pay his share of a gambling debt owed by the firm. The court said that the loan was a new contract, untainted by the illegality of the claim to settle which the money was advanced. To the same effect were the decisions in Patty v. City Bank, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 484, 41 S. W. 173, and Watson v. Fletcher, 7 Gratt. 1.

So, in De Leon v. Trevino, supra, after referring to Brooks v. Martin, the court said: "Now, surely, if the court will lend its aid to compel an accounting, and enforce the payment of the amount found to be due by one partner to the other, it cannot be that it should interpose to relieve one of the partners from a contract resulting from his voluntary accounting, on the ground of the illegality of the original partnership enterprise, which, after completion, had been thus voluntarily settled and adjusted."

The illegality of a wheat deal wherein a partnership made a large profit will not release one of the partners from making an accounting of the profits of subsequent investments made with such profits. Wells v. McGeoch, supra.

A partner whose firm had, during the occupation of that section of the country by the Confederate army, accumulated a large quantity of Confederate money, was required rule of public morals will be weakened by compelling him to do so? The title to the land is not rendered void by the statute. It interposes no obstacle to the collection of the notes and mortgages. The transactions which were illegal have become accomplished facts, and cannot be affected by any action of the court in this case." We also quote the following from the opinion in Sharp v. Taylor, 2 Phill. Ch. 801: "The answer to the objection appears to me to be this: That the plaintiff does not ask to enforce any agreement adverse to the provision of the act of Parliament. He is not seeking compensation and payment for an illegal voyage. That matter was disposed of when Taylor [the defendant] received the money, and the plaintiff is now only seeking for payment of his share of the realized profit. . . . As between these two, can this supposed evasion of the law be set up as a defense by one against the otherwise clear title of the other? . . . Can one of two partners possess himself of the property of the firm, and be permitted to retain it, if he can show that, in realizing it, some provision of some act of Parliament has been violated or neglected? . . . The answer to this, as to the former case, will be that the transaction alleged to be illegal is completed and closed, and will not be in any manner affected by what the court is asked to do as between the parties." McBlair v. Gibbes, 17 How. 232, 15 L. ed. 132, is also in point, and contains an elaborate review of the authorities. We quote the following from the syllabus in that case: "If the fund be paid for the other party to a third person, the latter cannot set up the illegality of the contract on which the payment has been made, and withhold it for himself, or, if paid to one of the parties, he cannot withhold the share going to his associate." See also Doyle v. Burns, 123 Iowa, 488, 99 N. W. 195; Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 284, 85 Am. Dec. 516; Harvey v. Varney, 98 Mass. 118.

We are impressed with the thought that, defendant having received the money for the partnership, he cannot set up the illegality of the transactions with the landowners as a defense to an action for an accounting; but, however that may be, the transaction now involved—that is, the first Morton-Bosserman deal—is in no sense tainted. This legal transaction may be separated from the illegal, if there were any such, and recovery had thereon. The result of the whole matter is that defendant received $600 on this transaction for which he should account. He paid out $35.15 on account thereof, leaving $564.85, one-half of which is $282.42. Plaintiff confessedly had one-half of $27 more than his share in his possession on prior deals. One half of this is $13.50, which, deducted from the $282.42, leaves $268.92, for which amount plaintiff should have had judgment, with interest from the time of the trial in the court below.

The case will be reversed for a decree in harmony with this opinion, or plaintiff, at his option, exercised within twenty days, may have such a decree here.

gal transactions, if the legal and the illegal were so blended as to make it impossible to separate them.

Accounting at instance of innocent partner.

The fact that the profits were made in illegal transactions is not a defense to an action for an accounting at the instance of a partner who is innocent of any connection with the wrongdoing.

Thus, in Pennington v. Todd, 47 N. J. Eq. 569, 11 L.R.A. 589, 24 Am. St. Rep. 419, 21 Atl. 297, it was held that when an innocent member of a firm established for the conduct of a lawful and moral business calls upon his partner for a share of profits made in partnership transactions, the partner will not be absolved from the duty of dividing, on showing that he realized the profits by cheating the customers of the firm. And this case is cited with approval and followed in Van Tine v. Hilands, 131 Fed. 124. To the same general effect were the decisions in Blalock v. Copeland, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1455, 65 S. W. 349, and Thwaites v. Coulthwaite [1896] 1 Ch. 496.

So, one partner cannot set up the illegality of an act by which a large sum was earned for the firm as a defense to an action by the other partner, who was not implicated in the illegal act. Jones v. Davidson, 2 Sneed, 447.

And in Corralitos Co. v. Mackay, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 316, 72 S. W. 624, it was held that although it was illegal for a corporation to form a partnership with an individual, where an attempt had been made to enter into such a partnership, a court of equity would not permit the value of the services or the property of the individual to be taken from him because the corporation could not legally enter into a partnership.

Where the evidence did not tend to prove that the object or purposes of the partnership or the business in which it was to engage was either illegal or immoral, nor that the peculiar manner in which the business was conducted was at all contemplated in the formation of the partnership, the court said in Shriver v. McCloud, 20 Neb. 474, 30 N. W. 535, that it would not permit a member of the firm to avoid his share of the loss through the consideration of a mere sharp practice used in the manner of prosecuting the business, which he himself devised and suggested.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

MICHAEL MABARDY et al.
v.

PATRICK McHUGH et al.

(202 Mass. 148, 88 N. E. 894.)

Deceit—sale of realty — estimate of quantity.

An action for deceit will not lie against one who, when pointing out the true boundaries of a tract of land he is about to sell, fraudulently overstates its area, there being no trust relation between the parties, if he does not dissuade full examination and measurement, and the estate is not so extensive or of such character as to be reasonably incapable of inspection and estimate.

Case Note.—Is fraudulent representation by vendor as to area within boundaries correctly pointed out actionable.

It is not intended to include herein actions for breach of covenant or warranty as to quantity, or breach of contract to convey a designated quantity of land; nor is it intended to include cases of misrepresentation of quantity not fraudulent, or cases wherein the question considered was the effect of a deficiency in the quantity of land contracted to be conveyed on the right to specific performance. Only cases are included wherein the question was whether or not a fraudulent representation as to the quantity of land conveyed or contracted to be conveyed was actionable, where the boundaries were correctly pointed out. As to the effect of a mistake as to the quantity of land to be conveyed on the right to the specific performance of a contract to convey, see note appended to Rudisill v. Whitener, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 81.

Generally, misrepresentation as to quantity of land, if made in the belief that it is true, is not actionable, where both the vendor and vendee had substantially equal means of knowledge, as where the boundaries were correctly pointed out to the vendee. In such cases, in most jurisdictions, in the absence of a fraudulent intent, the liability of the vendor for such misrepresentations depends upon the application of essentially different principles of law than does his liability for such a misrepresentation where made with the fraudulent intent of deceiving the purchaser, although the boundaries are correctly pointed out. For this reason, the only cases included herein are those wherein the misrepresentation as to quantity was found to be fraudulent.

Most of the cases within the scope of this note are cited in MABARDY v. McHUGH. It is conceded in that case that they enunciate a doctrine contrary to that applied therein.

As a general rule, a fraudulent representation of a material fact relating to the subject-matter of a sale, made to induce, and which does induce, the sale, if relied upon, is actionable. This rule, however, does not apply to fraudulent representations which come within the doctrine of caveat emptor. It has often been sought to bring within the latter doctrine misrepresentations as to the quantity of land contained within correctly designated boundaries. Generally, however, although the boundaries of a tract of land may be correctly designated or pointed out, so that the purchaser knows the land he is getting, yet a false and fraudulent representation as to the amount of land within such boundaries is actionable, if relied upon by the purchaser. He is not expected to judge or estimate the quantity contained within the boundaries pointed out from appearances, and where the vendor states the area as a fact, he may rely thereon without causing a survey or measurement to be made. Such reliance is not negligence which will preclude relief for fraud practised upon him by the vendor in this regard.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiffs to rulings of the Superior Court for Middlesex County, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for deceit in the sale of certain realty, which resulted in a verdict for defendants. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James T. Connolly and John Louis Sheehan, for plaintiffs:

The plaintiffs were justified in relying upon the statements of the defendant, and were not wanting in due diligence in failing to measure land which the defendant himself promised to measure for them, and thus prove to them that his positive statement of the size of the tract was accurate.

tation of a material fact relating to the subject-matter of a sale, made to induce, and which does induce, the sale, if relied upon, is actionable. This rule, however, does not apply to fraudulent representations which come within the doctrine of caveat emptor. Such reliance is not negligence which will preclude relief for fraud practised upon him by the vendor in this regard.

One of the leading cases supporting this doctrine is Starkweather v. Benjamin, 32 Mich. 305, wherein a defense to an action for deceit in misrepresenting the quantity of land conveyed rested mainly on the ground that the purchaser saw the land, and was as able to judge of its size as the vendor. In denying this contention, the court, speaking through Campbell, Judge, said: "We do not think the doctrine that, where both parties have equal means of judging, there is no fraud, applies to such a case. The maxim is equally valid that one who dissuades another from inquiry, and deceives him to his prejudice is responsible. It cannot be generally true that persons can judge of the contents of a parcel of land by the eye. When any approach to accuracy is needed, there must be measurement. When a positive assurance of the area of a parcel of land is made by the vendor to the vendee, with the design of making the vendee believe it, that assurance is very material, and equivalent to an assurance of measurement. In this case, the testimony goes very far, and shows that the assertions and representations, which the jury must have found to be true, were of such a nature that, if believed, as they were, a resurvey must have been an idle ceremony. They were calculated to deceive, and, as the jury have found, they did deceive . . . and he had a clear right of action for the fraud."

Applying this doctrine in Cawston v. Sturgis, 29 Or. 331, 43 Pac. 656, a false representation as to the size of an irregular-shaped lot, claimed to have been based on a survey, was held actionable. The court said: "To turn him [a vendee] out of court under such circumstances because he did not go to the trouble and expense of having the area of the land ascertained by actual measurement, but chose to rely upon defendant's representations, would be offering a premium upon fraud and deceit. Mere knowledge of the boundaries did not charge him with knowledge of its area, so as to relieve the defendant from responsibility for his false and fraudulent representations in reference thereto."

And in Pringle v. Samuel, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 43, 13 Am. Dec. 214, in denying the contention that the maxim Caveat emptor applied to such a state of facts and barred relief, it was said: "We do not remember any case where the maxim quoted has been used by the chancellor in such manner as to compel him to shut his ears against false representations, or to give latitude to a vendor of real estate to state facts untruly, without any responsibility. This maxim will and ought to have more influence in the sale of real estate than that of a chattel. The former, from its nature, is open to a less precarious inspection as to quality, and, from its permanent and inanimate character, cannot hide many defects which may be concealed in a chattel. For instance, misrepresentations of its fertility and productions, or even the validity of its title, may be more easily detected; but to ascertain its quantity requires a greater skill and a larger proportion of science than even in this age is acquired by a majority of men. Almost every rational man may be capable of deciding on the quality of land, while but few can ascertain its quantity with accuracy."

So, in Antle v. Sexton, 137 Ill. 410, 27 N. E. 691, where timber land sold was of peculiar shape and contiguous to other timber land, false representations by the vendor as to acreage were held actionable, although the timber was pointed out to the vendee. The court said that it was manifest that, without a knowledge of the boundaries and an actual measurement, no person could tell the number of acres in the tract. It is not clear just what the court meant by this statement, as it is also stated in the opinion that the land was pointed out to the vendee. The doctrine was enunciated, however, that "where a misrepresentation is made as to a material fact, and such misrepresentation is made knowingly, and for the express purpose of deceiving and defrauding, and the party injured relies upon the statement made, and under circumstances which should induce a reasonably prudent man to so rely, there must be a right of action at law for fraud and deceit. To throw a purchaser out of court in such case, upon the plea he did not avail himself of the means of knowledge open to him, would be offering a premium on fraud, and would be destructive of confidence in business transactions."

And in Estes v. Odom, 91 Ga. 600, 18 S. E. 355, the court said that previous knowledge by the vendee of the boundaries of a tract of land purchased would not hinder recovery for the fraud, if he was deceived by the false representation as to quantity, made wilfully by the vendor, and added: "Knowledge of boundaries need not involve knowledge of acreage or superficial area, and was not, in itself, notice of what the tract contained." The tract involved in this case contained about 33 acres, and was represented to contain about 41 acres.

See, also, Stearns v. Kennedy, 94 Minn. 439, 103 N. W. 212, wherein the court held that the fact that the boundary corners were pointed out to a purchaser of land, and that he went from corner to corner of the land, and knew its boundaries, did not show that, in purchasing, he did not rely upon the Rugg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort sounding in deceit. There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs went upon a certain irregular-shaped tract of land (for false representations inducing the purchase of which this action was brought) with one of the defendants, who pointed out the true boundaries and fraudulently stated that the tract contained 65 acres, when in fact it contained 40 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres. Upon this aspect of the evidence, the trial court in-representations of the vendor as to the area. The court said that such an investigation did not offer the purchaser the means of readily ascertaining how many acres there were in the tract, for although he knew the corners and boundaries thereof, he could only ascertain the number of acres therein by a survey, which he was not bound to make.

This doctrine was also applied in Eichelberger v. Mills Land & Water Co. 9 Cal. App. 628, 100 Pac. 117, as to a fraudulent representation of the area of a lot, although the boundaries were correctly pointed out. This lot was a small lot about 1,400 ft. by 170 ft., and it was represented to be about 1,400 ft. by 270 ft.

And see for application of doctrine Boggs v. Bush (Ky.) 122 S. W. 220.

The doctrine was also recognized in McCandless v. Young, 96 Pa. 89, wherein relief was denied a purchaser under circumstances very similar to those herein, on the ground that he had failed to allege and prove scienter.

So, in Boddy v. Henry, 113 Iowa, 462, 53 L.R.A. 769, 85 N. W. 771, and again before the court in 126 Iowa, 31, 101 N. W. 447, a vendor was held liable in an action of deceit for false representations knowingly made as to the area of a large tract of land, although the vendee was upon the land, and the boundaries thereof were correctly pointed out to him. In this case the size of the tract apparently influenced the decision, as the court said it was manifestly impracticable for any person, however experienced, to ride over or around a body of 25 or more square miles of land, surveyed in irregular tracts, and estimate with any reasonable degree of exactness the number of acres therein, and added that it was well settled that a buyer who examined land before purchasing might nevertheless rely upon the representations of the seller as to measurements.

As shown in MABARDY v. McHUGH, the doctrine formerly held in Missouri was very similar to that of Massachusetts; but, in Judd v. Walker, 215 Mo. 312, 114 S. W. 979, the court, referring to this doctrine, said it was too harsh as a general proposition, and added: "Of course, if the vendor and structed the jury that "if the plaintiffs . . . were taken over the farm by the defendants, . . . or [and] were shown the bounds so that the plaintiffs knew where the farm was and what was comprised within the bounds, it would not be of any consequence that representations may have been made by the defendant in relation to the acreage." The evidence being conflicting as to whether the boundaries were shown, the jury were further instructed that, if the defendant who talked with the plaintiffs "knew that there were not 65 or nearly 65, acres, or if he didn't know anything about it, and stated it as a fact within his personal knowledge, then it would be a false representation for which he would be liable, vendee have equal opportunities to know the acreage, and no false representations are made and acted on, the rule is well enough. But, if the rule be construed to mean that a vendee must survey the land and measure it, no difference as to the size of the tract, or whether its boundaries are irregular or not, and cannot rely on the positive assurance of the vendor as to his knowledge of the number of acres in his own land, then we do not agree to it as good doctrine. Such defect as a deficiency in acreage is not a patent defect, to be got at by the use of natural faculties and the exercise of ordinary diligence in a land sale. Due diligence does not require that the vendee should suspect the vendor of lying, nor that the vendee should survey and measure the land to prevent being deceived by the lies of the vendor. It has sometimes been loosely said that the negligence of the vendee will prevent recovery for the fraud of the vendor. The word 'negligence,' used in that connection, as we understand its meaning in the law of negligence, is an unhappy expression. Fraud is a wilful, malevolent act, directed to perpetrating a wrong to the rights of another. That such an act in a vendor should not be actionable because of the mere negligence or inadvertence of the vendee in preventing the fraud ought to be neither good ethics nor good law."

The Massachusetts doctrine also found support in Credle v. Swindell, 63 N. C. 305, which held that a vendor who fraudulently represented a tract of land included in designated boundaries to contain 420 acres, when in fact there was only 210 acres, was not liable to the vendee in deceit for such misrepresentation, since whatever loss the vendee had sustained was attributable to his own negligence and indiscretion. The court said: "He has not exercised that diligence which the law expects of a reasonable and careful person, but was wilfully ignorant of that which he ought to have known. He might have ascertained the fact by an actual survey, or taken a covenant as to quantity. Vigilantibus jura subveniunt." This case was, however, disapproved in Walsh v. Hall, 66 N. C. 233, and also in May v. Loomis, 140 provided" the other elements essential to a recovery were found to exist.

The correctness of the first of these instructions is challenged. It is in exact accordance with the law as laid down in Gordon v. Parmelee, 2 Allen, 212, and Mooney v. Miller, 102 Mass. 217. The facts in the case at bar are similar in all material respects to these cases. An attempt is made to distinguish them on the ground that the present plaintiffs were Syrians, ignorant of our language, and that hence a trust relation existed between them and the defendant. But, whatever else may be said of this contention, it fails because they were accompanied by two of their own countrymen, who were thoroughly familiar with our language, and acted as interpreters for them. In effect, the contention of the plaintiffs amounts to a request to overrule these two cases. They have been cited with approval in Roberts v. French, 153 Mass. 60, 10 L.R.A. 656, 25 Am. St. Rep. 611, 26 N. E. 416, and as supporting authorities, without criticism, in other opinions. The court, however, has refused to apply the rule of those decisions to other facts closely analogous. See Lewis v. Jewell, 151 Mass. 345, 21 Am. St. Rep. 454, 24 N. E. 52; Holst v. Stewart, 161 Mass. 516, 42 Am. St. Rep. 442, 37 N.

N. C. 350, 52 S. E. 728, wherein the doctrine of that case was said to be contrary to the trend of modern decisions, and it was said that it had been expressly disapproved as to this point in Walsh v. Hall, supra, and had since been ignored as authority.

The rule of Tennessee was stated in Rich v. Scales, 116 Tenn. 57, 91 S. W. 50, as follows: "Where land is sold by the acre, it is a matter of course to grant relief for either an excess or a deficiency; and, in determining whether the sale was by the acre, the deed will not control, but the parties may go behind it, and prove the contract of which the deed was intended by the parties as an expression. Where the sale is in gross, the rule is that no compensation will be granted for either an excess or a deficiency; but this is subject to the following exceptions: If the deed recite the number of acres, and it subsequently turn out upon survey, or be otherwise accurately ascertained, that there is an excess or deficiency over or under the acreage stated, so great as to justify an inference of fraud, or of a mistake equivalent in its effect to fraud, relief will be granted. If, however, the vendee has inspected the land, and has obtained the very tract he intended to buy, and all the vendor intended to sell, he can have no relief, although the deed purport to state the number of acres, unless the difference between the number stated and the actual number of acres contained be so great as to shock the conscience of the court. Relief will then be granted on the ground of fraud."

The English doctrine, as stated in Joliffe v. Baker, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 255, is that, after the purchaser has taken a conveyance and the purchase money has been paid, no action can be maintained, either at law or in equity, for damages or compensation on account of errors as to the quantity of land sold, unless the misrepresentation amounts to a breach of some contract or warranty contained in the conveyance itself, or unless some fraud and deceit have been practised upon the purchaser. A representation as to quantity of land inclosed within boundaries correctly pointed out, made by the vendor in good faith, and without any intention to deceive, was held not fraudulent within this rule.

It has also been held that a purchaser is not entitled to compensation for a deficiency in the quantity of land actually received or conveyed over its represented area, where he was well acquainted with the land he was buying. Corbett v. Locke-King, 16 Times L. R. 379. In this case, like the preceding one, there was no evidence of fraud, aside from the bare fact of misrepresentation.

Mooney v. Miller, 102 Mass. 217, Gordon v. Parmelee, 2 Allen, 212, and Medbury v. Watson, 6 Met. 248, 39 Am. Dec. 726, apply the doctrine of caveat emptor, without restriction or limitation, to false representations by a vendor as to quantity of land conveyed, where the boundaries are correctly pointed out. But, in Roberts v. French, 153 Mass. 60, 10 L.R.A. 656, 25 Am. St. Rep. 611, 26 N. E. 416, the court said that, notwithstanding the purchaser's knowledge of how the land looked, the jury might have found that the statement as to the length of one of the boundary lines deceived him and induced him to buy, and that it materially varied from the truth, and added: "It is true that the agreement was to buy a lot with known boundaries, and very likely, in the absence of fraud, the rule would apply that monuments govern distances." But this, the court said, was only a rule of construction; "it does not mean that measurements are not material, or that a man who knows the monuments cannot be deceived about them." In referring to Gordon v. Parmelee and Mooney v. Miller, the court said: "We do not mean to question these decisions in the slightest degree, but it is obvious that there must be a limit beyond which fraudulent representations cannot be made with impunity. . . . When a man conveys 'the notion of actual admeasurement,' . . . still more when he says that he has measured a line himself, and has found it so long, his statement has a stronger tendency to induce the buyer to refrain from further inquiry . . . than a statement of the contents of a lot, without giving grounds for the estimate. If false, it is a grosser falsehood. It purports on its face to exclude the suggestion that it is a mere estimate, which the other leaves open."

E. 755; Whiting v. Price, 172 Mass. 240, 70 Am. St. Rep. 262, 51 N. E. 1084; Kilgore v. Bruce, 166 Mass. 136, 44 N. E. 108. This court, in recent years, by pointed language and by conclusions reached, has indicated a plain disposition not to extend legal immunity for the falsehood of vendors in the course of negotiations for sales beyond the bounds already established. Dawe v. Morris, 149 Mass. 188-192, 4 L.R.A. 158, 14 Am. St. Rep. 404, 21 N. E. 313; Way v. Ryther, 165 Mass. 226, 42 N. E. 1128; Kilgore v. Bruce, supra; Andrews v. Jackson, 168 Mass. 266-268, 37 L.R.A. 402, 60 Am. St. Rep. 390, 47 N. E. 412; Whiting v. Price, 172 Mass. 240, 70 Am. St. Rep. 262, 51 N. E. 1084; Boles v. Merrill, 173 Mass. 491, 73 Am. St. Rep. 308, 53 N. E. 894; Arnold v. Teel, 182 Mass. 1-4, 64 N. E. 413; Adams v. Collins, 196 Mass. 422, 82 N. E. 498; Long v. Athol, 196 Mass. 497-504, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 96, 82 N. E. 665; Gurney v. Tenney, 197 Mass. 457, 84 N. E. 428; Lyons Burial Vault Co. v. Taylor, 198 Mass. 63, 84 N. E. 320; Rollins v. Quimby, 200 Mass. 162, 86 N. E. 350.

This judicial attitude perhaps reflects an increasingly pervasive moral sense in some of the common transactions of trade. While the science of jurisprudence is not, and under present conditions cannot be, coextensive with the domain of morality, nor generally undertake to differentiate between motives which mark acts as good or bad, yet it is true, as was said by Mr. Justice Brett, in Robinson v. Mollett, L. R. 7 H. L. 802, 817, that "the courts have applied to the mercantile business brought before them what have been called legal principles, which have almost always been the fundamental ethical rules of right and wrong." This is only a concrete expression of the broader generalization that law is the manifestation of the conscience of the commonwealth.

In many other jurisdictions the rule of Gordon v. Parmelee and Mooney v. Miller has not been followed, and false representations as to area of land, even though true boundaries were pointed out, have been held actionable. McGhee v. Bell, 170 Mo. 121, 135, 150, 59 L.R.A. 761, 70 S. W. 493; May v. Loomis, 140 N. C. 350, 52 S. E. 728; Boddy v. Henry, 113 Iowa, 462-465, 53 L.R.A. 769, 85 N. W. 771; Boddy v. Henry, 126 Iowa, 31, 101 N. W. 447; Antle v. Sexton, 137 Ill. 410, 27 N. E. 691; Estes v. Odom, 91 Ga. 600-609, 18 S. E. 355; Lovejoy v. Isbell, 73 Conn. 368-375, 47 Atl. 682; Cawston v. Kinnard, 10 Tex. 508, 60 Am. Dec. 216; Speed v. Hollingsworth, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.)

54 Kan. 436, 38 Pac. 496. See also Fairchild v. McMahon, 139 N. Y. 290, 36 Am. St. Rep. 701, 34 N. E. 779; Schumaker v. Mather, 133 N. Y. 590, 30 N. E. 755.

Other cases, apparently opposed to the Massachusetts rule, on examination prove to go no further than to decide that misrepresentations as to area, when there is no evidence that boundaries were shown, constitute deceit. Griswold v. Gebbie, 126 Pa. 353, 12 Am. St. Rep. 878, 17 Atl. 673; Cabot v. Christie, 42 Vt. 121, 1 Am. Rep. 313; Coon v. Atwell, 46 N. H. 510; Ledbetter v. Davis, 121 Ind. 119, 22 N. E. 744; Perkins Mfg. Co. v. Williams, 98 Ga. 388, 25 S. E. 556; Sears v. Stinson, 3 Wash. 615, 29 Pac. 205; Hill v. Brower, 76 N. C. 124; Stearns v. Kennedy, 94 Minn. 439, 103 N. W. 212. This is the substance of the latter part of the instruction given in the superior court, and is the law of this commonwealth.

The rule of Mooney v. Miller seemingly has been approved or followed in Lynch v. Mercantile Trust Co. (C. C.) 5 McCrary, 623, 18 Fed. 486; Crown v. Carriger, 66 Ala. 590, and Mires v. Summerville, 85 Mo. App. 183, although the last case has been overruled in Judd v. Walker, 114 Mo. App. 128-135, 89 S. W. 558. If the point was now presented for the first time, it is possible that we might be convinced by the argument of the plaintiffs and the great weight of persuasive authority in its support, especially in view of Lewis v. Jewell, supra. But there is something to be said in support of the two earlier decisions now questioned. A purchase and a sale of real estate is a transaction of importance, and cannot be treated as entered into lightly. People must use their own faculties for their protection and information, and cannot assume that the law will relieve them from the natural effects of their heedlessness, or take better care of their interests than they themselves do. Thrift, foresight, and self-reliance would be undermined if it were the policy of the law to attempt to afford relief for mere want of sagacity. It is an ancient and widely, if not universally, accepted principle of the law of deceit that, where representations are made respecting a subject as to which the complaining party has at hand reasonably available means for ascertaining the truth and the matter is open to inspection, if, without being fraudulently diverted therefrom, he does not take advantage of this opportunity, he cannot be heard to impeach the transaction on the ground of the falsehoods of the other party. Salem India Rubber Co. v. Adams, 23 Pick. 256-265; Slaughter v. Gerson, 13 Wall. 383, 20 L. ed. 628; Long v. Warren, 68 N. Y. 426-432; Baily v. Merrell, 3 Bulst. 94. This rule, in its general statement, applies to such a case do, was still mining thereon; and, after charging irreparable injury and damages and inadequate legal remedies, prayed for an injunction as aforesaid. By the answer the defendant pleaded: (1) That plaintiff was a foreign corporation, and had not complied with the laws of this state by filing with the secretary of state a copy of its charter or certificate of incorporation, and had no license to transact business in this state, and had no right to commence or maintain a suit such as this, or any other, in the courts of this state. (2) Defendant admitted its corporate capacity, admitted that it was in possession of that part of the premises described in plaintiff's petition, specifically describing the same by metes and bounds, admitted that it was mining on the same at the commencement of this suit, admitted that it had been so engaged long prior to the filing of the suit, and purposed to continue said mining, but denied all other matters not specifically admitted. (3) Defendant further pleaded that it was mining on such disputed tract by virtue of an agreement with plaintiff, which agreement is described in detail, as well as defendant's conduct thereunder, and this portion of the answer concludes by a plea of estoppel. (4) Defendant avers that the petition does not state facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to injunctive relief. Reply was a general denial.

At the trial evidence was heard subject to objections, and at the close of the plaintiff's case the court sustained a demurrer to the testimony. Over the objection of the defendant, the plaintiff put in the following documentary evidence: (1) Certificate and license issued to plaintiff by the secretary of state of Missouri, of date January 25, 1906; (2) mining license from Granby Mining & Smelting Company, of date March 1, 1899, to Rafael Estrada, and covering the land in dispute; (3) written transfer of the above-named mining license or lease from Rafael Estrada to W. W. Lowe, trustee, of date May 31, 1904; (4) written transfer of the first-named license, of date October 14, 1904. By oral proof it was shown: That in March, 1906, the plaintiff got a new license or lease from the Granby Mining & Smelting Company; that plaintiff had been mining on the property covered by the Estrada lease since 1902; that W. W. Lowe was trustee for the plaintiff in the instrument made to him and described above, that plaintiff notified defendant to cease mining on the disputed tract, which was done for about three weeks; that then mining was resumed and continued until the granting of the injunction; that the ore was 6 per cent ore, and valuable; that defendant purposed further operations on this land unless restrained by injunction. Such are the facts of the case. Counsel seem to agree that the court, nisi, dismissed plaintiff's bill on the theory that it had no license to transact any business in this state prior to January 25, 1906, and therefore could not maintain this suit; but, whatever may have been the views below, we have detailed an outline of the facts, and can, as we have the right, proceed to determine the merits. Contentions of counsel both pro and con will be noted in the course of the opinion, so far as may be required.

1. There are two questions presented by this record: (1) Can plaintiff, a foreign corporation, without license to do business in this state, but having actually been resident in the state, and transacting its charter business therein for some years, be permitted to bring an action in our courts, and, after having so brought the action, be permitted to maintain and prosecute it, by taking out the required license before trial? And (2) if it can thus give itself a status or standing in our courts, can it further enforce contracts which it has made and which are to be fully performed in this state? Of these questions in their order.

We are inclined to think that both contentions must be answered in the negative: but they are so closely related that a discussion of the one necessarily involves the discussion of the other. That a foreign corporation can sue in Missouri on contracts made outside of Missouri, or made by salesmen traveling for them in Missouri, can sue in the courts of the state without license from the secretary of state, is unquestioned; but the question here is: Can a foreign corporation come into this state, open up a place of business, and actually do a part of the business authorized by its charter in violation of our law, and, without taking out a license, and otherwise complying with our statutes, have the doors of our courts open to them, to protect the unlawful business? We think not. If the petitioner in such case disclosed the facts aforesaid, it would be demurrable. Whilst we have held that the plaintiff in such cases does not have to plead that it has a license to do business, and that the failure so to plead does not make the petition demurrable (United Shoe Machinery Co. v. Ramlose, 210 Mo. loc. cit. 649, 109 S. W. 567), yet there can be no question that if it appeared upon the face of the petition that the plaintiff, a foreign corporation, had established a place of business in the state, and had actually been doing business in the state, without a license, such a petition would be demurrable, because of the fact that it would disclose that the party plaintiff had no right to sue. Now, advancing a step, if the party was incapacitated to sue at the institution of the suit, can such party cure such incapacity by taking out a license thereafter and before trial. We think not. There is diversity of opinion among the courts. Vide note to case of National Fertilizer Co. v. Fall River Five Cents Sav. Bank, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 561 et seq. The annotator, in discussing the right to maintain a suit before license is issued, but in which license was procured before trial, says: "Of course, in those jurisdictions in which it is held that any contract entered into by a foreign corporation before complying with the requirements of the local statute is void, the particular question presented in the foregoing case could not arise; for, if the contract is void from the beginning, subsequent compliance with the requirements of the statute, either before or after bringing suit, would not remedy the defect. In those jurisdictions, however, which hold that such contracts are not invalid, but merely unenforceable by the corporation before its compliance with the statutory requirements, there is much difference of opinion as to the effect of a compliance after the commencement of the suit, but before judgment."

In this state we hold, as we shall show in a subsequent paragraph, that the unlawful contract cannot be validated by taking out a license after the making of the contract. Hence our state falls within that class of jurisdictions mentioned in the first paragraph of the quotation, supra. For that reason we suggested in the beginning that the two questions were much intertwined in the case at bar. We are not unaware that in Carson-Rand Co. v. Stern, 129 Mo. 381, 32 L.R.A. 420, 31 S. W. 772, this court held that where a foreign corporation had filed an attachment suit prior to taking out license, and, between the time of bringing the suit and a motion to dismiss the case, for the reason that it had not taken out license, it did comply with our law, and take out the license, that it could maintain said suit, and the judgment of our Brother Valliant then in the court, nisi, was reversed; but, as pointed out by Goode, J., in the recent case of Handlan-Buck Mfg. Co. v. Wendelkin Constr. Co. 124 Mo. App. loc. cit. 362, 101 S. W. 702, the Carson-Rand Case has in effect been overruled in the case of Tri-State Amusement Co. v. Forest Park Highlands Amusement Co. 192 Mo. 404, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 688, 111 Am. St. Rep. 511, 90 S. W. 1020, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 808. We did not expressly overrule it, but when, upon examination of the record in that case, it is seen that, by an agreed statement of facts, upon which the motion to dismiss was submitted, as Judge Goode, in the case, supra, says, "contained, among other things, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.)

the agreement that plaintiff had for a long time conducted a lumber yard in St. Louis, that the notes in suit were made and executed in the city of St. Louis, were payable in St. Louis, and that the sales of lumber for which the notes were given were made in St. Louis," then it is apparent that it has been in effect fully overruled by not only the case in 192 Mo. 404, supra, but in all subsequent decisions. The effect of Judge Barclay's decision was to hold that the subsequent taking out of the license validated the notes sued on in that case, and he, accordingly, reversed and remanded the case "for further proceedings."

Not only have our courts discredited the doctrine of the Carson-Rand Case, but in Minnesota, wherein they have practically the same statute as ours, the court refused to follow that case. The Minnesota court, in G. Heileman Brewing Co. v. Peimeisl, 85 Minn. loc. cit. 124, 88 N. W. 442, says: "Counsel for the plaintiff practically concede that by virtue of this provision it could not maintain any action in our courts upon such a demand until it complied with the statute, but claim that the statute does not prohibit the commencement of the action, and that the plaintiff may, after its noncompliance has been pleaded as a defense, comply with the statute and maintain the action. The case of Carson-Rand Co. v. Stern, supra, is cited in support of this contention. The case is in point, for the statute there under consideration was similar to our own; but we cannot accept this construction of the statute, for a prohibition against maintaining an action implies a prohibition against beginning it, for the beginning of the action is one of the necessary steps in maintaining it. More than that, the construction of the statute urged on behalf of the plaintiff would invite and foster the very evil it was intended to prevent. It would enable foreign corporations to do business in this state in defiance of our laws until some party, perchance, pleaded its noncompliance in an action brought by it to enforce a demand against him. Then it would comply, and the action would proceed. Such a construction is contrary to the letter and spirit of the statute, and, if adopted by the court, would directly tend to defeat the public policy sought to be enforced by its enactment. The most efficient way to compel obedience to this statute is to enforce it as it reads, and not amend it by judicial construction so as to enable foreign corporations to avoid the consequences of a noncompliance with its terms by complying after the penalties have been incurred. We therefore hold that a foreign corporation doing business in this state without first complying with the statute cannot maintain an action in the courts of this state upon any contract or demand growing out of such business. Nor will compliance by it with the statute after the making of such a contract, or after the commencement of an action thereon, remove the bar of the statute. This conclusion is supported by the decisions of the courts of other states having a similar statute. J. Walter Thompson Co. v. Whitehead, 185 Ill. 454, 76 Am. St. Rep. 51, 56 N. E. 1106; Cary-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Thomas, 92 Tenn. 587, 22 S. W. 743; Ehrhardt v. Robertson Bros. 78 Mo. App. 404."

In Halsey v. Henry Jewett Dramatic Co. 114 App. Div. 424, 99 N. Y. Supp. loc. cit. 1124, the court says: "The language of § 181 of the tax law [Laws 1896, chap. 908, p. 856] is that every foreign corporation not excepted, authorized to do business under the general corporation law, shall pay a license fee within the time prescribed, or else it shall not maintain any action in the courts of the state. The answers demurred to allege that this fee had not been paid when the action was commenced, and, if that be true, then the action cannot be maintained. The fact that the fee was paid after the action was commenced does not change the situation. The plaintiff had no right to bring the action, and, having brought it without right, he cannot, notwithstanding the payment of the fee thereafter made, continue and maintain an action which he, in the first instance, had no right to bring."

We quite agree with the Minnesota court; in that the beginning of a suit is but one step in maintaining it. The construction of the word "maintain," as given in the Carson-Rand Case, is too narrow when we consider the purpose of the statute wherein it is used, i. e., Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1026 (Anno. Stat. 1906, p. 890). The plaintiff in the case, being incapacitated to sue in the first place, did not so change its status by taking out the license as to be permitted to further prosecute a suit brought in defiance of the statute. These statutes, §§ 1025 and 1026, Rev. Stat. 1899 (Anno. Stat. 1906, pp. 888, 890), have been so often quoted in the cases hereinafter cited that a reproduction here would be superfluous.

2. But going to the contract which is the basis of plaintiff's right to maintain this suit, i. e., the license or lease which, by mesne assignments from Estrada, came to plaintiff, how stands the plaintiff? It is only by this instrument that plaintiff has any standing in court. This is a Missouri contract, assigned in Missouri to a foreign corporation. This assignment to Lowe, trustee, was but an assignment to the corporation, under the undisputed evidence. The plaintiff was in Missouri actually transacting its business in 1902, nearly two years before the assignment of the contract or license. The contract was to be wholly performed in Missouri, and the plaintiff was working its mines under this contract, and had been for months prior to this suit. All this it did in open violation of our statutes. When it assented to this assignment, it undertook to make and perform a Missouri contract relative to the business it was authorized by its charter to do in its native state. It established its business in Missouri, with a superintendent in charge, all in violation of law. It was here in open violation of law before it made this contract, and so continued thereafter. Under such circumstances its contract is absolutely void, and no act of it thereafter by taking out license and otherwise complying with our statutes can validate it. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 1026; United Shoe Machinery Co. v. Ramlose, 210 Mo. 631, 109 S. W. 567; Tri-State Amusement Co. v. Forest Park Highlands Amusement Co. supra; Chicago Mill & Lumber Co. v. Sims, 197 Mo. 507, 95 S. W. 344; Roeder v. Robertson, 202 Mo. 522, 100 S. W. 1086; Handlan-Buck Mfg. Co. v. Wendelkin Constr. Co. 124 Mo. App., loc. cit. 262, 101 S. W. 702; First Nat. Bank v. Leeper, 121 Mo. App. 688, 97 S. W. 636; Wilson-Moline Buggy Co. v. Priebe, 123 Mo. App. 521, 100 S. W. 558.

Without a valid contract, the proof failed to show that the plaintiff was entitled to any relief at the hands of a court of equity, nor, for that matter, in a court of law. We conclude that it neither had the right to bring or maintain the suit, nor did it show facts to make a case. Taking out a license after bringing the suit neither validated the theretofore illegal contract, nor did it change the status of the plaintiff at the time of the institution of the suit. Being an outlaw at the beginning of the case, it must so continue throughout.

The judgment nisi is correct, and is affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

T. W. O'BYRNE, Appt.,

v.

JOHN C. HENLEY et al.

(— Ala. —, 50 So. 83.)

Lease — saloon — prohibition law — effect.

A lease of property solely for saloon purposes is not terminated by the taking effect during the term of a prohibitory liquor law, where, by construction of the parties, the right was conferred upon the lessee of selling upon the property nonintoxicating beverages and tobacco, so that the right of the lessee was not totally destroyed.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover the rent of a building accruing after the going into effect of a prohibitory law which was alleged to have terminated the use of the property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Powell & Blackburn for appellant.

Mr. R. B. Smyer, for appellees:

A lease of premises for use as a saloon is not terminated, nor has the lessee the right to terminate it, by reason of a statute prohibiting the sale or disposition of intoxicating liquors, enacted subsequent to the execution of the lease contract.

3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 955, note 6; Miller v. Maguire, 18 R. I. 770, 30 Atl. 966; Houston Ice & Brewing Co. v. Keenan, 99 Tex. 279, 88 S. W. 197; San Antonio Brewing Asso. v. Brents, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 88 S. W. 368; Taylor v. Finnigan, 189 Mass. 568, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973, 76 N. E. 203; Kerley v. Mayer, 10 Misc. 718, 31 N. Y. Supp. 818.

A lessee of premises destroyed during the term of lease by unavoidable accident is not relieved from the payment of rent unless he protects himself by stipulation in the lease, or unless there is a destruction of the entire subject-matter of the lease, so that nothing remains capable of being held or enjoyed.

Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188, 51 Am. Rep. 446; Phillips & B. Mfg. Co. v. Whitney, 109 Ala. 645, 20 So. 333; Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 50 Ala. 530; Cook v. Anderson, 85 Ala. 99, 4 So. 713.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is but one material question raised by this appeal, which is this: Did the prohibition law in this state ex proprio vigore terminate leases of premises which were let only for saloon purposes? If it did, the judgment for plaintiffs below is erroneous and must be reversed. If it did not, the judgment was correct and must be affirmed.

The rule of the common law was that the destruction of the leased premises during the term by fire, inevitable accident, the violence of nature, the act of a public enemy, did not relieve the tenant from express covenant to pay rent, unless it was stipulated in the lease that there should be a cessation of the rent in such case, or unless the lessor had covenanted to rebuild in such case. Chamberlain v. Godfrey, 50 Ala. 530; Cook v. Anderson, 85 Ala. 99, 4 So. 713; Taylor, Land. & T. § 377; 3 Kent, Com. 603. A limitation or exception to this rule is that, if the destruction of the lease or premises is complete,—nothing remaining, the subject-matter or thing leased no longer existing,—then the liability of the tenant for rent ceases. This because rent is a profit issuing out of the lands or tenements as compensation for the use or occupation. Hence, if the principal is gone, the interest or incident cannot continue to exist. To illustrate: If a farm is leased, and the buildings are during the term destroyed by fire, the tenant is still liable for rent; but, if a room only of that house had been rented, or one story only, and the house was destroyed completely, the tenant would not thereafter be liable for rent. If the room or story rented was only partially destroyed or injured, however, the rule would be different. McMillan v. Solomon, 42 Ala. 356, 94 Am. Dec. 654; Chamberlain v. Godfrey, supra. An eviction of the tenant by the landlord, or any interference by the latter which deprives the former of the right of enjoyment of the premises to the full extent of the lease, will authorize the tenant to abandon the premises, and will exonerate him from further liability for rent. Crommelin v. Thiess, 31 Ala. 412, 70 Am. Dec. 499; Chamberlain v. Godfrey, supra. But the act of a third person which impairs the Case Note.—Effect upon lease of property for saloon purposes of passage of prohibitory laws during the term.

The earlier cases upon this subject will be found collected in the note to Heart v. East Tennessee Brewing Co. 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 964, those herein cited having been decided since the date of that note.

Where a lease for a term of five years includes every portion of a hotel, including the barroom, the passage during the term of the lease of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors will not, in the absence of any provision in the lease to that effect, entitle the lessee to a reduction or proportional abatement of the agreed rental. Lawrence v. White, 131 Ga. 840, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 966, 63 S. E. 631.

However, it was held in Hooper v. Mueller (Mich.) 123 N. W. 243, that the adoption of a local option law, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in a county, avoids a lease of premises for the express purpose of being used for the sale of liquor, where the lease provided that it should be void if the lessor should fail to secure for the lessee the sureties required by law, as the adoption of such prohibitory law rendered a performance upon the lessor's part impossible.

usefulness of the premises, but which does not amount to an eviction by the landlord or paramount title, or to a breach of his covenants, or where the premises are impaired or removed by public authority, there is no eviction by the landlord which will exonerate the tenant from the payment of rent, in the absence of a contract to that effect. 24 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1132, 1133.

Some of the courts of the United States have held that there is no limitation or exception to the rule that the tenant remains liable for rent notwithstanding there is an entire destruction of the premises and of the lease, even where only a room, a story, or a certain apartment is let, which carries no interest in the land itself. Helburn v. Mofford, 7 Bush, 169. Some of the Western states, however, have adopted an intermediate rule of prorating or apportioning the loss between the vendor and the vendee by abating a part of the contract price. In the case of Wattles v. South Omaha Ice & Coal Co. 50 Neb. 251, 36 L.R.A. 424, 61 Am. St. Rep. 554, 69 N. W. 785, the majority of the court hold that where a substantial part of the leased premises is destroyed pending the lease, without fault on the part of the lessee, he is entitled to an apportionment of the rent contracted to be paid which accrues thereafter, in the absence of an express assumption by him of the risk, and that the common-law rule that the tenant in such case was liable for the contract price after partial destruction of the premises did not prevail in that state. The majority opinion in the above case held that the common-law rule of making the tenant bear the entire loss was a harsh and technical one; that since it was first announced the conditions of the race had changed; that its conscience and intellect had quickened; and, however meritorious the rule originally, that it was now opposed by the genius and spirit of this age, and in conflict with its judgment and conscience. The rule of thus apportioning the loss was first announced by Justice Brewer in the case of Whitaker v. Hawley, 25 Kan. 674, 37 Am. Rep. 277, and the Nebraska court approved the rule announced by Justice Brewer, "because it is a magnificent protest against slavish devotion to antiquated rules, and . . . because it breathes the spirit of humanity and equity, and is based on a thought of the nineteenth century." In a dissenting opinion in this Nebraska case, supra, written by Justice Irvine and concurred in by Chief Justice Post and Justice Ryan, the above proposition announced by the majority opinion is answered thus: "It is not for the court to abrogate or to reform contracts because of apparent inequity or injustice in their provisions. If the nineteenth century has advanced . . . so far as to require the disregard of established legal principles merely because they are antiquated, this modern enlightenment must certainly have extended so far as to justify a presumption that the parties to a contract have sufficient intelligence to anticipate probable disasters and provide therefor if they so desire. . . . Rules settled by a long and uniform course of judicial decisions should not be lightly disregarded." Mr. Freeman, the great annotator and text writer, commenting on this rule of apportioning the loss, says the rule is asserted "with much charity and some logic."

If we were disposed to follow the Western rule of apportioning the loss (which we do not decide or consider), we could not do so in this case, because there was no attempt so to do in the lower court, and there is absolutely no pleading or evidence on which to base such a judgment. Where the question or rule is regulated by statute,—which is the case in some states,—or where it is provided for in the lease, then, of course, the statute or contract will control. In this state we have no statute regulating this subject, and the contract of lease does not attempt to provide against a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicants. The contract or lease in question leases the premises to appellant for two years from October 1, 1907, "for occupation by him as a saloon, and not otherwise." It would seem that a destruction of the business or trade which, by the contract, was to be carried on in the premises, should be analogous to a destruction of the premises themselves. While, of course, they may not be and are not strictly analogous in all respects, yet we think that they are so in so far as is necessary to a decision of the questions involved on this appeal.

It is therefore necessary for us to inquire: Was the business for which the premises were leased wholly or partially destroyed? This will depend upon the construction given to the word "saloon," as used in the lease. Webster defines "saloon," as follows: "(1) A spacious and elegant apartment for the reception of company or for works of art; a hall of reception, especially a hall for public entertainments or amusements; a large public room or parlor; as the saloon of a steamboat. (2) Popularly, a public room for specific uses; especially, a bar-room or grogshop,—as a drinking saloon; an eating saloon; a dancing saloon." Mr. March defines it as "an apartment or hall devoted to some specific use; a place where liquor is retailed." The word as used in the lease in question has, we think, acquired a more particular and restricted meaning than it had when Mr. Webster defined it.

It is now often used as synonymous with "barroom," "grogshop," or "dramshop." We think it was used in this contract to include the sale of intoxicants, liquors, but not to exclude the sale of everything except intoxicating liquors. The word appears to have been construed differently, where used in municipal ordinances and charters, acts of the legislature, etc., from the interpretation accorded it where used in contracts, leases, etc. 7 Words & Phrases, p. 6312. It has been held by the supreme courts of Illinois and Michigan that it may or may not mean a place for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and hence, where premises were, by the terms of the lease, to be occupied as a saloon, and for no other purpose whatever, the word "saloon" in such lease will not be understood, as matter of law, to mean a place where intoxicating liquors only were to be sold, and not a place for the sale of soda water, etc. Brewer & H. Brewing Co. v. Boddie, 181 Ill. 622, 55 N. E. 49. It has been held, also, to include a place to which persons can go to get refreshments, to eat or drink, and to include a place where ginger ale, cider, etc., are served; and that it does not necessarily import a place where intoxicating drinks alone are sold. Kitson v. Ann Arbor, 26 Mich. 325; State v. Mansker, 36 Tex. 364; Snow v. State, 50 Ark. 557, 9 S. W. 306; Goozen v. Phillips, 49 Mich. 7, 12 N. W. 889.

Our construction of the word "saloon," as used in this lease, is borne out by the evidence of the parties in this particular case. The lessee testified that he used the premises for a saloon under the lease from October 1, 1907, until the prohibition law went into effect, January 1, 1908; that the word "saloon," as used in the lease, meant a place for the sale of intoxicating drinks and beverages; that he also sold and dispensed to the public in said premises under said lease other drinks, such as soda water, lemonade, and soft drinks, and cigars, cigarettes, and tobacco. This use to which the lessee put the premises seems to have been known to the landlord, and no objection was made by him; hence, we think that the business he is shown to have carried on was the business which the lease contemplated. It is conceded that the sale or dispensing of intoxicating liquors or beverages was prohibited in Birmingham, Alabama (the situs of this property), on and after January 1, 1908, during the life of this lease. It is also conceded that the rent was paid up to this date, and that thereafter the tenant refused to pay rent, and offered to surrender the premises to the landlord, which offer the landlord declined, insisting upon payment, but proposed to release the lessee from the provision that the premises should be used only for a saloon, and allow him to use the premises for any other legitimate purpose not more injurious than would be the liquor business, and not constituting a nuisance to other tenants in the same building. The lessee declined this offer, saying that it was a modification of the first lease, to which he did not consent; that the prohibition law terminated the lease and dissolved the relation of landlord and tenant, and released him from further liability for rent. This was evidently a partial, and not a total, destruction of the business for which the premises were leased. If we apply to the destruction of the business the same rule that we invoke as to the destruction of the premises,—and we think this would be just and proper in the case at bar,—it follows that the tenant was not discharged from liability by reason of the prohibition law. He could in law and in fact have continued to use the premises as a saloon, though he could not have sold intoxicating drinks or beverages. His business might not, and, as it was shown by the evidence, would not, have continued to be as profitable as if he could sell intoxicants; nevertheless, he could have continued to sell soft drinks, cigars, cigarettes, tobacco, etc., as he did before. That his business would not be as good after as before the law went into effect was no more the fault of the landlord than it was of the tenant. The contract of lease not having provided against such a contingency, which both parties knew could happen, as it provided against other contingencies, we must leave the liability and loss, if any, where the law leaves it; to wit, upon the tenant.

We are referred by counsel for appellant to a recent decision said to have been rendered by some court of Georgia upon this identical question. We have not been furnished with, and are not able to see what even purports to be a copy of, that decision, but only what purports to be an excerpt from the opinion, which may be said to indicate the reverse of what we hold in this case. It may be that the statutes of Georgia regulate or provide for such conditions, or it may be that the contract or facts of that case differentiate it from this case. This, of course, we cannot know without an inspection or examination of the opinion and decision in full. But, if it be different from and holds the converse of this, we would not be willing to follow it or apply the rule in this state while our law remains as it now is. The nearest cases in point which we have been able to find where the question was not regulated by statute are decisions from the state of Texas, and they support the rule as announced above in so far as they are in point. Houston Ice &

Brewing Co. v. Keenan, 99 Tex. 79, 88 S. W. 197; San Antonio Brewing Co. v. Brents, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 88 S. W. 368. The rule is, of course, different where the parties contract to carry on a business which is unlawful at the time the contract is made, or where they contract to do an unlawful act. So long as the contract is executory, it cannot be enforced by either party. The contract made in the case at bar was not unlawful when made, nor would it be unlawful in toto now because it might authorize the selling of intoxicants as a part of the business of a saloon, and the contract will now, by letter and spirit, authorize the tenant to sell soft drinks, cigars, cigarettes, tobacco, or anything sold or dispensed in a saloon, not intoxicating. The landlord certainly could not have terminated this lease because the tenant would not or could not sell intoxicants. There was nothing in the lease which required this, though it did allow it. If the landlord was still bound after the law went into effect (and we think he was), then the tenant also ought to be bound. Both parties ought to be bound by the law, or neither. The mere fact that the law might cause the tenant to suffer a loss when, without it, he would have made a profit, is no more reason to annul the contract on that account, or to allow the tenant to avoid it, than the passage of a law which increased the tenant's profits, and thereby made the lease more valuable, would authorize the landlord to annul the lease, and require a new one under the new law.

On the case as shown by this record, the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to recover the judgment rendered. We can find no error in the record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Courts — reversal of former decision — effect.

4. The fact that, under a former decision in an action to which the plaintiff was not a party, this court held that the statute above cited was, in its application to the particular facts, repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and that the services were rendered after such decision was announced, does not affect the result.

Same — contract right in erroneous decision.

5. A person who is not a party or privy in an action cannot have a vested right in an erroneous decision made therein.

Case Note. — Effect of change of judicial decisions to impair the obligation of a contract.

As shown in the note to Swanson v. Ottumwa, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 860, the United States Supreme Court in Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 40 L. ed. 91, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80, expressly declared that, in order to come within the provision of the Federal Constitution against impairing the obligation of contracts, not only must the obligation of a contract have been impaired, but it must have been impaired by some act of the legislative power of the state, and not by a decision of the judicial department only; and this doctrine has been frequently reiterated by that court, and was restated even as late as the case of National Mut. Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Brahan, 193 U. S. 635, 48 L. ed. 823, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532. It may, however, be thought that the recent case of Muhler v. New York & H. R. Co. 197 U. S. 544, 49 L. ed. 872, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 522, in connection with the case of Sauer v. New York, 206 U. S. 536, 51 L. ed. 1176, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 686, indicates a disposition on the part of that court to recede from the doctrine of the Laidley Case. A careful study of the opinions in those two cases, however, leads to the conclusion that they are not irreconcilable with the doctrine of the Laidley Case; and that they merely hold on this point that the United States Supreme Court may, for the purpose of determining the obligation of the contract alleged to be impaired by a statute, regard the position held by the court of last resort of ERROR to the District Court for Barton County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover commissions for the sale of intoxicating liquors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James W. Clarke, for plaintiffs in error:

The state law which places substantial restrictions upon the taking or soliciting of orders by a nonresident salesman for intoxicating liquors, to be purchased in and imported from another state, where such orders are subject to approval or rejection at the election of the nonresident merchant, is not a burden upon interstate commerce, and is not repugnant to the provision of the Federal Constitution giving Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce.

Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, 51 L. ed. 724, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 447, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 733.

the state in which the statute was passed at the time the contract in question was made, and is not, for this purpose, bound to regard the position subsequently taken by the state court, modifying or overruling its earlier position. This position, it will be observed, does not involve a denial of the doctrine of the Laidley Case, that, to come within the inhibition of the constitutional provision, the impairment of the contract must be by some act of the legislative power, and not by a decision of the judicial department. The Muhlker Case came up on a writ of error to review a decision of the New York court of appeals to the effect that an abutting owner in the city of New York, who acquired his title in 1888, was not entitled to compensation for injuries to his easements of light, air, and access by the substitution by a railroad company, at the command of the state as expressed in the act of 1892, of an elevated structure in lieu of its surface or partly depressed roadbed, which occupied the street at the time of his purchase. As stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice McKenna, the question presented to the Supreme Court was as to the effect of the deed to the plaintiff and to the city as constituting a contract, and "the effect of the act of 1892 as an impairment of that contract, or as taking the plaintiff's property without due process of law." In this form the question was clearly one which gave the Supreme Court jurisdiction, and did not fall within the principle of the Laidley Case, since it assumed that it was the statute, and not the change of judicial decision, that was claimed to have impaired the contract. It appeared, however, that up to the time the plaintiff had acquired his title there had been no express limitation of the doctrine laid down by the court of appeals in the elevated railroad cases (so-called), and that doctrine was then generally supposed to cover such a situation as was presented in the Muhlker Case. In fact, that doctrine was—though subsequently to

Messrs. Frank L. Martin and Walter F. Jones, for defendant in error:

The contract having been entered into pursuant to the former adjudication, the law as subsequently laid down cannot be given a retrospective operation, and thus impair the obligations of the contract.

Taylor v. Ypsilanti, 105 U. S. 60, 26 L. ed. 1008; Ralls County v. Douglass, 105 U. S. 728, 26 L. ed. 957; Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 179.

Benson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants Crigler & Crigler, wholesale liquor dealers at Covington, Kentucky, employed the plaintiff, Shepler, as a traveling salesman to solicit in Kansas orders for whisky to be shipped from Kentucky to the persons so ordering it. He sued for commissions. The court found that the orders the time the plaintiff in the Muhlker Case acquired his property—practically extended to such a situation by the decision of the court of appeals in Lewis v. New York & H. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 202, 56 N. E. 540. Subsequently, however, the court of appeals in Fries v. New York & H. R. Co. 169 N. Y. 270, 62 N. E. 358, a case substantially like the Muhlker Case, expressly overruled the decision in the Lewis Case, and distinguished the elevated railroad cases by holding in effect that the doctrine there laid down did not apply to a change of the grade of the railroad and the construction of a viaduct for the purpose of improving the street; and the doctrine of the Fries Case was followed by the court of appeals in the Muhlker Case. Consequently, if the United States Supreme Court, in determining the contract rights of the plaintiff in the Muhlker Case, had merely regarded the doctrine of the court of appeals as laid down in the Fries Case and the Muhlker Case, there would have been no contractual right in favor of plaintiff to be impaired by the act of 1892. Mr. Justice McKenna, however, was of the opinion that the doctrine of the elevated railroad cases (which, as already shown, had not been modified at the time the plaintiff acquired his property), did not admit of the distinction attempted to be made in the Fries and Muhlker Cases, and therefore held that to deprive plaintiff of compensation for the damages to his easements in consequence of the change in the conditions pursuant to the act of 1892 would involve the impairment of the obligation of his contract. Justice McKenna said: "We are not called upon to discuss the power or the limitations upon the power of the courts of New York to declare rules of property, or change or modify their decisions, but only to decide that such power cannot be exercised to take away rights which have been acquired by contract, and have come under the protection of the Constitution of the United States. And we determine for were taken in contravention of § 2479 of the General Statutes of 1901, but that this section was unconstitutional, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of such commissions.

The defendants contend that the statute is valid, and that the plaintiff, having been engaged in an unlawful act, should not be aided by the court in collecting pay therefor. The statute is: "Any person who shall take or receive any order for intoxicating liquors from any person in this state, other than a person authorized to sell the same as in this act provided, or any person who shall directly or indirectly contract for the sale of intoxicating liquors with any person in this state, other than a person authorized to sell the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished therefor as provided in this act for selling intoxicating liquors." In State v. Hickox, 64 Kan. 650, 68 Pac. 35, it was held that a state law which places substantial restrictions upon taking orders by a nonresident salesman for intoxicating liquors to be imported from another state, when such orders are subject to the approval of the nonresident vendor, is a burden upon interstate commerce, and, in so far as the act in question applied to such cases, it was repugnant to the provisions of the Federal Constitution, giving Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce. Recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have, however, interpreted the Wilson act (act Aug. 8, 1890, chap. 728, 26 Stat. at L. 313, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177) so as to permit

In view of the fact that the question before the court, as stated by him, was whether the act of 1892 constituted an impairment of contract, it seems possible to reconcile his position in this case with the doctrine of the Laidley Case by assuming that he merely meant to decide that, in determining what was the obligation of the contract which was claimed to have been impaired by the act of 1892, the position taken by the court of appeals in the elevated railroad cases must be considered, and not the position subsequently taken after the plaintiff had acquired his property. It is significant that his opinion makes no reference to the Laidley Case and the other decisions following the doctrine of that case. It seems hardly possible that there could have been any intention to overrule the doctrine of those cases without referring to them, especially as the opinion in the Laidley Case, as shown in the earlier note, had expressly distinguished and explained away still earlier cases which had been supposed to support a doctrine opposed to that of the Laidley Case. It is also to be noted that, so far as the report of the case shows, the majority of the court did not concur in Mr. Justice McKenna's opinion. Mr. Justice Brown concurred in the result only, and the Chief Justice and Justices Holmes, White, and Peckham dissented.

The opinion in the Sauer Case seems rather to support the view above expressed of the effect of Justice McKenna's position in the Muhlker Case. In the Sauer Case, a New York statute authorizing the construction of a viaduct in the street for the use of the general public, though interpreted by the court of appeals not to require compensation to an abutting owner whose title was acquired while the doctrine of the elevated railroad cases was in full force, was held not to impair the obligation of his contract. The case was distinguished from the Muhlker Case on the ground that, before the plaintiff had acquired his title, the New York courts had plainly drawn a distinction between interference with easements of the abutting owner by structures designed for general public use, as in the Sauer Case, and structures designed for the exclusive use of the railroad, as in the Muhlker Case; so that, under the doctrine of the New York cases at the time the plaintiff in the Sauer Case acquired his title, and even apart from the subsequent decisions in that state, he had no contract right against interference with his easements by a structure designed for the general public use. Mr. Justice Moody, who wrote the prevailing opinion, said that the Muhlker Case held that "when the court of appeals has once interpreted the contract existing between the landowner and the city, that interpretation becomes a part of the contract, upon which one acquiring land may rely; and that any subsequent change of it to his injury impairs the obligation of the contract." As the question before the court in the Sauer Case, as stated by Justice Moody, was whether the law, i. e., the statutes which authorized the construction of the viaduct, as interpreted by the court of appeals, impaired the obligation of a contract, it is not unreasonable to assume that, by the phrase in the above quotation, "any subsequent change of it," he meant only any subsequent change by statute. In this view the position imputed by him to the court in the Muhlker Case would, as already stated, be merely that, in determining whether the statute has impaired the obligation of a contract, the obligation of the plaintiff's contract is to be determined in the light of the position of the court of appeals at the time the property was acquired and not with reference to its position at a subsequent time; and this position does not conflict with the doctrine of the Laidley Case, that the contract cannot, in a constitutional sense, be impaired by a decision of the judicial department only.

As suggested in the earlier note, however, the doctrine of the Laidley Case, even assuming that there has been no departure therefrom by the United States Supreme the effective operation of such state legislation. A statute of South Dakota imposed a license tax upon the business of selling or offering for sale intoxicating liquors by traveling salesmen. Construing this statute, it was said: "It would be, we think, a disregard of the purposes of Congress to hold that the owner of intoxicating liquors in one state can, by virtue of the commerce clause, go himself or send his agent into such other state, there, in defiance of the law of the state, to carry on the business of soliciting proposals for the purchase of intoxicating liquors." Delamater v. South Dakota, 205 U. S. 93, 99, 51 L. ed. 724, 729, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 447, 448, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 733. Our statute prohibits such business, and within the principles of this decision is not obnoxious to the Federal Constitution, as finally determined by that tribunal whose decisions upon that question, as stated in the Hickox Case, we feel impelled to follow. The plaintiff contends, however, that the opinion in that case was the law of this state when the services were rendered, and that they were not therefore performed in violation of law. As stated in his brief his claim is: "The contract having been entered into pursuant to the adjudication of this court in State v. Hickox, the law cannot be given a retrospective operation, and thus impair the obligations of the contract." Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are cited in support of this proposition. Mr. Chief Justice Taney stated the doctrine thus: "And the sound and true rule is that, if the contract when made was valid by the laws of the Court, leaves it optional with the state courts to abide by the position originally taken upon a particular subject, and to refuse to follow that subsequently adopted, so far as contracts made prior to the change of position are concerned. Nor does it seem to make any material difference whether the state court in such a case bases its conclusion to abide by the first position and to disregard the second, upon the ground that to do otherwise would involve an unconstitutional impairment of the obligation of a contract; since a decision of a state court in favor of a contention based on a provision of the Federal Constitution presents no ground of jurisdiction for the Supreme Court.

A case in point is Thomas v. State, 76 Ohio St. 341, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1112, 118 Am. St. Rep. 884, 81 N. E. 437, holding that, the court having affirmed the constitutional validity of a legislative act passed to authorize contracts for services to be rendered to the public, and such a contract having been entered into and services performed towards its execution, the party performing them was, notwithstanding a subsequent decision that the act was unconstitutional and void, entitled to receive the stipulated compensation for such services as he had performed before the filing of the petition in an action challenging the validity of such contracts, the court not having in the meantime qualified or overruled the decision upon which the party relied. The court was clearly of the opinion that adherence to the later position in this case would involve an unconstitutional impairment of the obligation of a contract, in violation of the constitutional provision; relying for this point on Douglas v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968, which was one of the cases that were distinguished by the Laidley Case. Unless the Laidley Case is to be regarded as overruled by the Muhlker Case, it is apparent that the Ohio court was under a misapprehension when it rested its conclusion upon the supposed position of the United States Supreme Court on the question of the impairment of the obligation of the contract. But, even so, there is no apparent reason why the Ohio court should not adhere to the rule adopted by it on this point, since it is under no compulsion to abide strictly by the letter of the rule stare decisis, and disavow its spirit, nor even to refrain from resting its position on this point on the constitutional provision in question. In other words, the only effect of the doctrine of the Laidley Case, assuming that it has not been disturbed by the Muhlker Case, is to enable the state court, if it sees fit to do so, to adhere to the last position taken by it, even as applied to a contract entered into while the previous position was in force, without coming into conflict with the provision of the Federal Constitution against impairing obligation of contracts. There are many cases not coming within the scope of this note in which the state courts have applied the doctrine in force at the time the contract in question was entered into, rather than the doctrine subsequently adopted, and in some of these cases, as in the Ohio case already referred to, the decision may have been influenced to some extent by the impression that the contrary course would involve an unconstitutional impairment of the obligation of the contract.

The court in Sedalia v. Donohue, 190 Mo. 407, 89 S. W. 386, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 89, cited and approved the doctrine of the Laidley Case, though the decision was merely to the effect that neither the doctrine of stare decisis nor the provision as to impairing the obligation of contracts required a court of last resort to abide by the doctrine as laid down by an inferior court at the time the contract in question was entered into. Obviously, even if it were to be conceded that a change by a court of last resort of its own position would involve an unconstitutional impairment of the obligation of a contract if applied to a contract entered into before the change, that doctrine would not necessarily apply to the refusal of a court of last resort to follow an erroneous doctrine of an inferior court.

state, as then expounded by all the departments of its government, and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent act of the legislature of the state, or decision of its courts, altering the construction of the law." Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 416, 432, 14 L. ed. 997, 1004. It was expressly stated in the opinion, however, that the majority of the court did not agree upon the principles upon which the judgment should be maintained, and that the views thus expressed were those of the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Grier. Nevertheless, this declaration was referred to and adopted in several cases following in that court, and in some of the state courts, and in some instances by text writers. In Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 687, 25 L. ed. 968, 971, after citing the foregoing case, it was said that "after a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights acquired under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself; and a change of decision is, to all intents and purposes, the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by means of a legislative enactment." This doctrine was approved and followed in other opinions of the same court. Also in Haskett v. Maxey, 134 Ind. 182, 19 L.R.A. 379, 33 N. E. 358; Center School Twp. v. State, 150 Ind. 168, 49 N. E. 961; and in Farrior v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 92 Ala. 176, 12 L.R.A. 856, 9 So. 532. In Volume 2 of the second edition of Lewis's Sutherland Statutory Construction, § 485, the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Taney in the Debolt Case, and other opinions of that court based upon it, are given as authority for the following statement in the text: "A judicial construction of a statute becomes a part of it, and, as to rights which accrue afterwards, it should be adhered to for the protection of those rights. To devest them by a change of the construction is to legislate retroactively." Vol. 2, p. 906. The subject is referred to and the opinion in Douglass v. Pike County, supra, is quoted from in Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes, § 1, note 1, but the views of the author are not expressed.

The first judicial remonstrance against the broad declaration of the chief justice in the court in which it was announced was in the dissent of Mr. Justice Miller in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175, 207, 17 L. ed. 520, 526, wherein he said: "But he [Chief Justice Taney] clearly shows that there was in his mind nothing beyond the case of a writ of error to the supreme court of a state; for he says in the midst of the sentence cited, or in the immediate context: 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"The writ of error to a state court would be no protection to a contract if we were bound to follow the judgment which the state court had given, and which the court brings up here for revision.' Besides, in the opinion thus cited, the chief justice says, in the commencement of it, that he only speaks for himself and Justice Grier. The remarks cited, then, were not the opinion of the court, were outside the record, and were evidently intended to be confined to the case of a writ of error to the court of a state, where it was insisted that the judgment sought to be revised should conclude this court." Pages 216, 217 of 1 Wall. In several later cases that court has limited the application of the doctrine, and has held that the provisions of the Federal Constitution forbidding the enactment of laws impairing the obligation of contracts do not apply to judicial decisions overruling former adjudications, upon the faith of which contracts have been entered into. The following excerpts will show how the subject is now regarded by that court: "In order to come within the provision of the Constitution of the United States which declares that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, not only must the obligation of a contract have been impaired, but it must have been impaired by some act of the legislative power of the state, and not by a decision of its judicial department only." Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 109, 40 L. ed. 91, 93, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80, 82. In this and cases following (Bacon v. Texas, 163 U. S. 207, 41 L. ed. 132, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1023; National Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Brahan, 193 U. S. 635, 48 L. ed. 823, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 532), the proposition that the decision of a state court overruling its former adjudications can be held to impair contracts within the meaning of the constitutional provision is denied. The real ground, as we believe, upon which that court has refused in some cases to follow the latest deliverance of a state court was stated by Mr. Justice Swayne in the opinion of the court in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, supra. It appeared that the supreme court of Iowa had by several decisions held that a statute of that state authorized the issuance of bonds in aid of certain railroads. Afterwards the same court decided that the statute did not give that authority. After referring to these conflicting opinions, the court said: "It cannot be expected that this court will follow every such oscillation, from whatever cause arising, that may possibly occur. The earlier decisions we think are sustained by reason and authority." It appears that the Federal Supreme Court, in case of a conflict in state decisions construing a statute, will not be bound to follow the latest opinion,—not because of the supposed impairment of contracts,—but will adopt in cases affecting the rights of the holders of commercial paper, at least, the rule best sustained by reason and authority; and, in the language of a recent opinion: "They [the Federal courts] have also at times applied a sort of equitable doctrine, and held to a rule which sustains a contract legal when entered into according to the then-existing decisions of the state court, but which afterwards, on further reflection, were held illegal by the state court." Swanson v. Ottumwa, 131 Iowa, 540, 549, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 860, 106 N. W. 9, 12, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1117.

This question has been carefully considered in several state courts, and claims such as that made by the plaintiff here have been rejected after a review of the Federal authorities upon which they were supposed to rest. It was originally held in California that a conveyance of land, absolute in form, but intended as a mortgage, did not pass the legal title. Afterwards it was decided that the legal title did pass by such conveyance. It was contended in the last case that a deed executed after the first decision could only have effect in accordance with the rule first declared. The court stated: "The courts cannot make or repeal a law. They can say what a law means; and, if afterwards they see that they have made a mistake, they can correct their error by an overruling of a former decision, the consequence of which overruling is that the blunder is thenceforward deemed never to have been law." Bishop, Contr. § 569. It has been held here that, although it appears the parties have entered into a contract relying upon a previous decision of the supreme court, they would not be relieved from the obligations thereof because of a subsequent decision by the same court, overruling the former one, and declaring a different rule upon the same subject. Kenyon v. Welty, 20 Cal. 637, 81 Am. Dec. 137. There are some cases in which the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the construction given to a statute by the highest tribunal in the state, whether sound or not, must be taken as correct so far as contracts made under the act are concerned, and no subsequent decision altering the construction can impair their validity. The construction becomes a part of the statute,—as much so as if it were an amendment made by the legislature. . . . These cases, however, all involved the question as to the validity of negotiable securities." Allen v. Allen, 95 Cal. 184, 199, 16 L.R.A. 646, 30 Pac. 213, 216. This rule was followed in Alferitz v. Borgwardt, 126 Cal. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

201, 58 Pac. 460. In Swanson v. Ottumwa, supra, where a statute was construed differently than it had been interpreted in prior decisions, it was said: "Again, it is argued that prior to the decisions in the Heins and Witter Cases (102 Iowa, 69, 71 N. W. 189, and 112 Iowa, 380, 83 N. W. 1041), which were decided after the bonds in this case were issued and delivered, this court was committed to the doctrine that a city might issue negotiable bonds in such cases as this, and that to now hold to the contrary would be in violation of the constitutional provision with reference to the impairment of the obligations of contracts. Many cases are cited in support of this contention, although none of them, as it seems to us, go so far as to hold that the constitutional limitation applies to a judicial decision, unless that decision be the construction of a particular statute, under which the bonds or contracts in each case were executed." Page 548 of 131 Iowa. In a note to the report of this case in 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 860, it is suggested that the principle decided covered also a change in the construction of a statute, which, in the opinion, is referred to as a possible exception to the rule stated: We concur with the annotator in this view.

This question was very carefully considered in Texas in a clear and forceful opinion affecting the constitutional provisions relating to homesteads. Concerning the contention that a former decision precluded the assertion of the claim to exemption, the court said: "Under the proposition contended for by the appellant, this court is called upon to hold that a decision of the supreme court of a state, although erroneously made, could give validity to a statute which the legislature had no power to enact, and thereby deprive the citizens of Texas of their constitutional right of exemption of their homesteads from this class of charges. . . . If the supreme court had the right to say that those people upon whose property burdens had been placed, as in this case, under the decision referred to, must bear that burden and be deprived of the constitutional protection, then this court had as much authority to say that the people in all future time should suffer the same deprivation of their constitutional rights. Such a decision as that sought would be violative of the fundamental principles of our jurisprudence, and an assumption of power forbidden to be exercised by the court, and would involve the administration of justice in many and insurmountable difficulties." "When courts speak of the obligation of contracts, they mean the legal obligation or binding force of such contracts; and, if the law upon which the validity of the contract depends be unconstitutional, it is not a law, and never was a law, and the pretended contract is void, and has no legal obligation to be violated." Storrie v. Cortes, 90 Tex. 283, 35 L.R.A. 666, 669, 670, 38 S. W. 154. The same conclusion is briefly stated in Sedalia v. Donohue, 190 Mo. 407, 89 S. W. 386, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 89.

In considering this subject, the rule of stare decisis has sometimes been confounded with the constitutional provision inhibiting laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Under this rule, courts will not overrule decisions which have settled property rights where greater mischief would be caused by departing from the decisions than by following them, but will leave the correction of a possibly erroneous interpretation to the legislature. This, however, is only a rule of policy, and has no application here. The legislature has already enacted this law, and the court is under no legal or moral obligation to perpetuate an erroneous construction placed upon it through an imperfect understanding of the views of the Federal Supreme Court. Courts do not and cannot change the law by overruling or modifying former opinions. They only declare it by correcting an imperfect or erroneous view. The law itself remains the same, although interpretations may have differed. Alferitz v. Borgwardt, supra; Ray v. Western Pennsylvania Natural Gas Co. 138 Pa. 576, 12 L.R.A. 290, 21 Am. St. Rep. 922, 20 Atl. 1065; Pierce v. Pierce, 46 Ind. 86; Taliaferro v. Barnett, 47 Ark. 359, 1 S. W. 702. An erroneous ruling may in some circumstances become the law of the particular case, but this will not prevent the court in another action from holding to the contrary. A person who is not a party or privy in the action cannot acquire a vested right in an erroneous decision made therein. The conclusion that the statute under consideration in State v. Hickox, 64 Kan. 650, 68 Pac. 35, was inoperative so far as it applied to the controversy then presented was declared after a careful examination of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States affecting the question. Since that opinion was written, by progressive adjudications of the Federal tribunal, the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution and the Wilson act have been so construed as to permit the effectual operation of that statute to punish the acts therein prohibited. Measured by these later opinions, this statute is valid; and we now conform our decisions to these controlling interpretations. State ex rel. Jackson v. Wm. J. Lemp Brewing Co. (Kan.) 102 Pac. 504. The supreme court of Iowa in a recent opinion followed the Delamater Case, and overruled previous decisions wherein it had held 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that a similar statute of that state was in conflict with the Federal Constitution. The court said: "But . . . when we have held a state statute to be unconstitutional because in supposed conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States has so interpreted the Federal Constitution that the supposed conflict is found not to exist, there is no good reason why we should not change our rulings so as to sustain the policy of the statutes of the state." McCollum v. McConaughy (Iowa) 119 N. W. 539, 541. We conclude that § 2479 of the General Statutes of 1901 is valid; that a promise to pay for services in criminal transactions will not be enforced; that the former decision between other parties, holding the statute invalid, does not give the plaintiff a right to recover; and that he must fail in the action.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for the defendants on the findings.

St. Rep. 94, 57 Pac. 468, that a stockholder cannot transfer the good will of the corporation with his stock, within the meaning of a statute permitting one who sells the good will of a business to agree to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a limited territory for a specified time, and an agreement by the vendor not to engage in a competing business in a city so long as the vendee or any person deriving title to the good will from him should carry on a like business is void, as in re-

APPEAL by complainant from an order of the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County sustaining a demurrer to a bill filed specifically to enforce a contract not to engage in the baking business in Kalamazoo for five years, and to recover damages for alleged breach of such contract, and to enjoin further breach thereof. straint of trade, under a statute declaring void every contract by which one is restrained from exercising his lawful profession, trade, or business of any kind, except where he sells the good will of his business. And this doctrine is recognized in Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879.

But, on the other hand, the contrary has been held in the absence of any statute, in the following cases:

Thus, an agreement by the seller or corporate stock not to engage in a competing business with the corporation in a designated city or adjacent thereto, although unlimited as to time, is based upon a sufficient consideration and is valid. Up River Ice Co. v. Denler, 114 Mich. 296, 68 Am. St. Rep. 480, 72 N. W. 157.

The penalty which is expressed in the contract, whether regarded as in the nature of a stipulation for liquidated or unliquidated damages, does not affect the complainant's right to relief in equity.

Ropes v. Upton, 125 Mass. 258; 2 High. Inj. p. 1175; Harris v. Theus, 149 Ala. 133, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 205, 123 Am. St. Rep. 17, 43 So. 131; McCurry v. Gibson, 108 Ala. 451, 54 Am. St. Rep. 177, 18 So. 806; Wilkinson v. Colley, 164 Pa. 35, 26 L.R.A. 114, corporate stock that he will not, either directly or indirectly, in his own name or as stockholder or agent, engage in a similar business, at wholesale or retail, in a city for a period of five years, does not impose a restraint larger than is reasonable for the protection of the purchasers, and is, therefore, valid. As the purchasers, who own the stock of the corporation, are interested in the success thereof, and as they bought the vendor's stock and paid him his price, they are entitled to the protection given by the vendor's agreement. Kradwell v. Thiesen, 131 Wis. 97, 111 N. W. 233.

And the fact that the sale of the corporate stock did not transfer any title to the good will of the business—that being the property of the corporation itself—did not render such agreement invalid. Ibid.

So it was held in Fleckenstein Bros. Co. v. Fleckenstein (N. J.) 71 Atl. 265, that an agreement by the seller of shares of stock of a corporation of which he was manager, not directly or indirectly to engage in a competing business within 500 miles from the city where its business was carried on, for a period of twenty years, was valid as to the city, even though it might be unenforceable as to the territory described. The court said that such a contract, although in partial restraint of trade, is not objectionable to public policy unless it goes further than is reasonably required for the protection and enjoyment of the business sold, or the restraint is so great as to interfere with public interests; and the trend of opinion at the present day is that such a contract is not injurious to the public interests so long as the area within which the business is restrained is no greater than is covered by the business the good will of which has been sold.

Irwin v. Curie, supra.

Mr. Thomas C. Daggett for respondents.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 30th of November 1906, plaintiff and defendant entered into the following contract in writing, namely:

This agreement, made and entered into this 30th day of November, 1906, by and between T. D. Sheehan and Henry Holland, witnesseth: It is hereby agreed by and between each of the parties above named, respectively, that in reference to all claims and cases handled by suit or settlement by the said T. D. Sheehan or Henry Holland from the date of this instrument, that the proceeds of all litigation, either by settlement or suit, shall be divided equally, one half, between the said parties to this agreement. It is also further agreed that expenses, including said Holland's expenses on the road, and all the expenses that may be incurred by office, and legitimate expenses necessary to carrying on the said business, shall be shared equally by and between the said parties, and that the expenses shall first be deducted from all the settlements made in the carrying on of said business.

[Signed]

T. D. Sheehan.
Henry Holland.

The agreement, as illuminated by the evidence, discloses the following facts: Plaintiff is a layman, following, so far as involved in this case, the occupation of discovering persons who had received personal injury at the hands of railroad companies and others and inducing them to intrust their claims for compensation to him and his associate, Sheehan, for suit, adjustment, and settlement, upon the basis of a division of the amounts received from the railroad or person liable. Sheehan is an attorney and counselor at law, practising in the city of St. Paul, and the terms of the contract required of him the prosecution of all claims brought in by plaintiff upon the agreement that each should share equally in the profits resulting from litigated or settled cases. When clients were brought in, Sheehan made an independent contract with them specifying the terms of his employment and the proportion of the recovery to be allotted to him for his services, usually from one fourth to one half. Plaintiff, by the agreement, was to assist in the preparation of the cases for trial, in looking up evidence and other necessary details, though, not being an admitted attorney, he was not required or expected to take part in the court proceedings. A large number of persons with grievances against railroad companies were discovered by plaintiff, and, acting under the agreement, he conducted them to the office of defendant, who thereafter managed their cases with success, collecting and receiving large sums of money as compensation for their injuries, dividing with plaintiff the compensation received for his services. Finally, however, defendant repudiated the contract and declined further to be bound by it, and plaintiff brought this action for an accounting respecting moneys received by defendant prior to the repudiation. The trial court found the facts substantially as here outlined, held that the contract was illegal and void, and directed judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appealed from an order denying a new trial.

The only question presented is whether the court below rightly held the contract void and unenforceable. The findings of the trial court are all sustained by the evidence. Illegality vitiates contracts of every description, and the courts decline to enforce them. Illegality, within the rule, includes agreements in violation of some prohibitive statute, in violation of the express rules of the common law, or contrary to public policy. The second and third are so closely related as to be in particular instances indistinguishable; for the common law and public policy, other than that evidenced by statutory enactments, are often inseparably blended together. Parsons v. Trask, 66 Am. Dec. 506, note. Formerly a distinction was made in determining the question whether contracts were illegal between acts mala prohibita and those mala in se; but the old rule no longer obtains. Either, under all modern authorities, nullifies the contract. Gibbs v. Consolidated Gas Co. 130 U. S. 396, 32 L. ed. 979, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553; Swanger v. Mayberry, 59 Cal. 91. Contracts mala in se include all those of an immoral nature, iniquities in themselves, and those opposed to sound public policy; and where both parties are in pari delicto, neither, as a general rule, will be accorded relief by a court of justice. The exceptions to the rule are well defined. 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 551, and cases. The term "public policy," as applied to this subject, is comprehensive, and covers a wide range, whether evidenced by the trend of legislation, judicial decisions, or the principles of the common law. It embraces all acts or contracts which "tend clearly to injure the public health, the public morals, the public confidence in the purity of the administration of the law, or to undermine that sense of security for individual rights, whether of personal liberty or of private property, which any citizen ought to feel." Good-year v. Brown, 155 Pa. 514, 20 L.R.A. 838, 35 Am. St. Rep. 903, 26 Atl. 665.

The contract in the case at bar is one between an attorney and a layman; and without stopping to consider whether expressly prohibited by statute, either as to the attorney or the layman, we take up the question whether it is void as against public policy. That it is we entertain no serious doubt. That conduct by a layman in stirring up litigation, searching out persons who have received some injury to their person or property, and inducing them to intrust their cause to the solicitor, or an attorney of his selection, on a contingent fee basis, tends to disturb confidence in the administration of justice and to undermine that sense of security for individual rights which every citizen has the right to feel, and is as obnoxious to sound public sentiment as when champerty was a crime at common law, is too obvious to require extended discussion. As remarked by Judge Mitchell in Gammons v. Johnson, 76 Minn. 81, 78 N. W. 1635: "The general purpose of the law against champerty and maintenance and barratry was to prevent officious intermeddlers from stirring up strife and contention by vexatious or speculative litigation, which would disturb the peace of society, lead to corrupt practices, and prevent the remedial process of the law. All contracts or practices which necessarily and manifestly tend to produce these results ought still to be held void on grounds of public policy." It becomes all the more odious when participated in by a lawyer and a layman; the latter agreeing to "find the cases" and the former to conduct them through the courts. In such cases both are equally guilty and neither should be permitted, in a court of justice, successfully to assert alleged rights accruing from the iniquitous agreement. Huber v. Johnson, 68 Minn. 76, 64 Am. St. Rep. 456, 70 N. W. 806; Gammons v. Johnson, 69 Minn. 488, 72 N. W. 563; Gammons v. Gulbranson, 78 Minn. 21, 80 N. W. 779.

The precise situation has been presented to other courts of the country with different results; but the weight of reason and principle sustains our view. In Me-guire v. Corwine, 101 U. S. 108, 25 L. ed. 899, it appeared that defendant, in consideration that plaintiff would procure his appointment to prosecute certain cases, and in consideration, also, of plaintiff's assistance in the litigation, agreed to pay plaintiff one half of what he should receive for services rendered in the litigation. The court held the contract contrary to public policy and void, and though plaintiff fully performed his part of the agreement, and defendant received something like $30,000 for his services, refused to require him to account. The case is directly in point. In Langdon v. Conlin, 67 Neb. 243, 60 L.R.A. 429, 108 Am. St. Rep. 643, 93 N. W. 389, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 834, the Nebraska supreme court held that a contract between an attorney and a layman by which the latter agreed to procure the employment of the former by third persons for the prosecution of suits in the courts, and also to assist in looking up the necessary evidence, in consideration of a share in the attorney's fees, was against public policy and void. In the course of the opinion the court referred to the state statutes, and therefrom declared that it was the plain policy of the legislature to exclude all persons not licensed attorneys from directly or indirectly practising in any of the courts of the state, and that for one not an attorney to attempt to break into the practice by a silent partnership with an attorney was a violation of the policy of the law. The same may be said of our own statutes on the subject of admission to the bar. Rev. Laws, 1905, §§ 2279, 2280. A similar conclusion was announced by the California supreme court in Alpers v. Hunt, 86 Cal. 78, 9 L.R.A. 483, 21 Am. St. Rep. 17, 24 Pac. 846. The supreme court of New York in numerous cases has so declared the law of that state, though the court of appeals took the opposite view in Irwin v. Curie, 171 N. Y. 409, 58 L.R.A. 830, 64 N. E. 161. For supreme court citations, see note to Langdon v. Conlin, 2 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 836. The court of appeals held such a contract valid, and placed the ruling upon the ground that the parties were not in pari delicto; that, though a violation of the law on the part of the attorney, as to the layman, the contract was valid and enforceable. The court, it seems to us, overlooked the important fact that the layman was bound to know the statutory prohibition against the attorney, and those restricting the right to practise law to those duly licensed to do so. Guilty intent is not necessary, in order that both parties be in pari delicto. 9 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 569. And it seems clear that, where two persons conspire together to do an act forbidden by law to one of them, the doing of it by joint agreement is a violation of the law as to both. The Colorado and Illinois courts seem also to have adopted the rule laid down by the New York court of appeals (Dunne v. Herrick, 37 Ill. App. 180; Vocke v. Peters, 58 Ill. App. 338; Casserleigh v. Wood, 14 Colo. App. 265, 59 Pac. 1024), though in both states the participation in such a contract would be objectionable, under their statutes, so far as concerns the attorney, and in New York an attorney was disbarred for entering into a similar agreement (Re Clark, 184 N. Y. 222, 77 N. E. 1). The case of Brown v. Bigne, 21 Or. 260, 14 L.R.A. 745, 28 Am. St. Rep. 752, 28 Pac. 11, involved a contract between laymen by which plaintiff advanced money to assist defendant in conducting certain litigation of his own, and is not in point. The Missouri court, in Kelerher v. Henderson, 203 Mo. 498, 101 S. W. 1083, sustained a contract similar to that in the case at bar, though, at the same time, holding the contract with the client procured by the layman champertous and void. The two positions are inconsistent. The layman who procured the client and induced the champertous contract with the attorney was equally culpable with the attorney. The rule of the supreme courts of the United States and of California and Nebraska is in line with the policy adopted by this court in the Huber Cases, supra, and seems to us more in harmony with consistent legal principles than the position of the other courts cited.

We are not required to look exclusively to statutory enactments in determining questions of public policy. Constitutions and statutes are evidence of the general policy of a state; but when confronted with questions of general public policy, as defined in the books, the courts go beyond express legislation and look to the whole body of the law,—statutory, common, and judicial decisions. Public policy requires of courts of equity protection from unjust and unconscionable bargains, though no statutory authority be granted by legislation. For instance, the right of redemption is inseparably connected with every mortgage, and the courts have held stipulations therein waiving the right void as contrary to public policy. Pritchard v. Elton, 38 Conn. 434; Shobe v. Luff, 66 Ill. App. 414. Statutes of limitations are designed to bring an end to strife and litigation by fixing a time within which resort to the courts must be made, and it has been held that an agreement forever to waive the right to interpose the defense is void. Green v. Coos Bay Wagon Co. 10 Sawy. 625, 23 Fed. 87; Wright v. Gardner, 98 Ky. 454, 33 S. W. 622, 35 S. W. 1116; Kellogg v. Dickinson, 147 Mass. 432, 1 L.R.A. 346, 18 N. E. 223. Also contracts not to resort to the courts for relief, contracts in restraint of marriage, in restraint of the right of alienation, contracts tending towards a breach of confidence or of contractual relations between third persons, and in many other respects. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 943 et seq., and cases cited. Contracts or acts tending in the directions just indicated are not expressly prohibited by statute, but, on the broad ground of the general public good, are not enforced. The intermeddler, the fomenter of litigation, has always been obnoxious, and he has received scant treatment at the hands of the law. The business of bureauing personal-injury litigation by a layman under agreement with an attorney to share in the profits is too clearly at variance with and in violation of sound morals and the general policy of the administration of justice to receive our sanction or approval. Such is the contract sought to be enforced in this case, and we hold it contrary to public policy and void.

Order affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN P. EAST, Appt.,

v.

BROOKLYN HEIGHTS RAILROAD COMPANY, Resp't.

Carrier — boarding moving train — statutory penalty.

Boarding a moving car in good faith to become a passenger thereon is not within the operation of a provision of a statute under a caption, "Riding on Freight Trains," which makes it a misdemeanor to get on any train or car while in motion, for the purpose of obtaining transportation thereon as a passenger.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Richmond County, dismissing the complaint, and an order denying a new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for alleged malicious prosecution. Reversed.

Case Note — Construction and effect of statute making it an offense to get on a moving car or train.

Aside from EAST v. BROOKLYN HEIGHTS R. Co. the only case found upon this question is that of Diddle v. Continental Casualty Co. (W. Va.) 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 779, 63 S. E. 962, in which it was held that § 4282, W. Va. Code 1906, making it criminal for persons not passengers or employees of railroads to jump on or off of railway engines, cars, or trains, being a penal statute, was to be strictly construed; and, as thus construed, did not inhibit such conduct in an employee of a railway company whose duties were confined to work in its shops, and did not require him to go upon or about its engines, cars, or trains when in use on its tracks or yards.

Statement by Gray, J.:

This action was brought to recover damages of the defendant for the false arrest and for the malicious prosecution of the plaintiff. Upon the trial it appeared by the testimony of the plaintiff, a lawyer, that he was intending to return from Coney Island upon one of the defendant's trains. The train had already started from the station, and was proceeding slowly, at about the speed of a person walking. The plaintiff hurried his gait, and boarded one of the cars by stepping upon the lower step of the platform. The platform gate was closed, but the guard opened it and allowed him to enter. The guard then called a special officer, employed by the defendant, who arrested the plaintiff for getting on the train while in motion. The train was stopped, the officer and the plaintiff descended from it, and the latter, being taken to a station house, was there detained by a police sergeant under a charge of "disorderly conduct in getting on a moving car." The plaintiff subsequently procured his release under bail, and on the following day, after examination before the magistrate, was discharged. Upon this, and other evidence bearing upon the arrest, the trial court, upon the motion of defendant's counsel, dismissed the complaint, and denied the request of the plaintiff to go to the jury, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted. Upon appeal to the appellate division, in the second department, the judgment of the trial term and an order denying a motion for a new trial were affirmed.

Messrs. Louis Marshall and Samuel H. Evins, for appellant:

The act of boarding a moving car by a legitimate passenger is not in violation of subd. 2, § 426, of the Penal Code, and is not unlawful.

Burks v. Bosso, 180 N. Y. 341, 105 Am. St. Rep. 762, 73 N. E. 58; Distler v. Long Island R. Co. 151 N. Y. 424, 35 L.R.A. 762, 45 N. E. 937.

Mr. D. A. Marsh, with Mr. George D. Yeomans, for respondent:

The plaintiff was guilty of a misdemeanor in getting on the train while in motion, for the purpose of obtaining transportation thereon as a passenger.

Anglo-American Provision Co. v. Davis Provision Co. 169 N. Y. 506, 88 Am. St. Rep. 608, 62 N. E. 587; McCluskey v. Cromwell, 11 N. Y. 593; People ex rel. Kemp v. D'Oench, 111 N. Y. 359, 18 N. E. 862; New York v. Wineburgh Advertising Co. 122 App. Div. 748, 107 N. Y. Supp. 478.

The title of a statute cannot be used to extend or restrain any positive provisions contained in the body of the act, and is of little weight even when the meaning of such provision is doubtful.

Howe's Cave Lime & Cement Co. v. Howe's Cave Asso. 88 Hun, 554, 34 N. Y. Supp. 848, affirmed in 147 N. Y. 721, 42 N. E. 723; Goodlett v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 122 U. S. 391, 30 L. ed. 1230, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1054; United States v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 164 U. S. 526, 41 L. ed. 541, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165; Cornell v. Coyne, 192 U. S. 418, 48 L. ed. 504, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no ground upon which the dismissal of the plaintiff's complaint could be justified, unless his arrest was authorized by the statute. If he, in boarding the train while in motion, had committed an act which the law, as declared by some statute of the state, had made a punishable offense, then his arrest was justified, and his cause of action failed. If that act, however, was not prohibited by law, then he was entitled to maintain his action, and to have the issue determined by the jury. The defendant claims that § 426 of the Penal Code made the act of the plaintiff a misdemeanor. That section has for a caption, "Riding on Freight Trains." The first subdivision of the section reads: "A person who (1) rides on any engine or any freight or wood car of any railway company, without authority or permission of the proper officers of the company, or of the person in charge of the car or engine; or (2) who gets on any car or train while in motion, for the purpose of obtaining transportation thereon as a passenger; or (3) who wilfully obstructs, hinders, or delays the passage of any car lawfully running upon any steam or horse or street railway,—is guilty of a misdemeanor."

It is contended that the second subdivision of this section is applicable to the plaintiff's conduct. If this contention is correct, then an act of such common occurrence as to be almost a characteristic trait of our human nature, without distinction of class or calling, is stamped with criminality. There is probably not an hour of the day when the statute is not offended against by persons in boarding cars while in motion, if it has the meaning contended for. That the legislature ever intended such an application of its enactment I do not believe. If there is any doubt as to the proper construction of the statute, then it should receive that which would not lead to unreasonable, if not absurd, consequences. Being penal in its nature, it should not be construed to be applicable to an act otherwise innocent and natural, and of common occurrence, unless such a legislative intent is clear and unmistakable. If it be conceded that the general language in which the legislative purpose is expressed, upon its face raises a doubt as to what was intended, that doubt should be resolved in favor of a construction which will accord with a just notion of what was to be forbidden. I think that it is resolved by a consideration of the legislation which preceded, and apparently led to, the enactment. If it be true that, when regarded in the light of the classification of the section, of its possible origin, and of the peculiar wording of the law, the legislative intent is equivocal, we should not hesitate to restrict it so as to negative an application which would make that unlawful which, in the common belief, is natural and innocent.

The first enactment by the legislature upon the general subject is to be found in chapter 261, p. 331, Laws 1878. That statute made it a misdemeanor for any person to "get on or off a freight car or engine while in motion," or to "ride on any wood or freight car, unless employed by or with permission from the proper officers of such railroad, or the person in charge of such car or engine." Subdivision 1 of § 426 of the Penal Code is plainly a codification of that enactment. By chapter 474, p. 520, Laws 1879, it was made a misdemeanor for any person to "obstruct, hinder, or delay the passage or running of any car lawfully running upon any horse or street railroad." Subdivision 3 of § 426 of the Penal Code is quite as plainly a codification of that statute. By chapter 370, p. 551, Laws 1880, it was made a misdemeanor for a "minor or other person, not a passenger," to climb, stand upon, or in any way to attach himself to, a locomotive or car, unless it is done in compliance with law, or by permission, under the lawful rules and regulations of the railroad. The same chapter made it also a misdemeanor to "invite or solicit any such minor or other person" to come, or to be, or to consent to his remaining upon, any engine or any freight or baggage car, unless rightfully there by law, or with permission under the rules and regulations of the corporation. Thus these three statutes had for their object the prevention of the unauthorized riding or being upon cars or engines, and of the obstruction or delaying of cars upon surface railroads. In the following year, when the Penal Code was established (chapter 676, p. 913, Laws 1881), § 426 was enacted as it stands at present, with the exception that, by an amendment in 1890 (chapter 458, p. 824, Laws 1890), subdivision 3 was made to apply to steam railways, as well as to horse and street railways, and the caption "Riding on Freight Trains" was added. It is reasonable to infer that the Penal Code, in the respect which we are now considering was intended as a codification of, and to resume within its provisions, existing laws. If subdivision 2 of the section, in its precise terms, is not found in any pre-existing statute, from its situation it is fair to suppose that it was intended to be supplemental to legislation having for its object such unlawful acts as the getting or being upon a car or train unauthorizedly. The caption of the section is certainly not appropriate to all of its subdivisions; but is it probable, if the legislature had intended to change and to add to the law with the view of preventing accidents, by making the common practice of getting on a car or train, while in motion, a misdemeanor, that it would have embodied that intention in a section whose apparent source was in statutes for the prevention of unauthorized riding upon, or the obstruction of the passage of, a car? Had the legislature been moved to this enactment by the occurrence of accidents to the traveling public, its purpose would have been better and more completely expressed in prohibiting persons from getting off, as well as from getting on, a car while in motion. It seems more consonant with the reason of the thing that this subdivision should have been intended to provide for the punishment of any person who sought to get on a car or train unauthorizedly, or intending to obtain transportation as a passenger surreptitiously. That is to say, we could find a reasonable purpose in the enactment when reading it as a prohibition against stealing or getting a free ride by getting and standing upon the train, or some part thereof. The practice of stealing rides upon cars or trains by boys and tramps was notorious, and its suppression had furnished adequate reason for a statute upon the subject. In my opinion we should construe this part of this section as applicable to such unauthorized and mischievous acts, and not to the innocently impulsive acts of persons intending, in good faith, to become passengers. To give it that construction makes the provision one in harmony with a policy declared in the statutes prior to the Code revision. If the construction given below to the subdivision is correct, it is certainly remarkable that, since its enactment in 1881, no case is brought to our attention in which the courts have so held.

I am not able to agree with the opinion of the appellate division that the enactment of subd. 2 in § 426 was such a general and comprehensive change of the law as to exclude a doubt of the legislative intent being to punish a person who gets on a car while in motion. I think that the language is sufficiently significant of an intent to make the prohibition apply, not to the person endeavoring to ride upon the car lawfully as one of its passengers, but to the person endeavoring to obtain transportation as a passenger by surreptitious means, and not intending to comply with the rules as to such. In giving that interpretation we reach a result more satisfactory to the mind, and one which supports a salutary legislative measure. If the legislature intended to make of an ordinary and innocent act a penal offense, I think it should have declared that intention in a way where, by reading or context, it would be plain.

If the plaintiff, though intending to be a passenger upon the train, was defiant of rules, or if he was disorderly, and gave any justification for the treatment he received from the defendant's servants, those were matters for the consideration of the jurors upon a submission to them of the case.

There were errors committed in the exclusion of testimony offered by the plaintiff, which need not be referred to, inasmuch as, upon the retrial which is ordered, they may not recur.

For these reasons, I advise the reversal of the judgment, and that a new trial be ordered, with costs to abide the event.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

EDWARD C. MADER et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

MARY C. APPLE et al.

(80 Ohio St. 691, 89 N. E. 37.)

Will—signature—"at the end."

The will of B. was written upon a blank form folded in the middle, and containing three ruled pages. In said will, after the printed heading, there are written, and consecutively numbered, numerous testamentary clauses and a clause naming the executor of said will. These occupy the whole

Headnote by the COURT.

Case Note.—When will deemed to have been signed or subscribed at the end.

The earlier cases upon this question are collated in the case note to Sears v. Sears, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 353, this note being merely supplemental thereto.

It was held in Re Swire, 225 Pa. 188, 73 Atl. 1110, that a codicil to a will was sufficiently signed "at the end thereof" where the testator's signature followed paragraphs 1 to 8 thereof, while paragraphs 9 to 12 were written in the margin, beginning on a line opposite and just below the testator's of the first and a portion of the second page of said form. Then a blank space is left of about 23½ inches between the last of said above clauses and the testimonium clause, which latter clause is found at or near the bottom of page 3. Immediately beneath and at the end of said testimonium clause, in the space and on the line left and provided for that purpose, B., the testatrix, signed her name. Then follows immediately the attestation clause, signed by two witnesses. No testamentary provision of any kind is found in said will after the signature of the testatrix. Held, that said will is signed at the end thereof, as required by § 5916, Revised Statutes.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shelby County to review a judgment reversing a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, setting aside the probate of the will of Hannah M. M. Baumgarten, deceased. Affirmed.

Statement by Crew, Ch. J.:

The facts of this case, so far as pertinent to the present inquiry, are as follows: On August 8, 1907, a paper writing purporting to be the last will and testament of Hannah M. M. Baumgarten, deceased, was admitted signature. The court said that the end meant by this provision of the statute is logically the end of the language used, which shows that the testamentary purpose has been fully expressed, and the position of the signature with regard to the bottom or end of the page is only evidence on the question whether the testator has completed the expression of his intention. Prima facie, however, that is the natural place for the signature to be placed to show the full expression of the testator's wishes, and therefore is presumptively the right place for it; but it is only evidence, and must give way to evidence of a different intent; and in the present case the connected sense of the text is entirely clear, although not following the usual order of arrangement, and the full substance of the testator's intent and its expression are there, and the signature is at what he intended and regarded as the end of the will; where that is manifest, the continuity of sense, and not the mere position on the page, must determine the statutory "end thereof" as the place for the signature.

It was held in Re Gibson, 128 App. Div. 769, 113 N. Y. Supp. 266, that a will was signed "at the end," where certain marginal interlineation, which disposed of property in certain events in the manner it would be distributed by law, extended below the testator's signature, and that portion written above the signature was admitted to probate on the ground that, such interlineation being immaterial, it might be ignored.

However, an entire will is refused probate where a material portion follows the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to probate by the probate court of Shelby county, Ohio, and letters testamentary were issued thereon to Henry A. Apple as executor. On the 6th day of September, 1907, the present plaintiffs in error, Edward C. Mader et al., commenced an action in the court of common pleas of said Shelby county to contest said will. Thereafter an issue was made up as required by § 5861, Rev. Stat., and the following order was entered upon the journal of said court of common pleas: "And now, to wit, this 17th day of February, A. D. 1908, this cause came on for hearing, and it appearing to the court that the plaintiffs seek to set aside a certain paper writing purporting to be the last will and testament of Hannah M. M. Baumgarten, deceased, late of Shelby county, Ohio, which has been admitted to probate in said county, and no issue being made by the pleadings, it is now ordered the validity of said will be and hereby is put in issue between the parties hereto, and that it be ascertained by the verdict of a jury whether said writing is or is not the last will and testament of the said Hannah M. M. Baumgarten, deceased." On the trial of said issue in the court of common pleas.

testator's signature, on the theory that he would not wish his will to stand with a material part omitted; but, where the portion following the subscription is wholly immaterial, that presumption does not exist. Ibid.

In the last case an appeal was dismissed by the court of appeals on grounds other than the merits. See Re Gibson, 195 N. Y. 466, 88 N. E. 1100.

In Re Schlegel, 62 Misc. 439, 116 N. Y. Supp. 1038, a will was denied probate because not signed at the end, where written upon a printed blank consisting of two pages, with the testator's name written in a space intended for a recital thereof at the top of the first page, and in the body thereof were written the words "continued on the other side," and at the end of the printed form, at the bottom of the first page, a notary public, who supervised the execution of the will, signed his own name in the place intended for the testator's signature, following which was the attestation clause, while on the second page were written the directions for the disposition of the testator's estate, which were followed by his signature.

And for the same reason, in Re Diehl, 112 N. Y. Supp. 717, a will was denied probate where the testator's signature was on the first page, which also contained printed matter, and a portion of a written paragraph, the second page being entirely blank, while the third and fourth pages contained the conclusion of the paragraph begun on the first page, the testator's signature not being there repeated.

the proponents offered and introduced in evidence the will, the record thereof, and the order of probate, and rested. Thereupon the contestants—plaintiffs in error here—moved the court to direct the jury to return a verdict in said cause that said paper writing was not the valid last will and testament of Hannah M. M. Baumgarten, deceased, for the reason that the same was not signed by her at the end thereof as required by the statute. The court sustained said motion, and directed the jury to return such verdict, which was accordingly done. A motion for new trial was made and overruled, and the court entered judgment upon said verdict “that the said paper writing produced at the trial, purporting to be the last will and testament of the said Hannah M. M. Baumgarten, deceased, is not the last will and testament of the said Hannah M. M. Baumgarten, deceased.” The proponents of said will—the defendants in error here—prosecuted error to the circuit court of Shelby county, where the judgment of said court of common pleas was reversed, and the cause remanded to that court for a new trial. The present plaintiffs in error now ask that this judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the judgment of said court of common pleas be affirmed. Some additional facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Percy R. Taylor, Charles C. Marshall, and Andrew J. Hess, for plaintiffs in error:

The reason for the requisition that the will be signed at the end is to prevent fraud.

Crew, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The instrument here in controversy was written upon a blank form containing three ruled pages, and in language and arrangement is as follows:

In the name of the Benevolent Father of All, amen:

I, Hannah Mary Magdaline Baumgarten, of the township of Loramie, county of Shelby, and state of Ohio, being of lawful age, and being of sound and disposing mind and memory, do make, publish, and declare this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills made by me.

First:—My will is that all my just debts and funeral expenses shall be paid out of my estate as soon after my decease as shall be found convenient.

Second:—I give, devise and bequeath to my sister, Mary Catherine Apple, the following described real estate, situated in the county of Shelby, state of Ohio, and in the township of Loramie, described as follows: Being part of section number twenty-four (24), town number ten (10), range four (4) east, and being the west half of the south half of the northeast quarter of said section number 24, containing $40\frac{1}{100}$ acres; also a second tract, same being the west half of two hundred acres of the east side of the south half of said section twenty-four (24), said half herein devised containing 100 acres; both tracts containing $140\frac{1}{100}$. To have and to hold in fee simple to her and her heirs forever.

Third:—The remainder of my estate, both real and personal, I desire converted into money by my executor hereinafter named as soon as convenient, and the same after payment of debts and costs of administration of my estate be divided into six equal parts, one part to be paid to each of the following named person or their heirs, viz.: Mary Christena Batty one share, Mary Catherine Apple one share, Frederick Baumgarten one parts, nor between them and the subscription, will affect its validity." If then, space between the dispositive clauses of a will does not invalidate it, certainly a blank space intervening between the last dispositive provision of the will and the testimonium clause cannot and should not have that effect. While the leaving of a blank space such as found in this will was imprudent, in that it afforded an opportunity for fraudulent practice, nevertheless, the leaving of such blank is not, of itself, sufficient to invalidate the will. By usage and custom in every orderly constructed will the testimonium clause is universally recognized and adopted as the formal conclusion and end of such will, unless, from the instrument itself, a contrary intent appears; and it is only the space between this testimonium clause and the signature of the party executing such will that the law regards, and that the statute was intended to regulate; it being perfectly manifest from such instrument itself, when so constructed, that the testimonium clause is intended as the end thereof. Sears v. Sears, 77 Ohio St. 104, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 353, 82 N. E. 1067. When, therefore, as in the present case, the testatrix has adopted, as she had perfect right to do, the testimonium clause as the end of her will, and has signed her name immediately thereunder, in the space and on the line provided for that purpose, and there is no provision as to the disposition of property, or testamentary provision of any kind, after her signature, such signing must be taken and held to be at the end of the will.

Judgment affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

JOHN W. CUPPLES, Appt.,

v.

J. A. LEVEL, Sheriff of Lincoln County, et al., Respts.

(— Wash. —, 103 Pac. 430.)

Writ — levy — growing crop — sufficiency.

1. A levy on a growing crop by posting notices of sale and delivering a copy of the execution and notices to the judgment debtor is not sufficient to prevent a subsequent valid sale of the property by such debtor.

Note.—The question presented in the above decision as to the proper mode of levying on growing crops is treated in a note to National Bank v. Duff, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1047. No additional cases have been found. 23 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Lease — assignment — consent — necessity.

2. The assent of the lessor to an assignment of the lease is not necessary in the absence of any provision in the lease forbidding such assignment.

Same — nonassent — effect.

3. The nonassent of a lessor to an assignment of the lease will not defeat the title of a purchaser of the growing crop from the assignee as against an execution creditor of the tenants, assignor and assignee, if, at the time the question is tried, the crop has been harvested and marketed.

Same — assignment — waiver.

4. Nonaction will waive an implied right to regain leased property for assignment of the lease without the consent of the lessor.

Gose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, on July 17, 1908, commenced this action under the claim and delivery statute (2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5262 [Pierce's Code, § 854]) by filing his affidavit and serving a copy thereof upon the respondent sheriff, and by giving to the sheriff the statutory bond; whereupon the appellant took possession of a growing crop which the sheriff had theretofore sought to seize under an execution on an ordinary money judgment. Upon the maturing of the crop, it was harvested and marketed by the appellant. The case was tried to a jury. From a judgment upon a verdict in favor of the respondents, this appeal is prosecuted.

The appellant has assigned numerous errors, but the view we take of the case limits the principal inquiry to the single question whether the sheriff had made a legal levy upon the property. A brief statement of the facts as they appear in the record will suffice: On March 7, 1907, the respondent O'Connor leased to Frank P. Bell and John M. Bell section 35, in township 22, range 35, in Lincoln county. The lease provided that the lessees should deliver to the lessor as rental "one third, free of charges," of all the grain grown upon the leased premises. It contained no covenants against assignment. On February 15, 1908, the lessees assigned the lease to one Sadie Wareham, stipulating in the assignment that it was "subject, nevertheless, to the rents and covenants in the said indenture contained." The lease, together with the assignment, was filed for record on the last-named date. On April 7, 1908, the respondent O'Connor recovered a judgment against the Bells and Wareham, and on the 13th day of June following an execution was issued thereon and placed in the hands of the sheriff for enforcement. On the 16th day of June, the respondent sheriff sought to levy on all the right, title, and interest of the execution defendants in the crop of grain then growing upon the leased premises. His return states: "Said levy being made by delivering to the within-named defendants a true copy of the within execution, and therewith a true copy of a notice of sale, setting forth that the above-described property would be sold on the 27th day of June, 1908." Prior to the date set for the sale, the sheriff was restrained from making the same. The restraining order was dissolved on the 7th day of July, 1908, and on the following day the sheriff, without a further levy, posted notices stating that the sale would occur on the 18th day of July. Before the last-named day, the affidavit and bond were served. On July 7th Sadie Wareham, for a recited consideration of $1,600, conveyed to the appellant by an instrument in writing an undivided two thirds of all the wheat then growing on the leased land. This instrument was filed for record July 8th. The appellant was not a party to the proceeding in which the judgment was entered upon which the execution was issued and the attempted levy made. The court, inter alia, instructed the jury as follows: "It is undisputed in this case that a valid levy was made upon this property by the sheriff. You have nothing to do with how the sheriff makes a levy, whether he goes out and puts up notices, or how. Therefore it must be taken as affirmed by the evidence that a valid levy was made somewhere back in June; that testimony is here before you, and not disputed. The evidence is undisputed that the sale under that levy was restrained by this court; that after that time that restraining order was set aside; and I instruct you that, after the first levy, the property was in the custody of the law, and that during that time no person could acquire any title as against the sheriff, and, as against that title, could not acquire any title." At the conclusion of the instructions, in answer to an inquiry by a juror, the court further instructed: "He can't be the owner now if not prior to the levy in June. He can't be the owner now unless before that time." Appellant properly excepted to these instructions, and has assigned error upon them.

It will be observed that the appellant acquired his interest in the subject-matter in litigation after the attempted levy. We have seen that the sheriff did not actually seize the property, and that he did nothing in the way of executing the writ except to post notices of sale and deliver a copy of the execution and notices to the judgment debt-

ora. Did this constitute a constructive seizure? We think not. The Code (2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 5362 [Pierce's Code, § 522]) provides that "personal property capable of manual delivery shall be attached by taking into custody;" and § 5269 (§ 864) provides that "property shall be levied on in like manner and with like effect as similar property is attached [and] until a levy, personal property shall not be affected by the execution." We think these are the only provisions of our statute touching the levy of a writ of execution upon personal property. The return does not show that the sheriff went upon, or even saw, the property; nor did he constitute the judgment debtors, or either thereof, or any other person, his agent to keep possession of it. In fact, he had no possession, either actual or constructive, to intrust to another.

In State v. Poor, 20 N. C. 519, (4 Dev. & B. L. 834) 34 Am. Dec. 387, a constable, having a writ of attachment in his possession, sought to levy upon a growing crop without going on the land upon which the same was growing. He returned the writ indorsed: "Levied on a field of growing grain of Thomas Poor." Speaking to the legal effect of the attempted levy, it is said: "We think that it was correctly held by his Honor that the constable, by indorsing on the writ of attachment in the manner set forth in the case, that he had levied on the growing crop of the defendant in the attachment, did not acquire the legal possession thereof. To the levy of a writ upon personal property—whether a writ of attachment or of execution—the law requires a seizure. If, in the nature of the thing, actual seizure be impossible, then some notorious act as nearly equivalent to actual seizure as practicable must be substituted for it. The least that can be required in the levy on a growing crop is that the officer should go to the premises, and there announce that he seizes the same to answer to the exigency of his writ." In Taffts v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 47, 50, 73 Am. Dec. 610, 612, 613, the court, in construing the acts necessary to constitute a levy on personal property, said: "It may be admitted, as unquestionably the law is, that a levy may be good as against the defendant in the writ when it would not be good as to third persons. . . . But it cannot be necessary to pursue this inquiry. It is too plain for argument that there can be no levy when the officer does not even know the subject of the levy. As well might a sheriff stand in the street and levy upon the contents of a banking house as to stand in a store door at midnight, and claim that merely by standing there and preventing any person from coming into the store he had levied on the contents, whatever they were, of the store; and this, without having any knowledge of the general nature of the stock, much less of the particular description or value." In Nighbert v. Hornsby, 100 Tenn. 82, 86, 66 Am. St. Rep. 736, 738, 42 S. W. 1060, 1061, the sheriff was about to sell a certain lot of corn under execution when a replevin action was instituted to recover possession and prevent the sale, on the ground that no levy had been made. In holding the levy effectual the court said: "It was sufficient if, as indicated by the evidence mentioned, he went into the presence of the property in question with the power and purpose then and there to seize it under a valid execution, and, by virtue of the writ, really assumed control of the property, as upon a manual seizure, with the plaintiff's knowledge; and, having done that, then left the property in the plaintiff's custody, by his consent and with his promise to keep it safely until demanded for sale, first noting the fact of the levy upon another paper, and subsequently, in due season, making proper indorsement on the execution itself." In Jones v. Howard, 99 Ga. 451, 456, 59 Am. St. Rep. 231, 235, 27 S. E. 765, 767. The court, defining a levy upon personal property, said: "To the completion of a levy, seizure, either actual or constructive, is absolutely indispensable. Actual seizure is accomplished by a mancipation of the thing intended to be seized. A constructive seizure is accomplished by the actual reduction by the officer of the property intended to be seized to his own control. He must have brought such property so far under his subjection that he could exercise control over it. He must exercise, or assume to exercise, dominion by virtue of his writ. He must do some act for which he could be successfully prosecuted as a trespasser if it were not for the protection afforded him by the writ." "In general it may be said that it [the levy] shall be such a custody as to enable an officer to retain and assert his power and control over the property, and so that it cannot probably be withdrawn or taken by another without his knowing it." Hemmenway v. Wheeler, 14 Pick. 408, 25 Am. Dec. 411, 413. See also Meyer v. Missouri Glass Co. 65 Ark. 286, 67 Am. St. Rep. 927, 45 S. W. 1062.

It is not necessary for us to decide whether a growing crop can be levied upon on a writ of execution, or, if so, how or under what circumstances it can be subjected to such process. In this case there was no levy made, and at the close of the trial the court should have directed a verdict for the appellant. He had shown that he was the owner of the grain. There was no evidence to the contrary. The respondents contend that no rights were acquired by the assignment to Sadie Wareham, it not appearing that it was made with the lessor's consent. This position is untenable for three reasons: (1) Because there is no nonassignment clause in the lease; (2) at the time of the trial the crop had been harvested and marketed; (3) if the lessor had an implied right of re-entry in case of assignment without his consent, the right was lost by nonaction. This case is therefore distinguishable from Tipton v. Martzell, 21 Wash. 273, 75 Am. St. Rep. 838, 57 Pac. 806.

The judgment will therefore be reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the appellant for the grain and its proceeds, and for costs of suit.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLES BERNS, Appt.,
v.

A. E. SHAW.

(— W. Va. —, 24 S. E. 930.)

Equity — jurisdiction — gaming contract — recovery of money.

1. Courts of equity have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law in suits to recover back money lost in gaming contracts, regardless of the question of necessity for discovery.

Gaming — partnership.

2. As a general rule, there can be no partnership in an illegal business. This includes the business of gambling.

Same — participants — liability.

3. Where two or more person engaged in the business of gambling, by whatever ar-

Headnotes by MILLER, P.

Case Note. — Liability of one party to an arrangement to share profits from gambling, for money lost by a third person to the other party.

This note does not include cases involving the liability of person whose only interest in the gambling or betting was a percentage of the winnings for the use of his house, paraphernalia, etc.

The few reported cases upon this subject seem to be unanimous in holding that where several parties enter into a conspiracy to win the money of a third person by gambling or betting, each member of the conspiracy is jointly and severally liable to the person losing the money, under statutes allowing the recovery of money lost by gambling. Although, as pointed out in BERNS v. SHAW, a partnership cannot, strictly speaking, exist for the conduct of an illegal business. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) arrangement the business is conducted, if all are to share in the profits, and money is lost to them, they are all joint tortfeasors, and liable jointly or severally, and may be sued jointly or severally by the loser to recover the money lost to them.

Same — recovery of money — cross answer.

4. In a suit in equity by one to recover back money lost by him to another in a gambling contract, the defendant may, by a cross bill or a cross answer, also recover back money lost by him to plaintiff in such gambling contract.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Marion County dismissing a bill filed to recover money lost in a gambling transaction. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cornwell & Abbaticchio for appellant.

Messrs. C. Powell and Harry Shaw for appellee.

Miller, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit in equity under §§ 3435 and 3437, Code 1906, to recover $335 alleged to have been lost by plaintiff to defendant in March, 1904, in playing the game called "roulette." The suit was commenced in the intermediate court of Marion county, where on bill, answer, and proof the plaintiff's bill was dismissed on the ground, as recited in the decree appealed from, that the suit could not be maintained against defendant alone, the evidence showing that D. E. Thomas was a partner with Shaw in the transaction and a necessary party to the suit; and upon his petition, presented to the circuit court, the plaintiff was denied an appeal and supersedeas to said decree, and he has brought the case here.

The appellee claims that, regardless of the ness, yet the courts hold the conspirators jointly and severally liable as if a partnership did in fact exist between them.

Thus, where the statute provided that the person losing by means of a wager or bet may recover from the "winner or winners," the court said in Lear v. McMillen, 17 Ohio St. 464: "If the plaintiffs in error were in fact jointly engaged in maintaining and carrying on an illegal business of gaming, it is not for them to set up the illegality of the business, or of the contract between them, to defeat their joint liability. It is a well-known rule of law that when an illegal conspiracy is proven, the acts of each conspirator are held as the acts of all. It is true their illegal contract is not binding between them, but it is binding upon them. It gives them no legal rights, but it imposes upon them legal liabilities. Having estabreason given by the intermediate court therefor, the decree dismissing the bill was clearly right for want of equity, and it should have been dismissed on demurrer. This presents the question argued here on both sides, whether the remedy in equity given by § 3437 is cumulative of the remedy at law given by the preceding § 3436, or is available only where some discovery is necessary and the remedy at law inadequate. Said § 3437 provides: "Such loser may file a bill in equity against such winner, who shall answer the same, and upon discovery and repayment of the money or property so won, or its value, such winner shall be discharged from any forfeiture or punishment which he may have incurred for winning the same." The appellee insists that, as the bill shows no necessity for discovery, but, on the contrary, that plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law, given by § 3436, a court of equity is without jurisdiction. The allegations of the bill in effect simply charge that plaintiff lost to defendant the said sum of money, and prays for a discovery by defendant of the money so won by him from plaintiff, and for a decree for the money.

These statutes have come down to us through Virginia, practically unchanged, from Stat. 9 Anne, chap. 14, 2 Kelly's Rev. Stat. Anno. (W. Va.) p. 646; White v. Washington, 5 Gratt. 645. Story says (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 303, p. 307), referring to jurisdiction in equity to suppress gaming contracts: "No one has doubted that lished their joint proprietorship, the defendant in error, by proving the receipt of money by one, proved its receipt by all, and entitled himself to a joint recovery against all. The real 'winners' of the money are the proprietors of the business, who by the terms of the contract between them,—no matter if it be an illegal contract,—are to furnish the funds, pay the losses, and receive the winnings."

And where the jury found that the defendant and two others gambled with the plaintiff under a secret agreement to divide the money won from him between them, it was held in Preston v. Hutcheson, 29 Vt. 144, that the defendant was liable for the money won by a confederate. The court said that all were principals, and each was liable for the acts of the other, and they might be sued jointly or severally; and a judgment against one was not, while unsatisfied, a bar to an action against the others.

So, in McGrew v. City Produce Exchange, 85 Tenn. 572, 4 Am. St. Rep. 771, 4 S. W. 38, it was held that when it appeared that several had unlawfully combined and confederated to gamble with and defraud another through a selected party, each confederate participating was liable for the entire amount received, as the money was received for all and by all, according to the devised illegal method under which they were all jointly operating.

And the McGrew Case was followed in Dunn v. Bell, 85 Tenn. 581, 4 S. W. 41, although it does not appear in this case that there was any conspiracy. It was held that where a number of individuals are associated together to gamble on the rise and fall of the grain, cotton, or stock market, they are liable individually and jointly to the persons who lose money to them.

So, in Bynum v. Brady, 82 Ark. 603, 100 S. W. 66, a joint verdict against all of the defendants was sustained, where the evidence showed and the jury found that they had conspired to win the plaintiff's money, although it passed into the hands of one man.

The following instruction, given to the jury and approved by the court in the Bynum Case, well expresses the distinction recognized in the majority of cases between the liability of persons who conspire to cheat another of his money, and of those who merely participate in the game: "But, if the money was won by somebody else besides these men, or if there is any one or more of the defendants who did not win any of it, then you cannot find a verdict against all of the defendants, only against the men that won the money; that is, if you find that the money was won from the plaintiff by one or more of the defendants, then you can find for the plaintiff against such number of defendants, naming them, as won the money; and you will find for these defendants who didn't win the money, unless you find there was some concerted plan among them to deprive this man of his money in a poker game; then you will find against all who participated in it."

And in Laytham v. Agnew, 70 Mo. 48, it was held that if, in a game of poker, each man plays for himself, and there is no conspiracy of two or more to cheat another playing in the game, and no agreement to divide between them any amount they should win from him, each party in the game is liable to the loser only for the amount of the money he may win from him.

If the defendant bets money to which others have contributed, it has been held in some cases that he is liable for the whole amount lost.

Thus in Garrison v. McGregor, 51 Ill. 473, the court said that what private arrangements the defendant might have had with outside parties as to the distribution of the winnings could not affect the right of the plaintiff to recover back the amount from the party to whom he lost it and with whom the bet was made.

And to the same general effect was the decision in Wilson v. Gardner, 28 Ind. 188, where the liability was incurred under the statute by receiving the money won on the bet.

But, in Zielly v. Warren, 17 Johns. 192, where others were concerned in the bet, and contributed to it, and received part of the winnings, it was held that, in an action to recover back the money, the plaintiff was feasons. But plaintiff positively swears that the $40 he got personally was the amount he had paid for checks. He admits that he furnished some checks to his brother, but he thinks his brother lost some money before he went into the game. Inasmuch as Thomas gave the $100 to plaintiff's brother, and inasmuch as he declared the game off as having been played unfairly, and defendant stopped payment on his check, the evidence as a whole supports the claim of the plaintiff, rather than that of defendant, that the plaintiff got back only the money he had actually paid for checks, and that the money paid him and his brother did not represent losses of defendant to them. As the burden was on defendant to make out his case by a clear preponderance of the evidence, we find the fact against him on this issue.

We are therefore of opinion, upon the whole case, to reverse the judgment below, and to pronounce the decree here which we think the intermediate court should have pronounced,—that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of $388.80, being the principal sum lost, with interest to the date of the judgment appealed from, with interest thereon from the 28th day of November, 1906, the date of said decree, together with his costs by him in this court and in the intermediate court in this behalf expended.

MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK

v.

MARION R. CRIST et al., Exrs., etc., of Mary E. Crist, Deceased, et al., Appts.

(— Iowa —, 118 N. W. 394.)

Will—provision for support—trust.

1. No trust, but merely a personal liability of the children, is created by a will directing them to provide testator's husband with necessities and take good care of him the remainder of his life, and making such support a lien on property devised to them.

Equity—bill to reach trust property.

2. A judgment creditor of one whose support is made a lien upon property devised to persons charged with the duty of furnishing it may maintain a bill in equity to subject the property so far as necessary to the payment of whatever amount should be paid towards the satisfaction of it by such persons.

Husband—statutory rights—surrender—rights of creditor.

3. The surrender by a husband of his statutory rights in his wife's estate, and his acceptance of a provision for support in lieu thereof, contained in her will, does not entitle his creditors to subject the benefit accruing to him under the will to the payment of their claims if it could not otherwise be reached by them.

Creditors' bill—duty to furnish support.

4. The duty imposed upon children by their mother's will to furnish care, support, and necessities to their father, which is made a charge on property devised to them by her, is not to pay money which can be reached by the father's general creditors, until the children have failed to perform it.

(November 23, 1908.)

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Wright County in plaintiff's favor in a suit to subject a duty to furnish support to the payment of a judgment against the beneficiary. Reversed.

Case Note.—May provision in will for support of a person, which is made a lien or charge upon property devised or bequeathed to others, be reached by his creditors.

Cases, where a trust is created out of which the support is payable, and also cases concerning wills which provide for the payment of annuities, have been expressly excluded from this note.

Aside from MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK v. CRIST and the cases therein cited and sufficiently reviewed, but one case has been found passing directly on the question here annotated. However, this case is practically on all fours with MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK v. CRIST. The case noted is Garner v. Wills, 92 Ky. 386, 17 S. W. 1023, where it was held that devises to children in a will by their mother, and a further provision that it was her desire that they should give to her husband a sum sufficient to support him in a comfortable manner and furnish to him a comfortable home and maintenance until his death, conditional that, upon their refusal to do so, the devises should become void, do not vest such an estate in the father as will permit the creditors of the latter to recover a sum equivalent to such support. The court in this case said: "It is to be observed that no estate in trust or otherwise is willed to B. W. Wills. The expression, 'a sum sufficient to support him,' etc., taken in connection with the subsequent clauses, was evidently intended to measure the duty imposed upon the devisees, and not to give him an estate in said sum, for the subsequent clause is mandatory upon them to furnish him a comfortable home and maintenance during his life, which includes everything, and upon their failure to support and maintain him the will is to be void, etc. It will be seen that no estate whatever is given to him, but it is all given absolutely to the devisees, except, by their failure to support and maintain their father during his life, the will is to be void and the estate distributed according to the statutes of distribution. . . . Suppose they Maxwell v. Wood, 133 Iowa, 721, 111 N. W. 203; Riddle v. Beattie, 77 Iowa, 168, 41 N. W. 606.

McClain, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The deceased wife of John M. Crist died possessed of property of the value of about had entered voluntarily into an obligation to support him during life,—could the benefit secured by that obligation be subjected to his debts? We think not, unless the fruit of the obligation was shaped into an estate in him, then, in that case, it could be subjected to his debts. So, here, the obligation to support him was, as far as he is concerned, voluntary, the consideration for that obligation moving from one who was under no obligation to support him, and the donation made is not an estate that may be subjected to his debts unless he receives it and puts it together as an estate. To further illustrate, suppose he declined to receive a support from the devisees, and supported himself,—would a sum equivalent to such support be regarded as a trust fund for 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

his benefit? We think not, because the obligation to support him is entirely personal, and, if he refuses to accept it as needed, it belongs to the devisees."

A case closely related to the above is Gifford v. Rising, 51 Hun. 1, 3 N. Y. Supp. 392, where it was held that an annuity given by will to a son and his wife, payable out of an absolute devise of land to another son, was subject to the claims of the creditors of the annuitant, and the statement that it was for support did not render it exempt.

For cases on the right of one's creditors or personal representatives to make or control election for or against a will, or between different provisions of a will or statute, see case note to Re Fleming, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 379.

$12,000, which by her will was devised and bequeathed to the defendants, her children, subject to the following provision: "My beloved husband, John M. Crist, being now over seventy-two years of age, and incapable of taking an active part in business affairs of any kind, I hereby obligate and direct my said children to provide him all of the necessities and take good care of him for the remainder of his life, and I hereby make his support and care for life a lien upon the property above mentioned. This provision in favor of my husband is made in lieu of his distributive share in the property that I own at the time of my death." The three children were by the will designated as executors of the estate, and authorized to sell and convey real or personal property without order of court. The surviving husband, being duly served with notice of the provisions of the will, filed his written election to accept such provisions in lieu of his distributive share in his wife's estate. Plaintiff asked to have the provision made in the will in behalf of the surviving husband subjected to the payment of its judgment, and the court found that the care and support which the defendants were, by the will, bound to provide for their father, was of the value of at least $325 per year during the remainder of his life, and decreed that defendants, as executors, pay to the clerk of the district court, to be applied on plaintiff's judgment, semiannually, the sum of $162.50 so long as their father should live, until plaintiff's judgment should be satisfied.

It will be noticed from the paragraph of the will above quoted that the executors are not made trustees for the purpose of carrying out its provisions in behalf of the surviving husband, but their duty is to settle the estate, and to distribute the property among themselves as devisees and legatees; the duty to support and care for their father being a duty imposed upon them individually, and the charge therefor being made a lien on the property devised and bequeathed to them. We think that the court erred in entering a decree evidently contemplating the control of the property by the executors so long as the husband should survive, and thus in effect creating a trust fund, the proceeds of which should be applied so far as necessary to make the payments upon plaintiff's judgment. No complaint of the decree on this ground is made by the appellants; but, for the purpose of properly disposing of the questions argued by counsel, it is necessary to consider the law in this respect, and we find that the will does not create any trust, but imposes a duty upon the three children, as devisees, to support and care for their father. This duty would become obligatory upon them by the acceptance of the provisions of the will in their behalf. Inasmuch, however, as the charge for care and support was made a lien upon the property, plaintiff has properly proceeded in equity to subject the property so far as is necessary to the payment of whatever amount should be paid by defendants individually toward the satisfaction of plaintiff's judgment.

That the provision for the surviving husband is not in the nature of a trust is decided in Riddle v. Beattie, 77 Iowa, 168, 41 N. W. 606, wherein the plaintiff, who had conveyed real estate to one Townsend in consideration of Townsend's agreement to furnish support to plaintiff during life, asked to have such agreement enforced in equity as against the defendant, who had taken a conveyance of the land from Townsend, assuming the obligation to furnish the agreed support of plaintiff. In that case the court said: "The facts alleged in the petition do not establish a trust, arising either between plaintiff and Townsend, or plaintiff and Townsend and defendant. The petition shows that Townsend undertook to support plaintiff, and, in consideration of such agreement, the land was conveyed to him. There is not a word in the petition showing a trust arising in the transaction. Defendant held the absolute title, free from any trust, and became liable to plaintiff as upon any other contract, in case he failed to perform his obligation to support her. Defendant assumed and undertook to carry out Townsend's contract, and, of course, became bound just as he was bound by the obligation of the contract, and not as a trustee." So in this case, the children, by accepting their mother's property,—and we assume that they have accepted the provisions of the will in their behalf by becoming executors thereof,—have become bound to perform the duty imposed upon them by the will to support and care for their father, and the only substantial difference in principle between the case before us and the case cited is that here the charge is made a lien upon the property.

As the will creates no trust, the argument for appellants, based on the doctrine of spendthrift trusts, so called, which is that, where property is left to a trustee, the proceeds to be used for the support of a designated beneficiary, the interest of such beneficiary may not be subjected to the payment of his debts, is not pertinent, and we need not stop to discuss the question, as to which many authorities are cited, whether, in the absence of a specific provision terminating the rights of a beneficiary in case of bankruptcy or insolvency, a limitation will be implied such as will deprive his creditors of any claim upon the proceeds which would otherwise be paid to the beneficiary. This court has given some recognition to the doctrine of spendthrift trusts in Olsen v. Youngerman, 136 Iowa, 404, 113 N. W. 938, where it is held that the trustee and beneficiaries cannot, by mutual agreement, terminate such trust, and defeat the purpose of the donor to give to the beneficiary a support which shall be free from the claims of creditors. The courts in this country seem generally to have held that creditors cannot deprive such a beneficiary of the support provided for him out of trust property, at least, so long as it is in accordance with his station in life. Baker v. Brown, 146 Mass. 369, 15 N. E. 783; Seymour v. McAvoy, 121 Cal. 438, 41 L.R.A. 544, 53 Pac. 946; Johnston v. Zane, 11 Gratt. 552, 569; Wales v. Bowdish, 61 Vt. 23, 4 L.R.A. 819, 17 Atl. 1000; Roberts v. Stevens, 84 Me. 325, 17 L.R.A. 266, 24 Atl. 873; Lee v. Enos, 97 Mich. 276, 56 N. W. 550; Moore v. Simmons, 2 Head, 545; Stow v. Chapin, 21 N. Y. S. R. 38, 4 N. Y. Supp. 496; Wilder v. Clark, 33 N. Y. S. R. 143, 11 N. Y. Supp. 683. In some of these cases, emphasis is laid on the fact that the provision for the beneficiary is a mere gratuity, from which creditors should have no advantage; and in this respect the present case is materially different from those cited. Here the surviving husband was entitled to a one-third interest in his wife's estate of which no will of hers could deprive him without his consent; and the share of her property which he might have taken would have become liable to be subjected to satisfaction of the claims of creditors. It is very justly urged by counsel for appellee that the provision which the surviving husband accepted in lieu of his statutory share in his wife's estate was practically purchased by the surrender of such statutory share, and, if the benefit accruing to him under the will is of such nature that it can be subjected to the payment of his debts, there is no reason why it should not be thus subjected.

On the other hand, the surviving husband had a perfect right to relinquish his statutory share and accept the provision made in the will. This kind of an election cannot be controlled by creditors, although it may result to their disadvantage. Shields v. Keys, 24 Iowa, 298; Brightman v. Morgan, 111 Iowa, 481, 82 N. W. 954. Thus we have recently held that the election of a surviving husband to take the homestead for life, exempt from liability to his creditors, in lieu of a distributive share, which might have been subjected to the payment of his debts, is valid as against the creditors. Piekenbrock v. Knoer, 136 Iowa, 534, 114 N. W. 200. The fact, then, that the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) husband surrendered a right to property which might have been subjected to the payment of his debts, in exchange for the benefit which would accrue to him under the provision for his support, would not entitle his creditors to subject the benefit accruing to him out of such provision to the payment of their claims, unless the nature of the right accepted by him under the will is such that it may be reached by creditors.

We therefore reach the final question in this case, unencumbered by other considerations; and that is whether the provision in the will for the support of the surviving husband of testatrix, father of the defendants in this action, is such in its nature that his creditors may subject it to the satisfaction of their claims. It is to be noticed that testatrix obligates and directs her children to provide their father with all of the necessities, and to support and take good care of him for the remainder of his life. By way of security for the performance of such obligation and direction, she makes his support and care for life a lien upon the property devised by her to her children. The duty imposed is broader than that of providing for support. It involves the care of the father; and, as reasonably interpreted, such care as children owe to an aged and infirm parent. It may be that, so far as the care required goes beyond the furnishing of necessities and support, the duty could not be enforced in courts of law by reason of the impracticability of measuring the value of such care in money; and it follows that some of the benefits, at least, which the surviving husband was to receive under the provisions of this will, could not be discharged by paying to his creditors the cost of his support.

It is to be borne in mind that the question now before us is as to the right of plaintiff to compel defendants to pay money to be applied in the satisfaction of their father's debt as a full or partial discharge of their obligations to their father; and plaintiff's claim to have defendants' obligations converted into money and applied to the satisfaction of its judgment cannot be greater in extent than the father's right to enforce payment of money in satisfaction, wholly or in part, of defendants' obligation, in the absence of any claim by creditors. In other words, it is not for the plaintiff, a creditor, by intervening between the beneficiary under this provision of the will and the devisees, to convert the duty of the latter into an obligation to pay money, unless such an obligation could be enforced by the beneficiary himself. To put it in another way, the rights of creditors, in the absence of any allegation and proof of fraud, cannot be higher than the rights of the benefficiary, for we are now concerned only with determining the pecuniary liability of the defendants. The question at once suggests itself whether the father could, by his own act, and without any breach of the duty imposed on his children by accepting the property under the will, convert his claim against them for support and care into a claim for money. We have frequently had occasion, in cases arising out of a claim for care and support for life in consideration of a conveyance of property, to recognize the principle that only when such care and support is not furnished as contemplated in the conveyance can the grantor have relief in the courts. Patterson v. Patterson, 81 Iowa, 626, 47 N. W. 768; Walker v. Walker, 104 Iowa, 505, 73 N. W. 1073; Lewis v. Wilcox, 131 Iowa, 268, 108 N. W. 536; Gardner v. Lightfoot, 71 Iowa, 577, 32 N. W. 510; Johnson v. Johnson, 52 Iowa, 586, 3 N. W. 661; Kent v. La Rue, 136 Iowa, 113, 113 N. W. 547. Thus, in Newman v. French, 138 Iowa, 482, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 218, 116 N. W. 468, it is said that only when the obligation to support, which has been contracted for as the consideration of an agreement to convey, has been fully performed, can the contract be enforced in an action for specific performance, and it is suggested that only when the person to be supported has had reason for declining to receive the support provided or tendered in performance could he insist that the continuing obligation had been broken.

In the light of these cases, we think it clear that the duty to furnish care and support to an aged and infirm parent is not primarily a duty to pay money for that purpose, but rather a duty to give the care and support in the family which is usually given to parents without other home; and that no duty to pay money arises until there is a failure to furnish to the parents such a home as the natural relations of the parties would suggest as the proper performance of the obligation. This is the obligation which was clearly contemplated in the provision of the will now under consideration, and we think that, until defendants have failed to furnish such support, no duty to pay money can be implied either in favor of the father himself or of his creditors. The duty was a personal one, involving services rather than compensation, and convertible into an obligation to make compensation only by a failure to render such services. Plainly, the father could not have assigned to another his right to receive care and support during his life. The service required was so distinctly a personal service to the father that it could not be converted by him into a money claim. Why, then, should plaintiff be allowed to convert it into a money claim and compel defendants to pay money by way of substitution for the rendition of the personal services which they are willing and able to render? What is said in Slattery v. Wason, 151 Mass. 266, 7 L.R.A. 393, 21 Am. St. Rep. 448, 23 N. E. 843, with reference to the claim of a creditor to subject the interest of a beneficiary who, under the provisions of a will, was entitled to support from a child who was devisee, seems peculiarly applicable here: "One answer to this is that the court will not interfere to change the relations of the parties at the request of a stranger. The owner of the fund is not a trustee, and his mother is not a cestui que trust, who, or whose representatives, can call him to account as a trustee. He is the absolute owner of the fund, subject to the charge of his mother's support. He owes a duty to his mother, and she has a right against him. So long as the parties are satisfied, there is no occasion for any court to interfere with them. If he fails to perform his duty, the court, on her application, will in some way protect her rights. It may require him to give security, or it may organize a trust fund and make him or some other person trustee, and thus change the relation of the parties and the character of the fund; but the court ought to thus interfere and act only at the instance of the party in interest, and to protect her rights under the will by carrying out the intention of the testator. It will not, without her complaint, and against her wishes, interfere at the suit of a third party to institute a trust, and to change the character of the fund and the relation of the parties to it, in order to defeat the intention of the testator, not only as to his daughter-in-law, but also as to his grandson. The whole fund is given to the grandson, charged only with the support of his mother. Whatever is not required for her support is his to enjoy. What is paid to her creditors is not used for her support, although it is paid by him. If the court should attempt to recoup his loss by limiting the amount which he should be liable to pay for his mother's support to the amount he is to pay to her creditors, while this would deprive her of a right of support under the will, it could not relieve him from his statutory obligation to support her. If, however, the relations of the parties and the circumstances were such that the court would fix and secure to Mrs. Wason [the beneficiary] the amount which should be paid to her for her support, it would take care that by so doing it did not change the condition of the property, so as to defeat, instead of carrying out, the intention of the testator. If such action was sought by Mrs.

Wason to protect her rights, the decree should be so framed as not to render the right alienable. When the parties do not desire the aid of the court, it will not interfere at the suit of a creditor to change the condition of the property, and thereby give him rights which the will alone does not give him, and which the testator did not mean that he should have."

The effect of sustaining the decree of the lower court in this case would be to require defendants to pay money in satisfaction of their father's debt out of property which in no sense belongs to the father, and which was not acquired from him, and, which is not held in trust for his benefit, but only subject to a charge in his behalf, and leave them still bound under the will to take good care of him for the remainder of his life, and bound under the statute to furnish him support; that is, the very support in lieu of which the court requires money to be paid. It was plainly the intention of testatrix to impose upon the defendants, as devisees, the general, moral, and statutory duty of providing for their father in his old age by furnishing him a home and the necessities of life. The parties have so construed the will; for, as appears in the record, the defendants have been living together as one family and furnishing a home to their father to his satisfaction. The only provision of the will which affects the property left to the defendants is that making the support and care for the father a lien upon the property in case of breach of duty by the defendants. The father may, no doubt, enforce against the property a lien for a money claim so far as the breach of duty of defendants can be compensated in money under the usual rules for measuring damages in case of a breach of such contract, but we are clearly of the opinion that plaintiff has no right to convert defendants' duty into an obligation to pay money, and thereby throw an additional burden on defendants, for it is to be assumed that, even after payment of the money which, by the decree, they are required to pay, they will continue to perform the obligations not only of the will, but of the statute, to care for and support their father.

For the reasons indicated, the decree is erroneous not only in imposing a continuing duty upon defendants as executors, but, also, if it be construed as defining the duty of defendants as devisees, in requiring payment by them individually of money towards the satisfaction of plaintiff's judgment.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

T. M. HARTSHORNE, Plff. in Err.,
v.

H. A. INGELS.

Crops — ownership.

Where there has been a recovery of the possession of land held adversely, the successful plaintiff is entitled to a matured crop of corn standing unsevered on such land at the time of the final judgment of ouster and delivery of possession of the premises to plaintiff under a writ of restitution.

Headnote by HAYES, J.

Case Note. — Right as between successful plaintiff and evicted defendant to crops unsevered at time of final judgment.

The rule followed in HARTSHORNE v. INGELS, which awards an unsevered crop to the successful plaintiff in ejectment, is one of general acceptance in the courts. The following authorities support it: McCaslin v. State, 99 Ind. 428; Harrod v. Burke, 76 Kan. 909, 123 Am. St. Rep. 179, 92 Pac. 1128; Huston v. Skaggs, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 593; Brothers v. Hurdle, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 490, 51 Am. Dec. 400; Phillips v. Key-saw, 7 Okla. 674, 56 Pac. 695; Kirtley v. Dykes, 10 Okla. 16, 62 Pac. 808; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 306; Walker v. Simkins, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 58; King v. Fowler, 14 Pick. 238; Craig v. Watson, 68 Ga. 115; Cox v. Hamilton, 69 N. C. 30; Altes v. Hinckler, 36 Ill. 275, 85 Am. Dec. 407. And see Baker v. McInturf, 49 Mo. App. 505.

The general rule of the common law upon this question holds that crops growing on land which is the subject of an ejectment action are part and parcel of the realty, and go to the successful plaintiff. Carlisle v. Killebrew, 89 Ala. 329, 6 L.R.A. 617, 6 So. 756.

The rule of the common law which entitles a successful claimant of land to the growing crops was held in Strode v. Swim, 1 A. K. Marsh. 366, to be unaffected by a law whose object was to secure to an ejected occupant a just remuneration for his labor and expense in ameliorating the land, but which nowhere conferred upon him, by express provision, a right to the growing crops, and did, in other respects, secure him ample indemnity for improvements.

In following the generally accepted rule, McLean v. Bovee, 24 Wis. 295, 1 Am. Rep. 185, holds that the successful plaintiff in ejectment takes both the standing and severed parts of a crop sown after the suit to recover the land had been begun.

And so, of course, a growing crop became the property of the plaintiff in ejectment ERROR to the Probate Court for Kay County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action of replevin to recover possession of certain corn. Reversed.

Statement by Hayes, J.:

This is an action of replevin wherein H. A. Ingels, defendant in error, plaintiff below, seeks to recover from T. M. Hartshorne, plaintiff in error, defendant below, the possession of 1,000 bushels of corn, grown and produced by plaintiff on the northeast quarter of section 8, township 26 north, range 2 east, Indian meridian, Kay county, during the year 1906. The case was tried to the court without a jury upon an agreed statement of facts. For some time prior to the 21st day of June, 1905, a contest had been pending before the Secretary of the Interior between defendant, T. M. Hartshorne, and one F. A. McKee, to determine who had the right to take as a homestead the land upon which the corn was grown. Pending the contest, McKee occupied that portion of the quarter section upon which the corn was grown. The contest having been decided by the Secretary of the Interior in favor of Hartshorne, he instituted forcible entry and detainer action in one of the justice courts of Kay county to recover possession of that portion of the quarter section theretofore occupied by McKee. Judgment was rendered in the district court of Kay county on appeal on June 21, 1905, in favor of Hartshorne. Appeal from this judgment was taken to the supreme court of the territory, where it was dismissed. Certificate of such dismissal was filed in the district court of Kay county on October 4, 1906, and on October 19, 1906, a writ of restitution was served, whereby Hartshorne was placed in possession of the premises whereon the corn in controversy was then standing, fully matured, but ungathered. Plaintiff Ingels was not a party to the forcible entry and detainer action, but he had occupied and cultivated, during the year 1906, as tenant of McKee, the land upon which the corn was grown. He had no contract with Hartshorne in reference to the land cultivated by him or the corn grown thereon. It is agreed that the corn was seasonably planted and cultivated by plaintiff as the tenant of McKee during the year 1906, and that, at the time of the dismissal of the appeal in the supreme court in the forcible entry and detainer action, said corn crop was standing in the field fully and completely matured, unharvested, and unsevered from the soil, and that it was standing in that condition when the writ of restitution was when he was the prevailing party, where the crop in question was not sown by the defendant until after final judgment of ouster, execution thereon having been for a time suspended. Oyster v. Oyster, 32 Mo. App. 270; Davis v. Callahan, 66 Mo. App. 168.

In Samson v. Rose, 65 N. Y. 411, a landlord was held entitled to recover crops which had been sown and harvested by a sublessee subsequent to the beginning of an action to eject defendant for nonpayment of rent. These crops were severed at the time of final judgment or actual entry by the landlord, but, by statutory enactment, the beginning of the action was deemed to be a re-entry, and so the landlord was conclusively presumed to have taken possession at the moment of the service of the complaint.

In Hodgson v. Gascoigne, 5 Barn. & Ald. 88, the act of a sheriff in refusing to sell the growing crops of a tenant in satisfaction of a writ of fieri facias was upheld where there was also in his hands a writ against the tenant, awarding possession of the land to his landlord as plaintiff in ejectment. The court said: "The property in the growing corn in fact was not vested in the tenant at the time of the seizure, for, after the judgment was obtained in ejectment, the defendant is to be considered, in point of law, as a trespasser from the day of the demise laid in the declaration; from that time, therefore, the property was divested out of him, and he had no property at the time when the fieri facias was delivered to the sheriff."

Affirming the general rule that a plaintiff's recovery in ejectment entitles him to growing crops, Rowell v. Klein, 44 Ind. 290, 15 Am. Rep. 235, applies this doctrine so as to allow a recovery against a tenant of the ejected owner for crops sown with knowledge pending the ejectment action, and harvested after judgment.

And so, as between the mortgagee of growing crops, who has acquired his interest pending the action, and a successful plaintiff in ejectment, the right to the crops is in the latter, the mortgagee standing in place of the defending occupant. Huerstal v. Muir, 64 Cal. 450, 2 Pac. 33.

While the successful plaintiff in ejectment is generally entitled to growing crops, such is not the rule where he has recovered rent for the current year. Where the judgment includes a recovery of rent, the ejected defendant is entitled to remove his growing crops or a pro rata share of them, where rent is recovered for part of the year only. Gardner v. Kersey, 39 Ga. 664, 99 Am. Dec. 484. And see Craig v. Watson, supra.

Where a statute provides that an occupant, in case of ejectment, shall be entitled to enter the land and remove all crops sown thereon previous to the entry of judgment against him, an evicted defendant is warranted in removing such crops, although it is adjudged that the successful plaintiff was the owner and entitled to possession of the land before the crops in question were actually sown. Bloemendal v. Albrecht, 79 Minn. 304, 82 N. W. 585.

served on the 19th day of October, 1906. The judgment of the district court was in favor of plaintiff for the possession of the corn. From this judgment a proceeding in error was taken by defendant to the supreme court of the territory, where it was pending at the time of the admission of the state, and it is now before this court under the provisions of the enabling act (act Congress June 16, 1906, 34 Stat. at L. 267, chap. 3335) for final disposition.

Mr. L. A. Maris, for plaintiff in error:

Where there is a recovery of land held adversely, the successful plaintiff is entitled to the standing unsevered crops, as against the one who planted them.

Hayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded, correctly, we think, by counsel for plaintiff, that plaintiff's rights are identical with the rights of his landlord, McKee. McKee occupied the land prior to the time he was ousted therefrom by the writ of restitution, under a claim that he had a right to homestead the same. He was therefore holding the land adversely to Hartshorne, the plaintiff in the ejectment suit and defendant in this action. Phillips v. Keysaw, 7 Okla. 674, 56 Pac. 695. The question, therefore, presented by this appeal, is whether the crops cultivated and grown and fully matured are personal property as between the successful plaintiff in an action of ejectment and the evicted defendant, who held the premises in adverse possession.

Plaintiff relies principally upon Hecht v. Dettman, 56 Iowa, 679, 41 Am. Rep. 131, 7 N. W. 495, 10 N. W. 241, and First Nat. Bank v. Beegle, 52 Kan. 709, 39 Am. St. Rep. 365, 35 Pac. 814, as supporting his contention that matured crops, as between the successful plaintiff in an ejectment suit and the evicted adverse holder, do not follow the real estate, although, at the time of the ouster, such crops are standing unsevered upon the premises in controversy. We do not think that these cases are directly in point, and should control us in the decision of this case. There is some conflict among authorities as to when growing crops are to be regarded as personal property, and when they are to be regarded as a part of the realty. The weight of authorities supports the rule that annual crops—fructus industriales—are subject to levy and sale as chattels for the debts of the owner; but, as between the grantor and the grantee, and as between the mortgagor and the purchaser at a foreclosure sale, they are a part of the realty, and pass with the realty upon which they stand to the grantee or purchaser, unless reserved. In Hecht v. Dettman the defendant was a tenant of a mortgagor against whom foreclosure had been made. The plaintiff was the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, and, at the time of the execution by the sheriff of the deed to plaintiff, defendant, as tenant of the mortgagor, had standing upon the mortgaged premises a crop of grain, then mature and ready for harvesting, but unharvested. The court held that the matured grain, although unsevered, was personal property, and did not pass with the realty under the foreclosure deed. The court supported its conclusion with the reasoning that, the grain being mature, the course of vegetation had ceased, and the soil was no longer necessary for its existence; that the connection between it and the ground was changed, and the ground no longer performed any office than to afford a resting place for the grain. First Nat. Bank v. Beegle is based upon a state of facts very similar to the facts in Hecht v. Dettman, and the court therein holds that, as between the tenant of the mortgagor and the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, unsevered matured crops upon mortgaged premises are personal property, and do not follow the realty, and that the character of the crops as personalty is determined by its immaturity or maturity, and not by the fact that it is severed or unsevered.

This rule of the courts of Iowa and Kansas we do not believe to be in harmony with the weight of authorities, but, whether it is or not, we think that the rule therein announced does not apply to the facts in the case at bar, and that the decided weight of authorities is that unsevered crops, although mature, are a part of the realty as between the plaintiff in an ejectment suit and the evicted defendant. When the crops become severed, they are then regarded as personal property. Upon this question there is but little or no conflict among the authorities. Phillips v. Keysaw, supra. Tripp v. Hasceig, 20 Mich. 254, 4 Am. Rep. 388, is a case wherein the grantor brought replevin for a crop of matured corn standing in the field unharvested at the time of the conveyance. The court, in a well-reasoned opinion, supported by numerous authorities, follows the doctrine which is in direct conflict with the rule in Hecht v. Dettman and First Nat. Bank v. Beegle. The court in that case says: "It is true that the authorities, in alluding to this subject, very generally use the words 'growing crops' as those embraced by a conveyance of the land, but this expression appears to have been commonly employed to distinguish crops still attached to the ground, rather than to mark any distinction between ripe and unripe crops." And, further speaking of the merits of this rule, the court said: "Indeed, the authorities are quite decisive that whether the crop of the seller of the farm goes with the land to the purchaser of the latter, when there is no reservation or exception, depends upon whether the crop is at the time attached to the soil, and not upon its condition as to maturity. And this seems to be the most natural and most practical rule. When parties are bargaining about land, the slightest observation will discover whether the crops are severed or not, and there will be no room for question or mistake as to whether they belong with the land or not, if owned by the vendor." In Wootton v. White, 90 Md. 64, 78 Am. St. Rep. 425, 44 Atl. 1026, the court said: "So long as the crop remains physically unsevered, it partakes of the nature of the realty as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. It forms part of the latter's security for the payment of the debt, and all persons dealing with the mortgagor in respect to it whilst it remains actually attached to the freehold deal subject to all the rights of the mortgagee, unimpaired and unaffected." In this case the court follows the rule that, as between the mortgagor or anyone claiming under him, and the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, the growing crop does not become personal property until it is actually severed from the land, and, in the absence of such severance, passes to the purchaser. In Mississippi the doctrine prevails that the execution of a mortgage vests in the mortgagee no estate in the land, but gives to him a lien thereon to secure the payment of the mortgage debt. In Reilly v. Carter, 75 Miss. 798, 65 Am. St. Rep. 621, 23 So. 435, the supreme court of that state, speaking through Mr. Justice Whitfield, now Chief Justice, said: "But after the deed has been delivered, and foreclosure sale has been confirmed, the mortgagee claims no longer under the mortgage, as a mortgagee, having a mere security for his debt, and no estate in the land, but he claims as absolute owner under a confirmed sale and deed, having the whole estate in the land, and all the unsevered crops as part of the land."

No case has been called to our attention by counsel, and we have been unable, after an extended investigation, to find any case, in which it has been held that growing crops, before severance from the soil, become personalty, and do not pass with the land to the successful plaintiff in an action of ejectment. In Craig v. Watson, 68 Ga. 115, Watson brought suit to recover of Craig the value of a crop of which Craig had obtained possession under a judgment in an action of ejectment, and which was standing at the time of the judgment upon the land, fully matured. The crop had been cultivated and produced by Watson. The court held that the crop passed with the realty under the judgment in the action of ejectment to Craig. Huerstal v. Muir, 64 Cal. 450, 2 Pac. 33, is a case in point. In that case Muir, who had cultivated the crop at the time he was evicted therefrom by a writ of restitution under a judgment in an ejectment action, was harvesting a standing crop of hay. The crop was partly cut and partly uncut. The writ of restitution was served by the sheriff, and Muir was removed from possession of the premises while he was in the act of cutting the crop. He brought an action for restitution of the premises for the purpose of harvesting the remainder of the crop, but the court held that the unsevered crop of hay was part of the realty, and passed to the plaintiff by virtue of the judgment in the action of ejectment. In Brothers v. Hurdle, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 490, 51 Am. Dec. 400, the evicted claimant in an action of ejectment brought his action against the plaintiff in the ejectment suit for conversion of crops of corn, peas, and beans that were upon the premises at the time he was evicted therefrom. The fodder had been pulled and shocked, and the peas and beans had been gathered and put into a crib on the premises. The court held that the crops which were attached to the land at the time the plaintiff in the ejectment action was put into possession passed with the premises and belonged to the plaintiff in the ejectment action, but that the fodder and that portion of the other crops which had been severed, although upon the premises at the time of ouster under the ejectment action, did not pass with the land, but remained the property of the evicted adverse holder. In Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, 2 Am. Rep. 462, the relation of the parties to the action is very similar to that between the parties in the case at bar. In that case the successful plaintiff in the ejectment action sought to recover by replevin a quantity of hay that had been cut upon the land at the time he recovered judgment in the ejectment action. The court, in a full and exhaustive opinion, lays down the rule that the severance of the crop from the premises constituted it personal property, and that the remedy of the successful plaintiff in an ejectment action is an action to recover rents and profits of the land. In this case the court refers to a distinction made by some cases between the rights of a trespasser and one who, under color of title, occupies the premises, cultivates a crop thereon to maturity, and severs the same from the soil. In some cases it is held that the successful plaintiff is entitled to all crops grown, harvested and unharvested, which are upon the premises when he is placed in possession. McCaslin v. State, 99 Ind. 428; McLean v. Bovee, 24 Wis. 295, 1 Am. Rep. 185. A similar rule is to be found in McGinnis v. Fernandes, 135 Ill. 69, 25 Am. St. Rep. 347, 26 N. E. 109. In this case, at the time of judgment on the mandate from the supreme court in an action of ejectment wherein the plaintiff had recovered, the evicted defendant had upon the premises involved in the ejectment action a crop of corn which had been cut and placed in shocks thereon. The evicted defendant refused to deliver possession of the corn. An action of replevin was brought, in which the court held that plaintiff was entitled to recover. The court in this case based its decision upon the theory that the evicted defendant was a trespasser, and had no right to plant or cultivate the crop, and that the act of cutting and severing the crop from the soil was also the act of a trespasser, and did not destroy plaintiff's title to the crop. Other courts, however, have held that, where a trespasser cultivates and severs a crop, it becomes his property, even against the owner of the land. Lindsay v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 29 Minn. 411, 43 Am. Rep. 228, 13 N. W. 191; Adams v. Leip, 71 Mo. 597. In Baker v. McInturff, 49 Mo. App. 505, defendant, who had 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

been the tenant of plaintiff the preceding year, wrongfully retained possession of the premises after the expiration of his term, under a claim that he had rented the same from another person who defendant alleged was the owner of the land, having acquired it under an alleged contract of sale from plaintiff. Defendant, during the time that he held over, planted and grew a crop of corn upon the premises. Plaintiff brought replevin to recover this crop of corn. The appellate court reversed the judgment of the trial court, in favor of the defendant, and, after holding that defendant was in the same position as an intruder, said: "It is the well-settled law of this state that where an intruder upon land plants crops thereon, such crops, so long as they remain unsevered, are regarded as the property of the landowner,"—citing authorities. The rule at common law is that one who recovers land in an ejectment action is entitled to the crops then growing on the premises. Carlisle v. Killebrew, 89 Ala. 329, 6 L.R.A. 617, 6 So. 756, and authorities therein cited. And in the term "growing crops," as used in the authorities, is embraced not only crops that are immature, but crops that are mature and are still standing unsevered upon the premises. This rule is, so far as we have been able to find, supported by all the authorities directly in point, and is expressed at page 977, 12 Cyc. Law & Proc., in the following language: "Where a mere intruder upon land plants crops thereon, such crops, so long as they remain unsevered, are the property of the owner of the land. But one who sows, cultivates, and harvests a crop upon the land of another is entitled to the crop as against the owner of the land, whether he came to the possession of the land lawfully or not, provided he remains in possession till the crop is harvested."

The exact question which this case presents was never before the supreme court of the territory, but in Phillips v. Keysaw, 7 Okla. 674, 56 Pac. 695, the relation of the parties was the same as in the case at bar. The only difference between the facts of that case and the facts in this case is that the crops the recovery of which was sought by that action were growing, immature crops; but the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Tarsney in the opinion, and the entire court, speaking for themselves in the syllabus, announced the rule to be that crops, after maturity and severance from the soil, are, for all purposes, personal property; that, where there has been a recovery of the possession of the land held adversely, the successful plaintiff is entitled to the growing crops as against the evicted defendant who planted them; but, until such possession has been terminated by ouster, the person who cultivates and produces the crop and who holds the same adversely is entitled to the crops produced by his labor, which are harvested by him before he is ousted. Kirtley v. Dykes, 10 Okla. 16. 62 Pac. 808, is a case in which the facts are identical with those of Phillips v. Keysaw, and with the facts in the case at bar, except that the crops involved were not matured. Mr. Justice Irwin, speaking for an undivided court, says: "This court has held to the doctrine that, before crops grown upon realty could be regarded as personal property, it must not only have matured, but have been actually severed from the realty." These two cases are cited in Wakefield v. Dyer, 14 Okla. 92, 76 Pac. 151, with approval. In that case the court permitted the adverse claimant, who had been evicted, to retain the crops, which were matured and had been severed from the soil, and again stated the rule to be that, where the crops have matured and have been severed, the same become personal property. In none of these three cases decided by the supreme court of the territory was the question presented by the facts as to whether unharvested matured crops passed with the real estate under the judgment in ejectment to the plaintiff, or remained the property of the evicted defendant; but the expression of the court in all three of these cases, to the effect that, before maturity and severance, they are a part of the realty, and that, after maturity and severance, they are personal property as between the successful plaintiff in an action of ejectment and the evicted adverse claimant, we think is the correct rule, and is supported by the weight of authorities and the best reasoning.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed and the cause remanded.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

POTLATCH LUMBER COMPANY, Resp't.,
v.

GEORGE RUNKEL, Resp't.

ELIZA J. RUNKEL, Intervener, Appt.

(— Idaho, —, 101 Pac. 396.)

Attachment — intervention of third person — rights.

1. Under the provisions of § 4111 of the Revised Codes of this state, which authorize a third party to intervene who has "an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both," the owner or claimant of property attached in an action for debt has such an interest against both parties to the main action as entitles him to intervene for the purpose of asserting his right and title to the attached property.

Same — lien — effect.

2. Under the statute of this state (§ 4302, Rev. Codes), an attachment duly and regularly issued and levied becomes a lien on the property "as security for the satisfaction of any judgment that may be recovered." The attachment, therefore, is such a provisional remedy as reaches out and lays hold upon the property by proceeding in rem, and subjects it to the payment of the debt for the recovery of which the action was instituted.

Same — intervention of third person — rights.

3. The fact that the intervener has some other and adequate remedy for the protection of his property and rights is no bar to his right to intervene. If he has any interest in the matter in litigation, or in the success of either of the parties, he has a right to intervene.

(April 8, 1909.)

Case Note. — Right of third persons who claim property to intervene in attachment action.

In many states there are express and specific statutory provisions permitting intervention in attachment suits by persons owning the attached property, or having some interest therein or lien thereon. As a rule, decisions based upon such statutes have no bearing on the question here under consideration, and they are therefore not included herein. It may be observed, however, that, even under such statutory provisions, the right to intervene is generally limited to the purposes expressly provided for, and to the persons to whom it is apparent the statute was intended to apply. Bank of Fayetteville v. Spurling, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 398; Henry Petring Grocer Co. v. Eastwood, 79 Mo. App. 270; Cartwright v. Bamberger, 90 Ala. 405, 18 So. 264; May v. Courtney, 47 Ala. 185; McAbee v. Parker, 78 Ala. 573.

Thus, where intervention is allowed under certain circumstances where chattels, money, or other personal property is attached, intervention by one claiming to own real estate attached, or claiming a lien thereon, is not permissible. Copeland v. Piedmont & A. L. Ins. Co. 17 S. C. 116; Gordon v. McCurdy, 26 Mo. 304; Henry Petring Grocer Co. v. Eastwood, supra; Whitman v. Willis, 51 Tex. 421.

In many jurisdictions the right of a claimant to property attached, or one having a lien thereon, to intervene in the attachment proceeding, is based upon some statute permitting intervention in actions generally by persons not parties thereto, who are interested in the controversy or the success of any of the parties therein. Such statutes are APPEAL by intervener from an order of the District Court for Nez Percé County denying her the right to intervene in an action wherein certain property alleged to be owned by her had been attached as that of the defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. H. Langenfelter for appellant.

Mr. George W. Tannahill, for respondent:

The intervention is only an attempt of one creditor to prevent another creditor obtaining judgment against a common debtor; which is not permissible.

Horn v. Volcano Water Co. 13 Cal. 70, 73 Am. Dec. 569; Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. v. Churchill, 128 Cal. 633, 79 Am. St. Rep. 73, 61 Pac. 279; Isaacs v. Jones, 121 Cal. 257, 53 Pac. 794, 1101.

In ordinary attachments, third parties claiming only an interest in the property attached, and not in the subject-matter of the suit, cannot intervene in the main action, for the purpose of asserting their rights to the attached property.

Ryan v. Goldfrank, 58 Tex. 356; Pool v. Sanford, 52 Tex. 621; Rodrigues v. Trevino, 54 Tex. 198, Williams v. Bailey (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 834; Loving v. Edes, 8 Iowa, 427.

Allshie, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a final order made by the district judge, denying appellant's application and petition to intervene in an action entitled Potlatch Lumber Company, Plaintiff, v. George Runkel, Defendant. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant, George Runkel, for the recovery of a money judgment in the sum of $739.65 as the purchase price of a lot of fruit boxes. The defendant answered, admitting the purchase of the boxes, and pleading a separate defense and counterclaim. Subsequent to the issuance of the summons in the action, the plaintiff procured the issuance of a writ substantially similar to the one considered in POTLATCH LUMBER CO. v. RUNKEL. The doctrine of this case, as shown in the opinion, is supported by the majority of the cases considering the right of a third person under such a statute to intervene in an attachment proceeding, on the ground that he owns the property attached or has a lien thereon. Such persons are interested in the controversy, or the success of one of the parties to the suit, sufficiently to authorize them to intervene in the attachment suit and assert their claim to, or interest in, the attached property.

Pierre v. Masse, 7 Mart. N. S. 196; Lee v. Bradlee, 8 Mart. (La.) 55; Blackly v. Matlock, 3 La. Ann. 366; Letchford v. Jacobs, 17 La. Ann. 79; New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Beard, 16 La. Ann. 345, 79 Am. Dec. 582; Field v. Harrison, 20 La. Ann. 411; Gilkeson-Sloss Commission Co. v. Bond, 44 La. Ann. 841, 11 So. 220; H. B. Clafin Co. v. Feibelman, 44 La. Ann. 518, 10 So. 862; Gumbel v. Pitkin, 124 U. S. 131, 31 L. ed. 374, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379 (recognizing and applying the Louisiana doctrine); Davis v. Eppinger, 18 Cal. 378, 79 Am. Dec. 184; Speyer v. Ihmels, 21 Cal. 280, 81 Am. Dec. 157; Coghill v. Marks, 29 Cal. 673; Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co. 111 Cal. 386, 43 Pac. 1111; McEldowney v. Madden, 124 Cal. 108, 56 Pac. 783; Dennis v. Kolm, 131 Cal. 91, 63 Pac. 141; Langert v. Brown, 3 Wash. Terr. 102, 13 Pac. 704; Perkins v. Bailey, 38 Wash. 46, 107 Am. St. Rep. 831, 80 Pac. 177.

The doctrine of these cases is not entirely satisfactory, because based on the Louisiana cases, from which state the statute was adopted. The Louisiana cases were undoubtedly influenced more or less by other code provisions not adopted in the other states, which conferred upon opposition parties the right to intervene where such party pretends to be the owner of property seized, or where he contends that he has a privilege in the proceeds of the things seized and sold. As to just what extent these provisions influenced the Louisiana decisions is, however, questionable, as in one of the early Louisiana cases on the subject (New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. v. Beard, supra), in referring to the right of judgment creditors to intervene in an attachment suit, the court said that the interveners had a direct legal interest in the success of the defendant in defeating the attachment suit, for, by defeating the suit, they released the property attached from the operation of a superior privilege claimed by the plaintiff, and subjected the property, which was insufficient to pay all the claims upon it, to the satisfaction of their own judgment.

That intervention in an attachment case under these circumstances by virtue of this statute extends the right beyond the precise scope of the provision was apparently conceded in Speyer v. Ihmels, supra, wherein the court said: "Although the interveners have not a claim to or lien upon any property which is the direct subject of litigation in this action, they have a lien upon property which is held subject to the results of the litigation, and which would be lost to the interveners if the original action should proceed to judgment and execution. If the case does not fall within the precise definition of the cases in which intervention takes place, as given in § 659 . . . it is substantially within the object provided for by that section, and as that is a law only regulating modes of procedure, and not affecting rights of property, we think the interpretation given to it . . . should not be changed."

The view that such a statute does not confer upon third persons claiming ownership in or a lien upon attached property, the right to intervene in the attachment proceeding, was taken by the court in Lewis v of attachment against the defendant's property, and thereupon had a tract of 160 acres of land attached as the property of the defendant, but standing on the records in the name of Eliza J. Runkel, the wife of the defendant. After the levying of attachment, Mrs. Runkel, the appellant in this case, filed her petition and application, praying that she be allowed to intervene in the action and establish her right to the real estate attached, and have the cloud cast upon the same by the attachment removed. Appellant alleged in her petition that she was the wife of the defendant, George Runkel, and the absolute and sole owner of the tract of land attached in her separate and individual right, and that her husband had no interest, right, or claim whatever in or to the premises. She also alleged that she purchased the property wholly with her own money, received by her by inheritance from her father's estate. It was further alleged that the attachment cast a cloud upon her title, and would necessitate her maintaining a separate and independent action to remove such cloud if she were not allowed to intervene to show her right, title, and interest to the attached premises. The district court denied her application, and this appeal is prosecuted from that order.

The only question confronting us on this appeal is to determine whether or not the appellant has shown such "an interest in the matter in litigation in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both," as to entitle her to intervene and be-

Harwood, 28 Minn. 428, 10 N. W. 586, which denied to subsequent judgment creditors the right to intervene in an attachment suit wherein substantially all the common debtor's property was attached. The doctrine opposing the right to intervene in such cases was ably presented, and the California and Louisiana cases were considered and commented on. On this question the court said: "The subject-matter which the plaintiff presented to the court, by his complaint, for adjudication, was the indebtedness of the defendants to him upon the promissory notes. In a legal point of view, the interveners had no interest whatever in the question of the existence or nonexistence of such indebtedness. That was a matter wholly between the plaintiff and the defendants, with which no stranger had a right to interfere. When the judgment was entered against the defendants, the whole original subject-matter of the suit was disposed of; and the case presents the anomaly of a contention still going on, to eventuate in another and independent judgment, leaving the first judgment in full force. This is not intervention to protect an interest in the matter in litigation, but the introduction of a new subject of litigation. It is true, the new subject-matter grows out of the attachment; but a writ of attachment is a part of the remedy, and has nothing to do with the cause of action. If property is seized by virtue of the writ to which another has a better right, the vindication of such right involves a new and independent judicial inquiry. . . . It may be that it would be a convenient and useful practice to determine all questions as to the ownership and right of the avails of property seized on legal process in the suit in which the seizure was made, and to determine all questions of preference between different attaching or execution creditors in one of the suits, under proper regulations, devised to protect the rights of all parties; but to justify such a practice we are satisfied there ought to be a more distinct expression of the legislative will."

strued in Danker v. Jacobs, 79 Neb. 435, 112 N. W. 579, and held not to authorize a claimant of attached property to intervene in the attachment proceeding to question the grounds on which the writ was issued. It is to be noted, however, that that portion of the statute authorizing intervention by persons interested in the success of either party to the litigation was apparently not considered by the court in reaching its conclusion; at least, the language used in disposing of the question seems applicable only to that portion of the statute permitting intervention by persons interested in the matter in litigation. As to this feature of the statute, a distinction was drawn between "matter in litigation" and property affected by the levy. On this subject the court said: "We understand the matter in litigation in this case to be, not the real estate attached, nor the ownership thereof, but the debt owing by Jacobs [the defendant] to the plaintiffs, and the existence of the facts alleged in their petition for attachment. The interest that entitles a person to intervene must be of such a nature that he will gain or lose by the direct legal operation of the judgment. . . . A judgment for the plaintiffs in this case, and the sustaining of the attachment herein, in no way prevents the intervener from disputing Jacobs' ownership of the property attached in any other proceeding. Therefore his rights are not affected by the direct legal operation of the judgment, and it follows that the judgment of the district court was correct in this respect." And see to the same effect, Haines v. Stewart, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 216, 91 N. W. 539.

And see also Kimbro v. Clark, 17 Neb. 403, 22 N. W. 788, wherein this proposition finds support from the language used by the court, although the action was in the nature of a creditors' bill. These cases are not in conflict with Deere v. Eagle Mfg. Co. 49 Neb. 385, 68 N. W. 504, wherein a junior attaching creditor was permitted to intervene in a prior attachment suit and have the relative priorities of levies adjudicated, as the right to intervene in such an action is expressly conferred by the court.

come a party to the further proceedings in the action. Upon first impression, we were strongly inclined to believe that there was no merit in appellant's contention; but, the more we have examined into the matter and considered the statute, as well as the nature of appellant's claim, the more we are convinced that appellant should have been permitted to intervene in this action for the purpose of having the cloud cast by the attachment removed from her property, provided she could establish the allegations of her complaint to the effect that she is the sole and absolute owner of the property in her own right. Our statute authorizing intervention is § 4111 of the Revised Codes, and is as follows: "Any person may, before the trial, intervene in an action or proceeding, who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both. An intervention takes place when a third person is permitted to become a party to an action or proceeding between other persons, either by joining the plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint, or by uniting with the defendant in resisting the claims of the plaintiff, or by demanding anything adversely to both the plaintiff and the defendant; and is made by complaint, setting forth the grounds upon which the intervention rests, filed by leave of the court, and served upon the parties to the action or proceeding who have not appeared, and upon the attorneys of the parties who have appeared, who may answer or demur to it as if it were an orig-

In reaching the same conclusion under a substantially similar statute, it was said in C. J. L. Meyer & Sons Co. v. Black, 4 N. M. 352, 16 Pac. 620, that it was clear that the matter in litigation was the alleged indebtedness from defendant to plaintiff, and that one claiming ownership in property attached in such suit would not in any way be affected by any judgment which might be rendered therein. The fact of ownership or interest in the property attached does not make the property or its ownership one of the essential questions to be determined in the litigation between plaintiff and defendant. The ownership of the property would shed no light upon the fact in issue, namely, whether defendant was indebted to plaintiff.

The same conclusion was also reached in Loving v. Edes, 8 Iowa, 427, as to the right of intervention by one claiming land attached as the property of another. The court said: "It would make no kind of difference to him, as the owner of the land, whether it was or was not attached,—whether plaintiffs did or did not recover,—at least, so far as his rights could be affected in the present action. Though the plaintiffs might recover ten times over, his title would remain the same. If he claimed that by these proceedings, and it should appear, that thereby a cloud was cast upon his title, his remedy is well defined and understood. But we know of no precedent for quieting or determining the title to real estate, in the manner attempted in this instance."

This question has also arisen where the right to intervene was based on statutes permitting intervention in actions, generally by third persons interested in the matter in litigation, but where it did not appear from the decisions, at least, that the statutes contained the further provision found in the Louisiana and similar statutes, authorizing intervention in general, not only by persons interested in the matter in litigation, but also by persons interested in the success of either of the parties thereto. These cases construing statutes not containing this latter clause are in harmony in holding that a general statutory provision authorizing third persons interested in the matter in litigation (N.S.)

gation or controversy, to intervene therein, does not authorize a person not a party to an attachment suit, to intervene therein merely on the ground that he is the owner of, or claims some interest in, the property attached, or a lien thereon. Vallette v. Kentucky Trust Co. Bank, 2 Handy (Ohio) 1; Gates v. Pennsylvania Land & Lumber Co. 9 Ohio C. C. 378; Stanley v. Foote, 9 Wyo. 335, 63 Pac. 940 (statute similar to Ohio statute, follows Ohio decisions).

This view was stated as follows in Gates v. Pennsylvania Land & Lumber Co. supra: "The levy of an attachment before judgment is similar to a levy of an execution after judgment. The owner of personal property levied upon by an attachment, if different from the one against whom the attachment issues, does not intervene and settle his rights in that case, but must resort to an action in replevin. So, if levy is made upon real property, the owner does not intervene and ask that his rights to the property be determined in the original action, but he resorts to an independent action to assert his claim to the property attached. So that, as the statutes of the state now are, we do not believe that one simply claiming to own property upon which an attachment has been levied may intervene for the purpose of determining his rights and ownership to the property attached. Any judgment or order the court may make cannot affect his rights in the least; if he is the owner of the property before the judgment, he is the owner after judgment. He has all the remedies open to the owner of property for the protection of his property; but it must be by an independent action."

On the same subject in Vallette v. Kentucky Trust Co. Bank, the court remarked that the idea that a claim of a title to, or an interest in, the property attached, independent of any connection with the cause of action stated in the petition, would give the right to such claimant to appear and litigate with the plaintiff that cause of action, could not be successfully maintained.

This distinction is also made in Risher v. Gilpin, 29 Ind. 53, which holds that a inal complaint." This provision of our statute was copied from the California statute, and is identical with § 387 of the California Code of Civil Procedure. 3 Kerr's Code, p. 431. The California statute, in turn, was copied from Louisiana, and this is true with practically all the statutes of the middle and western states, authorizing intervention. This remedy was not known at common law, but seems to be a product of the civil law, and had its origin in this country in Louisiana. Hyman v. Cameron, 46 Miss. 725; note to Brown v. Saul, 16 Am. Dec. 177. The leading California case dealing with this statute is that of Horn v. Volcano Water Co. 13 Cal. 62, 73 Am. Dec. 569. The opinion in that case was written by Justice Field, and the right which will authorize an intervention is there defined as follows: "To authorize an intervention, therefore, the interest must be that created by a claim to the demand, or some part thereof, in suit, or a claim to, or lien upon, the property, or some part thereof, which is the subject of litigation." In support of this holding Louisiana cases are cited. In the Horn Case the California court permitted judgment creditors having judgment liens against the property involved in the litigation to intervene and set up their respective rights. The rights of third parties to intervene seem to have been frequent subjects of consideration before the supreme court of California immediately succeeding the adoption of this statute in 1854. In Speyer v. Ihmels, 21 Cal. 280, 81 Am. Dec. 157, and while Justice Field was still a member of the California supreme court, the question arose over the right of a subsequent attaching creditor to intervene in the suit of a senior attaching creditor, and there to urge the fraudulent character of the senior attachment. The court, in passing upon the interest, or, rather, the character of the interest, asserted by the intervener, said: "Although the interveners have not a claim to or lien upon any property which is the direct subject of litigation in this action, they have a lien upon property which is held subject to the results of the litigation, and which would be lost to the interveners if the original action should proceed to judgment and execution. If the case does not fall within the precise definition of the cases in which intervention takes place, as given in § 659 [practice act, Code Civ. Proc. § 387], and as explained in the case of Horn v. Volcano Water Co. supra, it is substantially within the object provided for by that section, and as that is a law only regulating modes of procedure, and not affecting rights of property, we think the interpretation given to it in the case of Davis v. Eppinger, 18 Cal. 378, 79 Am. Dec. 184, should not be changed." Since the decision in the Speyer-Ihmels Case, the California court has repeatedly held that a junior attaching creditor may intervene in the action of a senior attaching creditor for the purpose of testing the validity of the first attachment. McComb v. Reed, 28 Cal. 281, 87 Am. Dec. 115; Coghill v. Marks, 29 Cal. 673; Kim- provision in substance authorizing intervention by a person claiming an interest in the controversy did not apply to persons who did not claim an interest in the matter in litigation in which the attachment was issued, but merely claimed an interest in the property attached, and the court said that relief to such persons was by original suit.

In some jurisdictions, although no statutory provision permits the practice, third persons claiming an interest in attached property, or a lien thereon, are permitted to intervene in the attachment proceeding, and contest the right to the property attached, or defend the same, on the ground of fraud between the plaintiff and the defendant therein, or raise jurisdictional objections to the sufficiency of the proceedings. Campbell v. Morris, 3 Harr. & M. C. H. 552; Ranahan v. O'Neale, 6 Gill & J. 298, 26 Am. Dec. 576; Stone v. Magruder, 10 Gill & J. 383, 32 Am. Dec. 177; Carson v. White, 6 Gill, 17; Howard v. Oppenheimer, 25 Md. 350; Clark v. Meixsell, 29 Md. 221; United States v. Howgate, 2 Mackey, 408; Wallace v. Maroney, 6 Mackey, 221; Reynolds v. Smith, 7 Mackey, 27; *Buckman v. Ct. 173; Sailor Planing Mill & Lumber Co. v. Moyer, 35 Pa. Super. Ct. 503; Megee v. Beirne, 39 Pa. 50. But see Thistle Mills v. Watson, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 271, where claimant of a fund attached was denied the right to intervene in the attachment proceeding.

Any apparent jurisdictional defect in an attachment proceeding may be raised either by the defendant or a third person having an interest in the property attached. Campbell v. Morris; Stone v. Magruder; and Carson v. White,—supra.

In Clough v. Curtis, 62 N. H. 409, it was said that a subsequent attaching creditor is not admitted to defend a suit in the name of his debtor as a matter of right. "He is admitted when the fact is duly found that justice requires his admission. He is not allowed to come in for the purpose of pleading in abatement, or to avail himself of mere matters of form, but to prevent the property of the debtor from being diverted from his creditors. And when the objection is one of substance, especially if it be one which the subsequent attaching creditor might take advantage of after judgment, ball v. Richardson-Kimball Co. 111 Cal. 386, 43 Pac. 1111; McEldowney v. Madden, 124 Cal. 108, 56 Pac. 783. See also Stich v. Dickinson, 38 Cal. 608. It has also been held by the same court that a wife might intervene in a foreclosure suit against her husband, and set up her homestead right to the mortgaged premises. Mabury v. Ruiz, 58 Cal. 11; Sargent v. Wilson, 5 Cal. 504.

In Louisiana (Cobb v. Depue, 22 La. Ann. 244) the court held that a third party might intervene for the purpose of claiming money that had been collected by the sheriff upon execution that had issued on a judgment of the plaintiff in the main case. Field v. Harrison, 20 La. Ann. 411, is a case in point in every particular here, with the exception that in that case the property attached was personal property, instead of real estate, as in the case at bar. There Field sued Harrison and others and caused an attachment to issue, under which thirteen bales of cotton were seized. One Ayers sought to intervene and have the attachment dismissed, and be decreed the owner of the property attached. The court sustained his intervention, and ordered judgment in his favor, and decreed him to be the owner of the property. The decision, coming from the very birthplace of the statute on intervention, is of necessity very strong authority in this state under a statute that has been indirectly taken from the former state. In Lee v. Bradlee, 8 Mart. (La.) 55, the Louisiana court permitted a third party to intervene for the purpose of claiming the property attached, and in course of the opinion also passed upon another point that arises in this connection, and of which we will treat later in the opinion. The court said: "The plaintiffs, citizens of Boston, have attached property here, which they say belongs to the defendant, their debtor, also a resident of that place. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and the debt was proved; so that between plaintiff and defendant it only remained for the court to pronounce judgment accordingly. But a third person has stepped in; averring the goods attached to be his property, and demanding restoration of them. The claimant has not only attempted to prove the property to be his, but he has been acting the part of the defendant by undertaking to show that the attachment ought not to have issued, and that, after it had issued, it was imperfectly executed. The only thing which we conceive a claimant may be permitted to do is to show that the property attached is verily his. As soon as he succeeds in that, his part is at an end. But a claimant has surely no right to show any irregularity in the suit in which he intervenes for the sole purpose of rescuing the property. Whether the plaintiff, the court, and the sheriff have been acting legally or not is none of his business; for, whether the proceedings are regular or not, the property must be shown to be his before it can be returned to him; and, whether they are

. . . he will . . . be heard." Applying this doctrine on motion of the junior attaching creditor, a prior attachment was dismissed because of a material alteration in the writ after service.

In Daniels v. Solomon, 11 App. D. C. 163, this doctrine was applied to a judgment creditor who had caused an execution to issue, and had placed it in the hands of an officer to be levied upon property attached, and such creditor was allowed to intervene in the attachment proceeding, and attack the affidavit on which it was based, as well as to traverse the grounds for attachment stated therein.

In other jurisdictions, in the absence of any statute permitting it, the right is denied a claimant to property attached, or persons having a lien thereon, to intervene in the attachment proceeding and defend the same, or try title to the property attached. Boston v. Wright, 3 Kan. 227; Pennsylvania Steel Co. v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 4 Houst. (Del.) 572; Hale v. Chandler, 3 Mich. 531.

In Bradshaw v. Georgia Loan & T. Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 59 S. W. 785, it was held that a third party claiming title to the property attached might intervene in the attachment proceeding and assert his title to the attached property, if no objection was made.

In Whitman v. Willis, 51 Tex. 421, it was held that, in the absence of any statutory provision authorizing the practice, one claiming to own land attached in a suit against another would not be permitted to intervene in such suit to try his title to the land. The court said that if it was true that the property attached belonged to the person seeking to intervene in the attachment proceeding, the attachment could not divest his title, for he, not being a party thereto, could not be bound by any judgment rendered therein. It was, however, recognized that this rule against intervention might properly be relaxed in favor of a wife seeking by intervention to protect her homestead in property of her husband, which had been attached in a suit against him; and Baxter v. Dear, 24 Tex. 21, 76 Am. Dec. 89, and Stoddard v. Garnhart, 35 Tex. 299, were distinguished on this ground.

To the same effect also, where by statute express provision is made for intervention in attachment proceedings by claimants to personalty attached, but no provision is made for intervention by claimants to realty attached, see Bank of Fayetteville, v. Spurling, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 398; Gordon v. McCurdy, 26 Mo. 304; Henry Petring Grover Co. v. Eastwood, 79 Mo. App. 270.

regular or not, it shall not be returned unless he proves that it belongs to him." Intervention was also allowed in favor of the owner of attached goods in Letchford v. Jacobs, 17 La. Ann. 79. Dennis v. Kolm, 131 Cal. 91, 63 Pac. 141, is in point here, and supports the principle on which intervention is allowable in a case like the one at bar. See also Pom. Code Remedies, 4th ed. §§ 323, 324.

Other courts have construed this same statute; and, while the decisions are not entirely uniform, yet they practically all hold that one who claims to be the owner of attached property, or to have a lien on it by mortgage, attachment, or otherwise, is entitled to intervene in an action where the property has been attached as being the property of another party. This was true in Taylor v. Adair, 22 Iowa, 279.

The contention is made that since there is no contest between the plaintiff and defendant over the title of the attached property, and that the only contest between them is over the indebtedness, therefore the intervenor should not be let in to present another issue. That proposition is really the cause of confusion in this case. But the difficulty is dissipated when we remember that the intervenor is in no respect interested in the question as to whether the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff or not. The interest of the intervenor here is to show that neither plaintiff nor defendant has any interest in this property. In fact, she would not be permitted to interpose a defense personal to the defendant, and in the result of which she could have no interest, one way or the other. See Lee v. Bradley, supra. The plaintiff, however, by reason of causing the intervenor's property to be attached by provisional remedy, has reached out by process in the nature of a proceeding in rem and laid hold upon certain property as security for the payment of any judgment it may obtain. Under our statute, an attachment, duly and regularly issued and levied, becomes a lien on the property "as security for the satisfaction of any judgment that may be recovered." Rev. Codes, § 4302. The plaintiff has therefore brought the issue as to the ownership of this property into the case. It has cast a cloud upon Mrs. Runkel's record title. If it obtains a judgment against the defendant, then execution will issue against this property. If a sale should be made, it would become necessary for Mrs. Runkel to prosecute an action to remove the cloud and quiet her title. If the property is not sold, it would still be necessary for her to prosecute her action to remove the cloud of the attachment, unless the plaintiff should voluntarily relinquish the lien. It is for just such cases and for the purpose of preventing circuitry and multiplicity of litigation that the statute authorizing intervention by strangers was enacted. Pittock v. Buck, 15 Idaho, 47, 96 Pac. 212; Pence v. Sweeney, 3 Idaho, 181, 28 Pac. 413; Gold Hunter Min. & Smelting Co. v. Holleman, 3 Idaho, 99, 27 Pac. 413. The fact that the intervenor has another remedy, and may not be barred by a judgment in the action, is no reason for denying her the right to intervene. In Coffey v. Greenfield, 55 Cal. 362, the court, in speaking of the extent of the interest necessary to entitle a party to intervene, said: "The fact that the intervenor may or may not protect that interest in some other way is not material. If he has an interest in the matter in litigation, or in the success of either of the parties, he has a right to intervene." To the same effect, see Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co. 111 Cal. 386, 43 Pac. 1111; Dennis v. Kolm, 131 Cal. 91, 63 Pac. 141; Taylor v. Bank of Volga, 9 S. D. 572, 70 N. W. 834.

The only state from which we have found decisions denying the right of the owner or claimant of property attached to intervene is Texas. There they seem to hold that, although a third party may be the owner or claimant of the property attached, he may not intervene in the main case for the purpose of asserting his right. This is based upon the theory that in such cases the subject-matter of the suit is the debt to be collected, and that the ownership of the property is in no way put in issue by the pleadings in the case, and therefore forms no part of the subject-matter of the action. Williams v. Bailey (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 834; Rodriguez v. Trevino, 54 Tex. 196; Meyer v. Sligh, 81 Tex. 336, 16 S. W. 1022. In Texas, however, they have no statute authorizing intervention. See Pool v. Sanford, 52 Tex. 633. In that state they seem to rest their practice of allowing intervention on a combination of the principles of the ecclesiastical and civil law, and to apply it under the principles of equity practice. See Pool v. Sanford, supra.

After a somewhat extended examination of this question, we have arrived at the conclusion that a third party whose property has been levied upon in an action against another has such an interest in the subject-matter as entitles him to intervene for the purpose of establishing his right and removing the cloud cast on his property by the attachment. The order of the District Court will be reversed and the cause remanded, with direction to permit the appellant, Eliza J. Runkel, to intervene. Costs awarded in favor of the intervenor, and against the Potlatch Lumber Company.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ALFRED MOLWAY, by Guardian,

v.

CITY OF CHICAGO, Appt.

(239 Ill. 486, 88 N. E. 485.)

Highway — bicycle — ordinary travel.

1. Ordinary travel includes the use of a street by one riding a bicycle.

Same — safety — bicycle.

2. A municipal corporation does not fulfil its duty in making its highways safe for the use of horse-drawn vehicles if it is not safe for travel including its use of bicyclists.

(April 23, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George L. Reker and Edward C. Fitch, with Messrs. Edward J. Brundage and John R. Caverly, for appellant:

The duty of the city was to use reasonable care in keeping its streets in a reasonably safe condition for public travel for persons using ordinary care, and a basin-like depression similar to the one in question was not a violation of that duty.

Salem v. Webster, 192 Ill. 369, 61 N. E.

Case Note. — Duty to make streets and highways safe for bicycles.

As to the duty of a town or city to keep its streets and highways in a condition safe for the travel of automobiles, see the case note to Doherty v. Ayer, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 816.

This note is expressly confined to the question whether any exceptional duty, beyond the ordinary duty to keep streets and highways reasonably safe for the use of vehicles generally, rests upon a municipality to keep them in such a condition as to guard against the dangers peculiar to bicycles.

As is shown by the cases herein cited, no such exceptional duty is imposed, although they recognize the fact that there will be a liability if an injury caused one operating a bicycle is due to such a defect in a street or highway as renders it not reasonably safe for the use of any vehicle of the usual character. This phase of the question, however, is not considered in this note.

As to the law generally applicable to the use of bicycles, see the note to Taylor v. Union Traction Co. 47 L.R.A. 289.

It was held in Sutphen v. North Hempstead, 80 Hun, 409, 30 N. Y. Supp. 128, that highway officers are not subject to any higher obligations by reason of the fact 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The use of streets for bicycling, especially in the month of March, was not an ordinary use.

Messrs. Horton & Miller, for appellee:

A bicycle is a vehicle, and the city owes the same duty to exercise reasonable care to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for one using a bicycle as for one using a carriage, buggy, or wagon.

Moses v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 21 Ill. 516; Macomber v. Nichols, 34 Mich. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 522; Cater v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. 60 Minn. 539, 28 L.R.A. 310, 51 Am. St. Rep. 543, 63 N. W.

that a bicycle rider on an ordinary country road is exposed to greater danger than a person in a horse-drawn vehicle, and therefore, they are bound only to maintain such a road in a condition which makes it reasonably safe for general traffic. The circumstances in this case, however, did not call for the declaration of any such sweeping principle, though the road was 25 feet in width, and the accident was due to the fact that a bicyclist, finding the middle of the roadway to be too soft for easy riding, undertook to ride close to the edge of a gutter with a vertical side and about 18 inches in depth, and the soft soil gave way under the wheel and allowed it to drop into the excavation. The court remarked that "the accident was unusual, and incidental to the character of the vehicle he was riding," and therefore "not one which was within the anticipation of a prudent man," or which called for "extraordinary precautions to prevent." This point of view would seem to be erroneous, as such an accident would be more likely to happen to the wheels on one side of wagons than to a bicycle, and the mere fact that, by reason of the different construction of the two types of vehicles, the results of a subsidence of the soil at the edge of the ditch would not

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee recovered against appellant, in the superior court of Cook county, a judgment for $6,000 in an action on the case for personal injuries. The appellate court for the first district, on appeal, affirmed that judgment, and this appeal followed.

March 23, 1905, appellee, a boy about fifteen years of age, was riding north in Wells street, Chicago, on his bicycle, and near the intersection of Ontario street he rode into a hole in the asphalt pavement, and was thrown from the wheel in such a manner as to dislocate and permanently injure his left hip. Some years prior thereto he had sustained an injury which necessitated the amputation of his left leg about 3 inches below the knee, and thereafter he procured an artificial leg, and became so proficient in its use that he was able to ride a bicycle, play ball, and engage in boyhood sports. On the day in question it had been raining, and when he started for home it was drizzling. The hole in question was from 10 to 15 inches deep, a foot or more wide, and about 2 feet long. It was filled with water, and appellee did not know it was there until the bicycle ran into it. The evidence shows that it had been in the pavement some two or three months before the accident.

The court instructed the jury, at the request of appellant, that the appellee could not recover unless they believed that it had been proved, by a preponderance of the evidence, that "the street in question, at the time and place of the alleged accident, was not reasonably safe for ordinary travel thereon by persons using due care and caution for their safety;" and also instructed the jury that "a city is not bound, under the law, to keep its streets absolutely safe, nor is it bound, under the law, to keep them in reasonably safe condition. It is only bound to use reasonable care to keep its streets reasonably safe for ordinary travel thereon by persons using due care and caution for their safety." These instructions state the law with substantial accuracy. Salem v. Webster, 192 Ill. 369, 61 N. E. 323; Kohlhof v. Chicago, 192 Ill. 249, 85 Am. St. Rep. 335, 61 N. E. 446; Rock Island v. Gingles, 217 Ill. 185, 75 N. E. 468; Lockport v. Licht, 221 Ill. 35, 77 N. E. 581; be exactly the same, is not a sufficient reason for maintaining that a different rule of responsibility rests upon the highway authorities in the two cases.

A bicycle is not a carriage within the meaning of a statute requiring towns and cities to keep highways in repair so as to be reasonably safe and convenient for travelers with horses, teams, and carriages. Richardson v. Danvers, 176 Mass. 413, 50 L.R.A. 127, 79 Am. St. Rep. 320, 57 N. E. 688. The court said it would impose an intolerable burden upon the towns to hold them bound to keep their roads in such a state of repair and smoothness that a bicycle could go over them with assured safety, and it is because ordinary roads are not considered suitable for bicycles that cities and towns are given power by statute to lay out, construct, maintain, and protect paths for bicycles. And for a similar case see also Fox v. Clarke, 21 R. I. 515, 65 L.R.A. 234, 57 Atl. 305, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 548.

A road which is reasonably safe for travel of ordinary kinds is not defective merely because not fit for use with bicycles, as it is not the duty of those charged with the care of public roads to keep them so smooth that a bicycle can go over them with assured safety. Rust v. Essex, 182 Mass. 313, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

65 N. E. 397. In this case a stone projected 6 inches above the surface of a highway near the wheel track, where there was 16 feet of unobstructed path on one side of it.

Reasonable care in the construction and maintenance of highways for ordinary vehicles such as wagons and carriages is the measure of the duty resting upon the municipalities and townships, and it is not their duty to keep them in a reasonably safe condition for bicycles. Leslie v. Grand Rapids, 120 Mich. 28, 78 N. W. 885.

The duty of a city to keep its sidewalks in repair so as to prevent injury to one riding a bicycle thereon is that it keep them reasonably safe for pedestrians; and it is under no obligation to make them reasonably safe for bicycles. Morrison v. Syracuse, 53 App. Div. 490, 65 N. Y. Supp. 939, affirmed in 175 N. Y. 523, 67 N. E. 1085; Gagnier v. Fargo, 11 N. D. 73, 95 Am. St. Rep. 705, 88 N. W. 1030.

However, it was held in Wheeler v. Boone, 108 Iowa, 235, 44 L.R.A. 821, 78 N. W. 909, that the duty of a city to keep a sidewalk in a suitable condition to walk over extends to a person rightfully riding a tricycle on the walk, and the test of the city's liability to him is the same as though he had been walking.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 1019; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 367. The appellant further asked the court to instruct the jury that "ordinary travel does not include the use of a street by one riding a bicycle thereon. . . . A person when riding a bicycle on a street is not using said street for the purpose of ordinary travel thereon." It also asked the following instruction: "If you believe, from the evidence, that the street in question, at the time and place of the alleged accident, was reasonably safe for ordinary travel thereon by persons riding in vehicles, such as wagons, carriages, and other similar vehicles, then you are instructed that you should find the defendant, city of Chicago, not guilty, whether you believe that said street at said time and place was or was not reasonably safe for travel by a person riding a bicycle thereon."

The only ground for reversal urged by appellant is the refusal of these last instructions by the trial court. Does ordinary travel include the use of a street by one riding a bicycle? By the great weight of authority a bicycle is a vehicle of such a nature that it may be properly used upon our highways. North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Cossar, 203 Ill. 608, 68 N. E. 88; Holland v. Bartch, 120 Ind. 46, 16 Am. St. Rep. 307, 22 N. E. 83; Whiting v. Doob, 152 Ind. 157, 52 N. E. 759; Lee v. Port Huron, 128 Mich. 533, 55 L.R.A. 308, 87 N. W. 637; Thompson v. Dodge, 58 Minn. 555, 28 L.R.A. 608, 49 Am. St. Rep. 533, 60 N. W. 545; Taylor v. Union Traction Co. 184 Pa. 465, 47 L.R.A. 289, 40 Atl. 159. "Being a vehicle, its proper place is upon the street or roadway, and not upon the sidewalk," unless otherwise provided by statute. "Bicycles are subject to the 'law of the road,' and their use upon highways may be regulated by the legislature." Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 635.

When not based upon a special statutory provision (as certain of the following cases were), we are inclined to doubt the soundness of the rule laid down by some courts (Leslie v. Grand Rapids, 120 Mich. 28, 78 N. W. 885; Sutphen v. North Hempstead, 80 Hun. 409, 30 N. Y. Supp. 128; Richardson v. Danvers, 176 Mass. 413, 50 L.R.A. 127, 79 Am. St. Rep. 320, 57 N. E. 688; Rust v. Essex, 182 Mass. 313, 65 N. E. 397), that a cyclist must take the road as he finds it, provided it is safe for an ordinary horse-drawn vehicle, and that, in the absence of legislation, the courts will not require the public authorities to keep streets and highways safe for bicycles, automobiles, and vehicles of like character. We think the sounder rule is laid down by one of these courts in the recent decision of 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Doherty v. Ayer, 197 Mass. 241, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 816, 125 Am. St. Rep. 355, 83 N. E. 677, where that court held that "persons may lawfully ride in automobiles, as they may lawfully ride on bicycles; and cities and towns are bound to keep their ways reasonably safe and convenient for travel generally, including that properly undertaken upon such vehicles. . . . But if their ways are reasonably safe and convenient for travel generally, they are not liable for a failure to make special provisions, required only for the safety and convenience of persons using automobiles or bicycles." In Curry v. Erie City, 209 Pa. 283, 58 Atl. 476, it was held, in an action by a girl of fourteen to recover damages sustained by a fall from a bicycle, that a verdict and judgment for plaintiff will be sustained, the evidence showing that the accident occurred on an asphalted street, and was caused by the subsidence of the foundation, so that the surface of the asphalt had sunk, but was not broken, leaving a depression of which the rider had no knowledge until she came near it, and that under such circumstances the question of negligence was for the jury.

Some authorities apparently assume that to make the highways or streets reasonably safe for bicyclists using reasonable care would impose more onerous duties upon municipalities than to keep them in repair for pedestrians or horse-drawn vehicles. We do not think that this conclusion, under all conditions and circumstances, necessarily follows. While it is undeniable that certain defects in the highway may be harmless to a horse-drawn vehicle and dangerous to a bicycle, on the other hand, it may well be argued that many times the care required of public officials to make a highway perfectly safe for a bicycle would be less than it would for a vehicle drawn by horses. A bicycle, by its compactness and readiness of control, renders its rider often more favorably situated than the drivers of loaded wagons, or even of light carriages, to avoid dangerous places or collisions with other vehicles. An asphalt pavement, even when level, is practically impassable for a horse ordinarily shod when the pavement is covered with a slight coating of ice or sleet, and yet a cyclist, on account of his rubber-tired vehicle, can pass over it readily. When highways are not restricted by their dedication or statute to some particular mode of use, they are open to all suitable methods of travel. "A street is made for the passage of persons and property, and the law cannot define what exclusive means of transportation and passage shall be used. . . . To say that a new mode of passage shall be banished from the streets, no matter how much the general good may require it, simply because streets were not so used in the days of Blackstone, would hardly comport with the advancement and enlightenment of the present age." Moses v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 21 Ill. 516. To hold that the standard of safety required of public authorities as to streets and highways for all methods of travel should be the safety required for a horse-drawn carriage, or of any other particular vehicle, would not accord with wise public policy. "If there is any one fact established in the history of society and of the law itself, it is that the mode of exercising this easement is expansive, developing, and growing as civilization advances. In the most primitive state of society the conception of a highway was merely a footpath; in a slightly more advanced state it included the idea of a way for pack animals; and next, a way for vehicles drawn by animals,—constituting, respectively, the 'iter,' the 'actus,' and the 'via' of the Romans. And thus the methods of using public highways expanded with the growth of civilization, until to-day our urban highways are devoted to a variety of uses not known in former times, and never dreamed of by the owners of the soil when the public easement was acquired." Cater v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. 60 Minn. 539, 28 L.R.A. 310, 51 Am. St. Rep. 543, 63 N. W. 111. In the early history of this country, the great highways by water were supposed to be of such importance as to entitle those who used them to superior rights over those using land highways which might cross them; but long ago it was decided that the rights of vessel owners in navigable streams must submit to the incidental inconvenience of allowing those streams to be bridged for public traffic. Persons using horses as a means of travel have no superior rights in a highway to those who rightfully make use of it for other methods of travel. "Improved methods of locomotion are perfectly admissible, if any shall be discovered, and they cannot be excluded from the existing public roads, provided their use is consistent with the present methods. A highway is a public way for the use of the public in general, for passage and traffic, without distinction." Macomber v. Nichols, 34 Mich. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 522.

The law does not require that a road shall be absolutely safe for bicycling purposes, any more than that it shall be absolutely safe for other methods of travel. The defect which renders municipalities liable must be such as would make the street or highway unsafe for the use of vehicles in general. In constructing and keeping in repair a street, the public officials are bound 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to take into consideration the probability that it will be used by all vehicles that are in common use; and they must make it reasonably safe and convenient for all such uses, and in so doing are not required to take into consideration injuries to machines, vehicles, or persons which may occur from causes which cannot be reasonably foreseen or prevented. Clementson, Road Rights & Liabilities of Wheelmen, § 77; Fox v. Clarke, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 548, and note (25 R. I. 515, 65 L.R.A. 234, 57 Atl. 305).

No rigid rule can be laid down as to defects in highways or streets for which municipalities will be liable, or as to the degree of care required by the person injured. Objects negligently permitted to be placed in highways which are calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness may render such authorities liable for an injury, though there might be no liability if the objects were not naturally calculated to frighten horses. Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 447. Municipal corporations or road commissioners are not insurers against accidents. The object to be secured is reasonable safety for travel, considering the amount and kind of travel which may fairly be expected upon the particular road. Kelsey v. Glover, 15 Vt. 708. A highway in the country need not be of the same character as a street in a large city. The authorities are not required to provide a street or highway equal in smoothness to a driving or racing track for either horses, bicycles, or automobiles. A sharp stone, a tack, a bit of glass or coal in a road might puncture a bicycle tire or cause an injury to the rider; but the authorities are not ordinarily liable for, or required to insure against, such accidents. A small, loose stone on a smooth pavement might cause a bicycle to fall, and it also might, under certain circumstances, if situated on the edge of a steep embankment, cause a horse-drawn vehicle to topple over. Just what degree of care the rider of a bicycle, the driver of a team, or the chauffeur of an automobile must exercise must depend very largely upon the character of the road and the surroundings in each special case. A person may ride a bicycle without a light during the daytime without being charged with negligence, when he would be guilty of negligence if he were to so ride his bicycle at night on a public thoroughfare, where he is liable to meet moving vehicles or pedestrians, or where he might be injured by riding into a depression in the street. Cook v. Fogarty, 103 Iowa, 500, 39 L.R.A. 488, 72 N. W. 677. Every defect in a street or highway that causes an injury may not be actionable. "It is sufficient, we think, if the streets (which include sidewalks and bridges thereon) are in a reasonably safe condition for travel in the ordinary modes, by night as well as by day; and whether they are so or not is a practical question, to be determined in each case by its particular circumstances." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1019; Kohlhof v. Chicago, 192 Ill. 249, 85 Am. St. Rep. 335, 61 N. E. 446. Bicycling being subject to the rules of law governing other vehicles, this general rule as to liability of public authorities for injuries to bicyclists can be as reasonably and safely applied to them as to other vehicles.

This court has recently held in Harder's Fire Proof Storage & Van Co. v. Chicago, 235 Ill. 58, 85 N. E. 245, and Harder v. Chicago, 235 Ill. 294, 85 N. E. 255, that automobiles, as well as wagons, could be taxed and the money used by the public authorities in paying the costs and expenses of street and alley improvements or other repairs. It would certainly be most illogical, after this holding, to decide that persons using automobiles are not using the streets for the purposes of ordinary travel. It is a matter of common knowledge that bicycles have for years been in common use on the streets of Chicago and other cities. We think riding a bicycle on a street is an ordinary mode of travel.

The instructions in question were properly refused. The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

E. BAXTER, Plff. in Err.,
v.
JACOB KRAUSE.

(79 Kan. 851, 101 Pac. 467.)

Limitation of action — nonresident — temporary return — effect.

In order that, after a debtor has moved from the state, the statute of limitations may run in his behalf during a temporary return, it is not necessary that such visit shall be made under such circumstances as to give the creditor an opportunity, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, to make service of summons upon him. He is entitled to credit for all the time spent in the state unless he conceals himself.

(April 10, 1909.)

ERROR to the District Court for Marion County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover a sum alleged to be due on a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. Baxter in propria persona.

Mr. H. S. Martin for defendant in error.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

E. Baxter sued Jacob Krause upon a note. The trial court held that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, and the plaintiff prosecutes error, claiming that the facts found entitled him to a judgment. The findings show that Krause lived in Marion county when he gave the note, which matured August 10, 1889, and remained there continuously, except for an absence of one week, until April 2, 1894, when he moved to Oklahoma. Between that time and the date of the commencement of the action, November 11, 1905, he made eight visits to Marion county, none being found to have been less than one week in duration, the total time spent there during that period being twenty-five weeks. Therefore he was personally present in this state for five weeks and two days more than five years after the note was due and before the action was begun. But four weeks of this time must be disregarded, because he passed it in attendance upon the district court as a defendant. Underwood v. Fosha, 73 Kan. 408, 85 Pac. 504, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 833. This still leaves him, however, after allowing three days of grace, a margin of six days, and action on the note was barred unless some further deduction is to be made.

Of course, whenever one against whom a cause of action has accrued is absent from Case Note. — Sufficiency and effect of "return" to state by defendant to start statute of limitations running.

This note does not intend covering the question of what constitutes an absence from the state under the several statutes, or the general question of what constitutes a residence within the state, but it is confined strictly to cases passing upon the sufficiency of the defendant's return to satisfy provisions excepting the time of his absence from the state and allowing the plaintiff the statutory period after the defendant's return in which to institute his action. The early statutes in this country containing exceptions of this kind were taken from the statute of Anne, which provided in substance that, if a person against whom a cause of action accrued was beyond sea at the time of accrual, the plaintiff should be at liberty to bring his action against him within the usual time after his return. A clause was later added in the United States which also excepted the time of the defendant's absence where he departed from, and resided out of, the state after the accrual of the cause. As already indicated, the note is in the main confined to the state, the statute of limitations is suspended, and it is conceded that ordinarily whenever he returns it begins to run again, however often he may go and come. Gibson v. Simmons, 77 Kan. 461, 94 Pac. 1013. But the plaintiff insists that, in calculating the time the statute has been in operation, mere occasional visits to Kansas, so brief as to offer no fair opportunity to begin an action, must be ignored, and that, as the court found that due diligence had been exercised in attempting to get service in this case, the bar had not fallen. This contention is not without apparent support in the authorities. Its substance finds piquant expression in Weille v. Levy, 74 Miss. 34, 60 Am. St. Rep. 500, 20 So. 3, in these words: "The plaintiff was not required to fire judicial process at him [the defendant] as he flew, but was entitled to a fair and reasonable opportunity for a resting shot." In 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1251, it is said: "In order that a return into the jurisdiction, after an absence which has interfered with the granting of the statute of limitations, may set the statute in motion, defendant . . . must be able to show that plaintiff either knew of the return so as to have had an opportunity to avail himself of the presence by bringing suit, or that the return or stay was so public or of such length as to amount to constructive notice or knowledge, or to raise the presumption that, if plaintiff had used ordinary diligence, he might have brought his action." Not one of the cases cited in support of this text, however, arose under a statute which, like that of Kansas, makes the personal presence or absence of the debtor the determining factor, irrespeccases arising under the first clause of the statute.

It is generally held that the return contemplated by these acts is such a coming into the state as affords the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, an opportunity to serve process upon the defendant.

Return held sufficient.

Thus, it was laid down in the following cases that a return, to start the statute running, must be public and notorious, so that the creditor either knew of the return, or, with due diligence, could have ascertained and served process on the defendant: Palmer v. Bennett, 83 Hun, 222, 31 N. Y. Supp. 567, affirmed in 152 N. Y. 621, 46 N. E. 1150; Cole v. Jessup, 10 N. Y. 96; Ford v. Babcock, 2 Sandf. 518; Dukes v. Collins, 7 Houst. (Del.) 3, 30 Atl. 639; Boulton v. Langmuir, 24 Ont. App. Rep. 618; Dorr v. Swartwout, 1 Blatchf. 179, Fed. Cas. No. 4,010; Steen v. Swadley, 126 Ala. 616, 28 So. 620, but see State Bank v. Seawell, infra; Campbell v. White, 22 Mich. 178. The court in the last case said: "From the foregoing and many other cases, it may be taken as having been well settled that the object of the legislature in qualifying the operation of the statute by the fact of the debtor's absence or nonabsence from the state was to allow or prevent the running of the time limited for bringing suit, when the creditor should or should not, in consequence of the circumstances, have a fair opportunity to subject his debtor to the jurisdiction of the proper court of the state. And considering the tenor of the authorities and the object of the clause in question, the rule, which alone appears admissible, is that a temporary nonabsence, or, in other words, a return, in order to cause the time limited for bringing suit to commence and keep running during his stay, must be shown by the debtor either to have been actually known to the creditor, and to have been so long continued and under such circumstances, after such knowledge, as to have enabled the creditor, by reasonable diligence, to have subjected him to the jurisdiction of the proper state court; or else to have been so notorious and protracted, and so identified with some locality, as to show that the creditor might, by reasonable diligence, have learned of the debtor's return, or nonabsence, and, by the like diligence after such fact could have been learned, might have subjected him to the jurisdiction as before stated."

And in Wood v. Ward, Fed. Cas. No. 17,965, the court instructed the jury, in effect, that the coming into the state must either be of a permanent character, or, if not of such character, it must be brought to the creditor's knowledge, or be of such nature that the creditor might, by the use of reasonable diligence, ascertain it.

So, the court said in Byrne v. Crowninshield, 1 Pick. 263, that by a return "within the government" must be meant such a return as would give a party reasonable opportunity to commence an action. It was said, however, that the decision of what amounted to such a return was not necessary to sustain the decision.

The general rule before laid down was applied in the following cases, where the return was held sufficient: Rogers v. Hatch, 44 Cal. 280 (return for few weeks consecutively, and subsequently having place of business in state, all with creditor's knowledge); Crocker v. Clements, 23 Ala. 296 (return to, and remaining in, state four or five months); Whitton v. Wass, 109 Mass. 40 (enlisted resident returning openly to his domicile); Pindell v. Harris, 57 Miss. 739 (return of former resident for a five months' visit to her old home); Fowler v. Hunt, 10 Johns. 404 (presence by debtor in the state at different times with creditor's knowledge and in his company); Montgomery v. Brown, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 127, 28 S. W. 834 (openly visiting state on business, affording fair opportunity for suit); Kera v. Erwin, 4 La. 215 (debtor's passing every tive of his residence. The test there proposed was rejected under a statute similar to ours in Stewart v. Stewart, 152 Cal. 162, 92 Pac. 87. The plaintiff relies upon a statement in the syllabus to Stanley v. Stanley, 47 Ohio St. 225, 8 L.R.A. 333, 21 Am. St. Rep. 806, 24 N. E. 493, that an occasional presence in the state will not set the statute of limitations to running, but the opinion shows that what is meant is that the statute will not continue to run from that time on, but will cease to operate as soon as the visit is ended. To say that the statute shall not run in favor of a debtor coming into the state unless his entry is made under such circumstances as to give his creditor an opportunity, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, to obtain service upon him, would be to ingraft a new exception upon the statute. Such exceptions by implication are not favored. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Atchison Grain Co. 68 Kan. 585, 75 Pac. 1051, 1 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 639. A somewhat literal construction has established the doctrine that the statute does not run in favor of one who is actually outside of the state, even although, by reason of having a residence here, he is exposed to service at any time. Consistently with that method of interpretation it must be held that he may have the benefit of all the time he spends in the state, regardless of whether or not the intervals are long enough to give reasonable opportunity for service, so that he does not conceal himself.

winter in state); Howell v. Burnett, 11 Ga. 303 (return once or twice every year for few days in such manner that suit might be commenced); Didier v. Davison, 2 Sandf. Ch. 61, affirmed in 2 Barb. Ch. 277 (coming into the state and residing openly with family for upwards of a year); Costello v. Downer, 19 App. Div. 434, 46 N. Y. Supp. 713; Holt v. Hopkins, 63 Misc. 537, 117 N. Y. Supp. 177 (open return each day for business purposes); State Bank v. Seawell, 18 Ala. 616 (openly coming into state, including time occupied in traveling to and from plantation); Gregory v. Hurrill, 5 Barn. & C. 341 (coming ashore to mail letter).

Where a statute provides that, if a debtor shall be out of the state when an action accrues, suit may be commenced within the statutory period after he comes into the state in such a manner that, by reasonable diligence, he might be served with process, the statute commences to run where the debtor comes into the state openly and notoriously, and remains long enough for the creditor to sue out process, and for service by the sheriff. Morrow v. Turner, 2 Marv. (Del.) 332, 43 Atl. 166.

Reasonable diligence, within the meaning of a statute of this kind, requires the creditor at least to take some steps, from time to time, to ascertain whether his debtor can be reached by process. Where the debtor resides within the state at the time the debt accrues, and afterwards removes therefrom, the creditor is not bound to keep a suit pending against him. But where the debtor afterwards comes into the state in such a manner that, by reasonable diligence, he might be served with process, the statute will commence to run from that time. Dukes v. Collins, supra.

It is held that where a nonresident comes into the state to reside permanently, and his residence is open, the statute will run in his favor although the plaintiff has no knowledge of his presence. Davis v. Field, 56 Vt. 426; Hall v. Nasmith, 28 Vt. 791. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So, if the return is of such character as would afford the plaintiff an opportunity to commence suit, the fact that he has no knowledge thereof is not material. Stewart v. Stewart, 152 Cal. 162, 92 Pac. 87.

The question of presence in, or absence from, the state, and not the question of residence or nonresidence, is held to affect the running of the statute, under a provision in effect that, if, when the cause of action accrues, the debtor is out of the state or has absconded or concealed himself, the period for commencement of an action shall not begin to run until he comes into the state, or while he is so absconded or concealed. Hoggett v. Emerson, 8 Kan. 262; Investment Securities Co. v. Berghthold, 60 Kan. 813, 58 Pac. 469.

And it was held in Vans v. Higginson, 10 Mass. 29, that the statute commences to run as soon as the debtor comes within the state, although the creditor was without the state. The exact statutory provision in this case does not appear and, as stated in the note to the case, it is not supported by the later decisions.

In Patriotic Bank v. Webster, 2 Hayw. & H. 47, Fed. Cas. No. 10,811a, the defendant's rejoinder that he was within the jurisdiction of the court four days during the time necessary to bar the action, to the knowledge of the creditor, was held good upon demurrer.

It is held that the question of whether a return is sufficient to bring a case within the exception is for the jury. Palmer v. Bennett, 83 Hun, 220, 31 N. Y. Supp. 567, affirmed in 152 N. Y. 621, 46 N. E. 1150; Morrow v. Turner, 2 Marv. (Del.) 332, 43 Atl. 166.

And it was held in Alexander v. Burnet, 5 Rich. L. 189, that the question of whether the creditor might have sued the debtor when he passed through the state on several occasions was for the jury.

So, where there is evidence that the debtor has been in the province after the accrual of the action, for two or three days, and that the creditor has transacted business with him, the question of return is for the jury and a nonsuit cannot be granted. Johnson v. Buchanan, 1 U. C. Q. B. 171.

The jury are not at liberty to presume knowledge of a debtor's presence on the part of the creditor on evidence that the debtor was present in the state upon two instances and remained publicly for a period of several weeks, but the debtor must prove actual knowledge by the creditor of his temporary stay. Mazon v. Foot, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 282, 15 Am. Dec. 679.

Return held insufficient.

The following facts have been held insufficient to show a return: Mazon v. Foot, supra (stay of several weeks without creditor's knowledge); Little v. Blunt, 16 Pick. 359 (visit to state at place distant from plaintiff's residence, several times a year on business, without plaintiff's knowledge); Johnson v. Smith, 43 Mo. 499 (flying visit); Crosby v. Wyatt, 23 Me. 156 (often coming few miles into state, with no evidence of creditor's knowledge); Wilson v. Daggett, 88 Tex. 375, 53 Am. St. Rep. 766, 31 S. W. 618 (temporarily in state on business); Gregory v. Hurrill, 1 Bing. 324 (coming ashore to post letter); State ex rel. Shipman v. Allen, 132 Mo. App. 98, 111 S. W. 622 (presence in state, attending court); Weille v. Levy, 74 Miss. 34, 60 Am. St. Rep. 500, 20 So. 3 (salesman traveling from place to place); Mazon v. Foot, supra; Hill v. Bellows, 15 Vt. 727 (temporary visit to state without creditor's knowledge); Palmer v. Shaw, 16 Cal. 93 (presence for temporary business purpose).

Upon a case stated in Hysinger v. Baltzell, 3 Gill & J. 158, a showing that the debtor was within the state, purchased goods of the creditor, and remained two days, was held not to justify a holding that the statute commenced running, since it did not appear at what time during the days the debtor made his purchases, or whether the creditor had an opportunity to sue out a writ.

The fact that a debtor, after his removal from a state, comes temporarily therein on several occasions, of which the creditor, without fault on his part, has no notice, does not remove the obstruction raised by his removal, where the statute provides that when a cause of action accrues against a resident and he, by departing therefrom, obstructs the prosecution of the action, the time of the continuance of his absence from the state shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action may be commenced, and further provides that limitations shall run from his return. Ridgeley v. Price, 16 B. Mon. 409. The court said: "We are of opinion that if the plaintiff was in fact ignorant, without fault, of the occasional visits of the defendant to this state, he cannot justly be said to have had an opportunity of suing her, and the obstruction occasioned by her removal still continued, and repelled the operation of the bar. The proviso in § 8 of the statute, in favor of the person entitled to the action, and who may be out of the country, expressly subjects him to the limitation on his return to the country. The suspension in his favor is founded on a supposed disability to sue while he is out of the state; and the disability being, with his presumed knowledge, removed by the mere fact of his coming into the state, his failure to sue becomes from that time mere laches, which the statute does not intend to assist. But when the defendant, by removal from the state, prevents or obstructs the bringing of the action, the saving of the plaintiff's right from the effect of the bar would be utterly delusive if the mere presence of the defendant in any part of the state, however distant, for however short a time, and although wholly unknown to the person having the right to sue, might, without laches on his part, deprive him of the benefit of the saving. Until he knows, or ought to know, that he can sue, he is guilty of no neglect, and the privilege of saving caused by the act of the other party ought not, and in our opinion was not intended, to be taken away." And to the same effect is Bennett v. Devlin, 17 B. Mon. 353.

In Burroughs v. Bloomer, 5 Denio, 532, where the statute provided in substance that the debtor's departure and residence out of the state should operate to prevent the statute running while so absent, a debtor who removed to another state, but retained a place of business, which he visited frequently, was held not entitled to credit for the time he spent within the creditor's state. To the same effect are McCord v. Woodhull, 27 How. Pr. 54; Bassett v. Bassett, 55 Barb. 505.

The New York statute involved in these cases was subsequently changed to read in effect that, if the debtor should depart from, or reside out of, the state, "or remain continuously absent therefrom for the space of one year or more," the time of his absence should not be deemed a part of the time limited for the commencement of an action. And later the word "or" was changed to "and."

After these changes it was held that where a debtor removed from the state after the action accrued, the fact that he made a number of brief visits to his old residence in the state would not interrupt the continuity of his absence. Connecticut Trust & S. D. Co. v. Wead, 172 N. Y. 497, 92 Am. St. Rep. 756, 65 N. E. 261. The court said: "By the substitution of the word 'and' for 'or' it became thereafter necessary, to bring a nonresident within the exception of the statute, that he should be continuously absent for a year or more,—that is to say, a nonresidence for less than a year continuously would be insufficient for the purpose. But it did not alter the rule that nonresidence is absence, and that casual visits to the state do not destroy the continuity of the absence. In Bassett v. Bassett, supra, it was said: 'The object of the exception is to give the plaintiff the whole of six years' residence within the state to commence his action. He is not obliged to follow the debtor into another state; nor is he called upon to watch him and ascertain whether he comes into the state for a temporary purpose, so long as his residence is elsewhere.' We think this statement is still correct. Whether the statute runs in favor of a nonresident defendant with a place of business in this state and daily present there during business hours, it is unnecessary to determine, but we hold that the casual, temporary visits of a nonresident to this state do not break the continuity of his absence, under the section of the Code, so as to entitle him to the benefit of the statute." To the same effect is Lawrence v. Hogue, 105 App. Div. 247, 93 N. Y. Supp. 998.

Under a statute in effect that the creditor may commence his action within the given period after the presence of the debtor within the state, in case of the latter's absence, it was held in Gibbons v. Ewell, 1 Handy (Ohio) 561, that temporary visits to a part of the state distant from the creditor's residence were not sufficient to remove the disability, where it was not clearly shown that the creditor knew of the fact, or that, if he did, he could serve process on the debtor. The court said the return must be such as from its publicity affords the creditor a knowledge of the fact, or means of knowledge.

The running of the statute of limitations in favor of a foreign corporation depends on the fact of its residence in the state, in the sense that service may be made on it through defendant's keeping a managing agent therein, and not upon the knowledge, or lack of knowledge, of one having a cause of action against it, as to the presence of such agent; but a foreign manufacturing corporation whose business is such that it can carry it on without a resident general agent cannot set the statute running by appointing, at any time or times, an agent in the state, upon whom process might be served. Winney v. Sandwich Mfg. Co. 80 Iowa, 608, 18 L.R.A. 524, 53 N. W. 421. The court said: "Here is a manufacturing corporation. It may establish an office or agency, and, if it does, process may be served in certain cases upon the agent or clerk employed therein. It may have a general agent in the state, in which case process may be served upon him. It may, however, carry on its business without either establishing an office or agency in the state, or having a general agent therein. Surely, in such a case, it would hardly be contended that the corporation was a resident of the state so as to be served with process; hence, it could not avail itself of the defense of the statute of limitations. If the appellant's theory is good, a foreign corporation can, at its pleasure and for its own benefit, put in motion the statute. We do not think such result was ever anticipated by the legislature when it enacted the statute we have quoted. A foreign corporation whose business in this state is such that it is not incumbent upon it to put itself in position to be at all times subject to the service of process ought not to be permitted to shield itself behind the statute of limitations because it may at some time or times, perhaps unknown to one having a cause of action against it, have an agent in this state upon whom process could be served. There is a wide distinction between the case of a railroad company, whose officers or agents may always be found within the state, and can readily be reached with process, and a foreign manufacturing corporation having, perhaps, a general agent in this state, who may have no settled abiding place, whose relations to the party he serves are not generally known to the public, and the knowledge of whose coming and going must, of necessity, be limited to a few individuals."

—secret return.

A secret return is held not to be such a return as is contemplated by the statute.

Thus, in White v. Bailey, 3 Mass. 271, a return by a debtor to his former domicile and a stay of eighteen days were held not to satisfy the statute, where he came privately, and secreted himself except on Sundays, there being nothing to show that the creditor had knowledge of his presence.

And in Hysinger v. Baltzell, 3 Gill & J. 158, the court said that a secret, concealed, clandestine presence for any length of time, of which the creditor could not take advantage, was insufficient to constitute a return within the meaning of the statute.

So, in Stewart v. Stewart, 152 Cal. 162, 92 Pac. 87, it was held that the defendant was not entitled to credit where he made a secret visit to his former residence for the purpose of ascertaining the time of his absence from the state.

Necessity of residence.

A return for the purpose of residence is not, as already stated, required by the great weight of authority.

In North Carolina, however, where the statute contains a provision to the effect that if, after the accrual of an action, the defendant shall depart from, and reside out of, or remain continuously absent from, the state, the action may be brought within a stipulated period after his return, it is held that the return contemplated is a return with a view to reside, not a casual appearance in the state, passing through it, or a stay on a visit. Lee v. McKoy, 118 N. C. 518, 24 S. E. 210; Armfield v. Moore, 97 N. C. 34, 2 S. E. 347.

The Georgia statute expressly provides that, in case of defendant's absence, the time of his absence "and until he returns to reside" shall not be counted in his favor. Under this statute a return to reside is necessary. Brooks v. Fowler, 82 Ga. 329, 9 S. E. 1089; Payne v. Bowdrie, 110 Ga. 549, 36 S. E. 89.

Miscellaneous.

Where the manifest object of the statute is to prevent the absence from operating as a bar, a return into the state is not shown by the debtor's taking up a residence in the Indian nation, which is within the limits of the state, but whose inhabitants are not subject to the process of the state courts. Smith v. Bond, 8 Ala. 386.

It is not necessary to aver that the return was public and notorious so that, with due diligence, the creditor could have arrested the debtor, but it is sufficient to plead the return in the words of the statute. Ford v. Babcock, 2 Sandf. 518; Shapley v. Felt, 3 N. H. 121; Cole v. Jessup, 10 N. Y. 96.

The fact that a foreign creditor has an agent in the state will not start the statute of limitations running where the statute makes no exception in such case. Wilson v. Appleton, 17 Mass. 180.

The fact that a debtor, after his return to the state, does not hang out a sign, or have his name inserted in the city directory, where it appears that he was only a dentist's helper, and had no permission to display a sign, does not show concealment of his return on his part. Campbell v. Post, 20 Misc. 339, 45 N. Y. Supp. 919.

To whom term "return" applies.

It is held, in cases passing upon the sufficiency of the defendant's return that the word "return" in statutes providing in substance that action may be commenced after debtor's return to the state applies as well to persons coming from abroad as to citizens from the country going abroad for a temporary purpose and then returning. Palmer v. Shaw, 16 Cal. 93; West v. Theis, 15 Idaho, 167, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 472, 96 Pac. 932; Steen v. Swadley, 126 Ala. 616, 28 So. 620; Milton v. Babson, 6 Allen, 322; Wilson v. Appleton, 17 Mass. 180; Dwight v. Clark, 7 Mass. 515; Hall v. Little, 14 Mass. 203; Fowler v. Hunt, 10 Johns. 464; Whitcomb v. Keator, 59 Wis. 609, 18 N. W. 469; Omaha Nat. Bank v. Lindsay, 41 Wash. 531, 84 Pac. 11; Carpenter v. Wells, 21 Barb. 593; Lee v. McKoy and Armfield v. Moore, supra; Cottrell v. Kenney, 25 R. I. 99, 54 Atl. 1010; Crocker v. Arey, 3 R. I. 178; McConnell v. Spicker, 15 S. D. 98, 87 N. W. 574; Lawson v. Tripp, 34 Utah, 28, 95 Pac. 520; Wilson v. Daggett, 88 Tex. 375, 53 Am. St. Rep. 766, 31 S. W. 618; Tagart v. Indiana, 15 Mo. 209; Burrows v. French, 34 S. C. 165, 27 Am. St. Rep. 811, 13 S. E. 355; Pardo v. Bingham, L. R. 4 Ch. 735; Graves v. Weeks, 19 Vt. 178; Weber v. Yancy, 7 Wash. 84, 34 Pac. 473; Alexander v. Burnet, 5 Rich. L. 189.

But it has been held that a provision that the time the defendant shall be absent from the state shall not be counted, and allowing suit after his return, does not apply where the parties are nonresidents who have never previously been in the state. Hyman v. Bayne, 83 Ill. 256.

It was held in Olcott v. Tioga R. Co. 20 N. Y. 210, 75 Am. Dec. 393, that an exception under which the term of absence from a state is not to be taken as any part of the time limited for bringing an action applies to corporations as well as natural persons, notwithstanding that a domestic corporation could not be without the jurisdiction of the state and therefore could not be absent within the meaning of the act.

Credit for full time after return.

It is now generally held that the statute runs in the defendant's favor only so long as he actually continues in the state.

Thus, under statutes providing in substance that, if the debtor is out of the state when the cause of action accrues, the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he comes into the state, and if, after the cause of action accrues, he departs from the state, the time of his absence shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action must be brought, the time of the debtor's temporary presence must aggregate the statutory period to constitute a bar, since the running of the statute ceases as soon as defendant departs from the state. Gibson v. Simmons, 77 Kan. 461, 94 Pac. 1013; Lane v. National Bank, 6 Kan. 74; Conlon v. Lanphear, 37 Kan. 431, 15 Pac. 600; Holley v. Coffee, 123 Ala. 406, 26 So. 239; Rogers v. Hatch, 44 Cal. 280; Dougall v. Schulenberg, 101 Cal. 154, 35 Pac. 635; McKee v. Dodd, 152 Cal. 637, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 780, 125 Am. St. Rep. 82, 93 Pac. 854; Withers v. Bullock, 53 Miss. 539; Pindell v. Harris, 57 Miss. 739; Fisher v. Phelps, 21 Tex. 551; Stanley v. Stanley, 47 Ohio St. 225, 8 L.R.A. 333, 21 Am. St. Rep. 806, 24 N. E. 493; Ford v. Babcock, 2 Sandf. 518; Cole v. Jessup, 10 N. Y. 96; Gans v. Frank, 36 Barb. 320; McCord v. Woodhull, 27 How. Pr. 54; Armfield v. Moore, 97 N. C. 34, 2 S. E. 347; Campbell v. White, 22 Mich. 178; Bennett v. Cook, 43 N. Y. 537, 3 Am. Rep. 727; Hacker v. Everett, 57 Me. 548; Wells v. Jones, 2 Houst. (Del.) 329; Whittelsey v. Robert, 51 Mo. 120; Story v. Thompson, 36 Ill. App. 370; Johnson v. Smith, 43 Mo. 499; Todman v. Purdy, 5 Nev. 238; Davis v. Marshall, 37 Vt. 69; Brown v. Bicknell, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 226, 39 Am. Dec. 299; Whitcomb v. Keator, 59 Wis. 609, 18 N. W. 469. In the last case, in answering the claim that the statute continued to run in favor of a nonresident after he left the state, the court said: "The creditor would have this full period to bring suit and acquire jurisdiction over him. In the case of a nonresident debtor who comes to the state and remains a short period to the knowledge of the creditor, it is claimed a different rule applies. It is said the creditor must be diligent and cause process to be served within the few weeks or months allowed to subject his debtor to the jurisdiction of the court. And if the creditor fails to improve that opportunity, the statute commences and continues to run, although the debtor immediately leaves the state and remains abroad until the limitation has expired. It is obvious that this construction of the statute places foreigners or nonresidents in a more favorable position as to the operation of the statute of limitations on causes of action against them than our own citizens; for the effect is that such former persons, 'by coming into the state and remaining here for a brief period, could cause the time of the limitations of actions against them to run, which in six years would ripen into a complete bar, although they had been absent from the state during nearly the whole six years, while the latter would be obliged to remain in the state during the full term prescribed for limitations of actions, in order to set up a good bar to existing causes of action. A construction involving a conclusion so unreasonable, and leading to a result which makes the practical operation of the statute so manifestly unequal and unjust, cannot be supported unless required by language, too clear to admit of any other interpretation.'"

The same result was reached in Milton v. Babson, 6 Allen, 322, where the provision of the statute was in effect that the debtor must remain within the state the statutory period, to avail himself of the defense.

But under the provision added to the New York statute in effect that, if the debtor departs "and remains continuously absent therefrom for the space of one year or more," the time of his absence is not a part of the period limited for bringing action, it is held that, if the debtor comes into the state and starts the statute in his favor, and does not thereafter remain absent for the space of a year, it runs in his favor continuously from that date. Costello v. Downer, 19 App. Div. 434, 46 N. Y. Supp. 713.

And it was held under the early statutes, which did not contain the clause referred to in the first paragraph as to the exclusion of the time a defendant who departed after the cause of action accrued was absent from the state, that the statute continued running from the date of the first return. Such was the holding in the following cases: Palmer v. Shaw, 16 Cal. 93, but see Rogers v. Hatch, supra; Howell v. Burnett, 11 Ga. 303; Ingraham v. Bowie, 33 Miss. 17, but see Withers v. Bullock, supra; Fowler v. Hunt, 10 Johns. 464; Didier v. Davison, 2 Sandf. Ch. 61, affirmed in 2 Barb. Ch. 477, but see Cole v. Jessup; Ford v. Babcock; Gans v. Frank; and McCord v. Woodhull,—supra; McDaniel v. Milam, Hempst. 274, Fed. Cas. No. 8,744a; Patriotic Bank v. Webster, 2 Hayw. & H. 47, Fed. Cas. No. 10,811a; Gregory v. Hurrill, 5 Barn. & C. 341. A like result was reached in Dorr v. Swartwout, 1 Blatchf. 179, Fed. Cas. No. 4,010, which arose after the addition of the clause referred to above. This case was disapproved in Cole v. Jessup, supra, and has little support.

It is held that the fact that service could not be made on Sunday if the debtor was a resident will not entitle him to include Sundays in reckoning the number of days necessary to bar the action, and he must still show a presence in the state equal to 366 days. Bell v. Lamprey, 57 N. H. 168. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM SIMMONDS, Plff. in Err.,

v.

W. R. LONG et al.

Action — contract — agent — liability.

1. Where persons enter into a written contract, assuming to act as agents for another, and receive money to be paid to the principal as part of the consideration, but which is retained in their hands, and the principal refuses to be bound by the contract, an action may be maintained against them for money had and received to the use of the person from whom they received it.

Agent — unauthorized contract — liability.

2. Defendants entered into a written contract with the plaintiff for the sale of lands, assuming to act as agents for the owners, and received $150 as part of the consideration. The owners of the land refused to be bound by the agreement and the money was not paid to the owners, but was retained by the defendants. Held that, independent of anything in the contract itself that would bind the defendants, the law, under such circumstances, implies an agreement on their part to restore the money, because the contract which they assumed to have authority to make has failed, and they have the money of the plaintiffs in their hands.

Case Note. — Right to recover from agent money paid him for his principal.

Cases where it is sought to recover payments made to a public officer, as well as those where one other than the payer seeks to recover money paid an agent, are excluded from this note.

As to the liability of an agent to a third person, who claims money received by the former from another in the course of his agency, see the case note to Moss Mercantile Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 657.

Where money is in agent's possession.

Money paid by mistake to an agent for his principal may be recovered from him in an action for money had and received if it remains in his hands, or he receives notice not to pay it to his principal. *Buller v. ERROR to the District Court for Kingman County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover a sum of money alleged to be held by defendants to the use of plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. L. Martin for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Charles C. Calkin for defendants in error.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Simmonds, the plaintiff, made a written contract with Long & Sills to purchase 160 acres of land, and deposited with them $150 as earnest money and part payment on the purchase price. The contract was dated December 14, 1906. By its terms possession was to be given in sixty days, and time was made the essence of the contract. It was further agreed that, if good and sufficient deed and abstract could not be furnished, the $150 earnest money should be returned to Simmonds. On February 18, 1907, which was after the sixty days had expired, the owners of the land met plaintiff in the office of Long & Sills; and because a number of mortgages which were on the land could not be released, and because Silvius, one of the owners, who was in possession of the land, refused to give possession, as agreed, the sale fell through. Plaintiff then demanded the return of his $150, under the terms of the contract. Long & Sills refused to pay it, and this Supp. 470; United States Nat. Bank v. National Park Bank, 59 Hun, 495, 13 N. Y. Supp. 411, affirmed without opinion in 129 N. Y. 647, 29 N. E. 1028; Costigan v. Newland, 12 Barb. 456; Hearsey v. Pruyn, 7 Johns. 179; Morrison v. Currie, 4 Duer, 79.

This doctrine has been applied where an indorser pays a note without notice of the fact that demand has not been made on the maker; and the former demands its return before the agent has paid it to his principal (Garland v. Salem Bank, supra); where an agent collects the amount of a fraudulently raised draft, and receives notice thereof before parting with any of the money collected thereon (United States Nat. Bank v. National Park Bank, supra); where an insurance company becomes insolvent before it has received or assumed any liability on account of the payment of premiums to an agent, and the payer notifies the latter, before he parts with the money, that he claims the money, and does not intend to rely upon the policy issued to him, notwithstanding the policy is not surrendered until after bringing suit (Smith v. Binder, supra); where an agent receives usurious interest for his principal, and is notified before he pays it over that he will be held accountable for it (O'Connor v. Clopton, supra); where one pays the first month's rent of premises to an agent, and his principal fails to enter into a lease before the money is paid to him (Wheeler v. Cannon, 84 Ill. App. 501); where, before money reaches a principal, land sold by an auctioneer proves to have a defective title (Burrough v. Skinner, supra); where an attorney receives the amount due on an execution in his principal's favor, and the judgment is reversed and restitution ordered before payment over to the principal (Langley v. Warner, supra); where a forged draft is paid supra protest without seeing the draft, upon the representation of the agent that it is genuine, and the payer gives immediate notice of the forgery (Goddard v. Merchants' Bank, supra); where C. O. D. charges are paid an agent of an express company, and, by reason of the consignor's fraud, the contents of the package proves worthless, the consignee 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

notifying the agent thereof before the money is paid to the principal (Herrick v. Gallagher, supra); where, by mistake in computing the amount due, an agent is overpaid and still retains the same (Griffith v. Johnson, supra).

Where an agent sells a bar of silver and has not settled with his principal therefor, the payer may, upon offering to return the bar of silver, recover the money paid, upon discovering that an assayer had erroneously computed its value. Cox v. Prentice, 3 Maule & S. 344.

Money paid an agent who discloses his principal, upon the purchase of property which is never delivered to the payer, may be recovered from the agent, where, with the consent of his principal, the money was received by the agent in his own name. Klotz v. Gordon, 117 N. Y. Supp. 240.

However, in order that this doctrine may be applied, there must have been no alteration in the situation of the agent towards his principal in relation to such payment. McDonald v. Napier; Langley v. Warner; Goddard v. Merchants' Bank; Herrick v. Gallagher; Costigan v. Newland; LaFarge v. Kneeland; Hearsey v. Pruyn; and Carter v. Stork,—supra.

But there are cases which hold that where a payer is aware that he is dealing with an agent for a known principal, and the payment is not the result of mistake or fraudulent conduct on the part of the agent, the latter is not liable to the payer therefor if he ultimately becomes entitled to its return, as his principal alone is answerable in that event; and this is true notwithstanding the agent still has possession of the money. Ellis v. Goulton [1893] 1 Q. B. 350; Sadler v. Evans, 4 Burr. 1984; Bogart v. Crosby, 80 Cal. 195, 22 Pac. 84; McDonald v. Napier, supra; Huffman v. Newman, 55 Neb. 715, 76 N. W. 409; Cooper v. Tim, 16 Misc. 372, 38 N. Y. Supp. 67; Middleworth v. Blackwell, 85 App. Div. 613, 82 N. Y. Supp. 704; Finnegan v. Geoghegan, 111 N. Y. Supp. 656; Levine v. Field, 114 N. Y.

action was brought before a justice of the peace. It was afterwards appealed to the district court, and there tried. The court sustained a demurrer to the evidence of the plaintiff, and rendered judgment against him for costs. These proceedings are brought to review the judgment.

The written contract described Long & Sills as agents, and they signed it as agents, but did not disclose therein the name of their principal. The demurrer to the evidence was based upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff, who testified that he knew who owned the land, and that Long & Sills were merely agents for the owners; that he paid the money to them, and supposed the money was paid on the land. The trial court held that he had no cause of action against the defendants, because he knew they were agents, and who their principal was. On the trial, R. O. Silvius, one of the owners, testified that he had never placed the land with Long & Sills for sale, although, after the contract was entered into, he ratified their action; that they never paid him any of the money; that he understood the money in their hands was to be held by them until the deal was closed, when they were to have $100 as commission, and that the expense of making the sale and the cost of the abstract were to come out of the balance of the money in their hands. The ruling of the trial court, it is said, is supported by the law declared in McCubbin v. Graham, 4 Kan. 397. In that case the

Thus, where the agent still has possession of the money, this doctrine has been applied where a deposit is paid an auctioneer upon a sale which fails by reason of the default of the vendor (Ellis v. Goulton, supra); where money is paid attorneys upon a judgment that is subsequently reversed (McDonald v. Napier, supra); where the principal fails to fulfill his agent's contract for the sale of real estate (Huffman v. Newman and Middleworth v. Blackwell, supra); where the principal fails to enter into a contract for the sale of his real estate, pursuant to his agent's promise (Bogart v. Crosby, supra); where it is claimed that certain rentals paid an agent for a known principal were not actually due (Sadler v. Evans, supra); where sufficient money is paid an agent to cover the first month's rent, and security for the last month's rent, of premises which the principal does not have ready for occupancy at the agreed date (Finnegan v. Geoghegan, supra).

And it was held in Huffman v. Newman, supra, that money paid an agent for a known principal cannot be recovered from the agent, even though he has possession thereof, either in an action for money had and received or for conversion.

So, it was held in Mathews v. O'Shea, 45 Neb. 299, 63 N. W. 820, that an action for conversion will not lie against an agent, in the absence of fraud, where money is voluntarily paid him for the use of his principal, and which has never been paid over to the latter, as the agent's possession is not wrongful or fraudulent, but lawful.

And it was said in McDonald v. Napier, 14 Ga. 89, that in no event would an agent be liable to the payer of money upon a judgment upon its subsequent reversal, even though it still remained in the agent's hands, unless the payment was made in consequence of the agent's fraud or duress.

So, in Kurzawski v. Schneider, supra, it was held that an agent who receives money on a contract for the purchase of real estate, made by his principal, and which apparently he has in his possession, cannot be held liable therefor in an action by the purchaser to recover back the money, on proof of facts which would entitle the purchaser to rescind the contract.

In Bogart v. Crosby, supra, it was said that the payer's claim that there had been a forfeiture of his payment by a failure to complete a contract was a question between him and the owner of the property, and one in which the agent was not concerned; and the payer was bound to look to the principal for his money, and that between the agent and the payer there was no liability either way.

A further reason advanced for this rule, where the payer claims he has become entitled to a return of his money because of the principal's default, is that the latter has a right to litigate the question whether there has been a breach of the agreement, which is a question that does not concern the agent. Bogart v. Crosby and Levine v. Field, supra.

It was held in Gulf City Constr. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 121 Ala. 621, 25 So. 579, that money voluntarily paid an agent for an overcharge in freight could not be recovered from him in the absence of fraud or want of authority on his part, although it did not appear whether the agent had parted with the same.

Where agent has paid money to his principal.

An agent to whom money has by mistake, or under circumstances entitling the payer to recall it, been voluntarily paid for the use of his principal, is not answerable therefor to the payer, where, before notice of the mistake or right to recall it, the agent has paid it to the principal. Hooper v. Robinson, 98 U. S. 528, 25 L. ed. 219; United States v. Pinover, 3 Fed. 305; Shand v. Grant, 15 C. B. N. S. 324; Thompson v. Stickney, 6 Ala. 579; Allen v. Globe Grain & Mill. Co. (Cal.) 104 Pac. 305; Bingham v. Tully, 1 Root, 237; Fowler v. Quall, 36 Kan. 507, 13 Pac. 784; Steele v. Moxley, 9 Dana, 137; Simpson v. Garland, 76 Me. 203; *Cabot v. defendant received a $500 bond merely as the agent of, and for the use of, Fleming, his principal, disclosing his principal at the time, and delivered the bond to him. The general doctrine was declared that the authorized acts of an agent are the acts of a principal; that where an agent receives money or property for his principal, he is liable to his principal for the same, but not liable to the party from whom he received the money or property. We think that, under the evidence in this case, the defendants were not in a position to insist upon that doctrine, not because they failed to disclose the name of their principal, for the evidence shows that the plaintiff knew at the time who the owners of the land were, and that the defendants were acting as agents, but for the reason that the evidence discloses that the defendants had no authority to receive the money for the owners of the land, nor did they have authority to bind the owners to give possession in sixty days, and because they never paid the money to the owners. The testimony of Silvius is that he never knew he was to give possession of the land in sixty days until after that time had expired. The facts are that defendants undertook to enter into a contract as agents for a principal without authority, and the principal refuses to be bound. The law is well settled in such cases that, where the proceeds received by the agent have not been turned over to the principal, the agent is liable personally.

There is a class of cases holding that,

Otis, 11 Vt. 628; Holland v. Russell, 1 Best & S. 424. This doctrine is recognized in Buller v. Harrison, 2 Cowp. 565.

It was said in McDonald v. Napier, supra, that money paid an agent by mistake, or to which his principal has no lawful right, cannot be recovered from the former after it has been paid to the principal.

This doctrine has been applied where an attorney fails to apply a payment upon a decree of foreclosure, and, after remitting it to his client, sells the encumbered property for the full amount of the decree (Miller v. Seeley, supra); where an agent without authority obtains a loan upon his principal's note, and pays it to the latter before demand for repayment (Jefts v. York, supra); where an agent obtains a loan for his principal upon a note with forged signatures and pays it over to him (Huston v. Tyler, 140 Mo. 252, 36 S. W. 654, 41 S. W. 795); where an insurer pays the amount of a loss to an agent, and becomes entitled to recall it after it has been paid to the principal (Hooper v. Robinson, supra); where, after money has been paid to the principal, it appears that the payer acquired nothing by the purchase (Engels v. Heatly, 5 Cal. 135); where an agent receives money for a corporation, and by mistake does not enter it upon its books, but in fact the money was actually turned over to the corporation (Cary v. Webster, 1 Strange, 480).

A bank which, as agent for another bank, collects $1,800 upon a draft which has been raised from $8, is not liable to the payer, where, before discovery of the fraud, the agent has paid over the proceeds to the principal. National Park Bank v. Seaboard Bank, 44 Hun, 49, affirmed in 114 N. Y. 28, 11 Am. St. Rep. 612, 20 N. E. 632.

And this is true notwithstanding the agent does not pay the identical money received, but credits the amount thereof to the principal, and remits more than sufficient to exhaust the credit long before the discovery of the forgery. Ibid.

Where an agent is paid money for his principal, and the payer subsequently becomes entitled to its return, he cannot, because there is a running account between the agent and his principal, upon which the amount can be credited, wait until the agent has, in good faith, paid it to his principal, and then claim restitution. Bixby v. Drexel, 56 How. Pr. 478.

So, where money is paid an agent by the brother of a debtor, it cannot, in the absence of any personal fraud or a guaranty of the validity of the claim by the agent, be recovered from the latter, who has already paid it to his principal, on proof that the claim was invalid. Hauenstein v. Ruh, 73 N. J. L. 98, 62 Atl. 184.

And it was held in Huston v. Tyler, supra, that the principal, and not an agent, would be answerable where the latter, whose agency was known, obtained money upon a forged note, and paid it to the principal.

Where a negotiable bond was delivered to a broker as a payment upon the purchase of his principal's real estate, the latter afterward refusing to consummate the sale, and the payer recovered damages from the principal for the breach of the contract, in which he included the said bond, he cannot afterward recover the value of the bond from the agent, who had delivered it to his principal, as the measure of damages in the action against the principal would include the amount actually paid on the contract. McCubbin v. Graham, 4 Kan. 307.

where a contract has been entered into by one who assumes to act as the agent of another, but who lacks the requisite authority, the contract may be stripped of what the agent had no right to put there; and, if it still contain apt words to charge him, he is bound thereby. Byars v. Doores, 20 Mo. 284; Woodes v. Dennett, 9 N. H. 55; Moor v. Wilson, 26 N. H. 332; Weare v. Gove, 44 N. H. 196; Hegeman v. Johnson, 35 Barb. 200; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1128. Thus, in Byars v. Doores, supra, it is said that, where the agent signs his own name to a written contract as agent for a principal, yet, if he fails to employ language which will exclusively bind the principal, or "if, rejecting the words which he had no authority to use, enough will remain to create a promise on his part, he will be personally liable on the contract." The question is discussed at length in Hegeman v. Johnson, supra, where it is said, in respect to written contracts, that the rule is limited "to cases where the agent signs his own name, although he describes himself as an agent. This description, being surplusage, may be stricken out, and a personal obligation will remain." It is true, as a general rule, that the remedy against an agent who assumes to act for another without authority is an action for damages for the wrong done, and he is not personally bound by the terms of the contract unless it contain apt words to charge him. Duncan v. Niles, 32 Ill. 532, 83 Am. Dec. 293; Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 567, 89 Am.

Where the amount due on an execution was paid the agent of the plaintiff, and verbal notice given him that it was the payer's intention to sue out a writ of error, and that, if the judgment was reversed, it was expected that the money would be returned, the amount so paid could not, upon the reversal of the judgment, be recovered from the agent, where, before the reversal, it had been paid to the principal, as such notice was insufficient to disclose an intention to demand the money upon a reversal of the judgment, but only that it was expected that it would be returned. Bank of United States v. Bank of Washington, 6 Pet. 8, 8 L. ed. 299, reversing 4 Cranch, C. C. 86, Fed. Cas. No. 947.

But where money is paid to an agent to apply upon a purchase of land under circumstances showing a case of mala fides, as, where it is the design of a vendor to impose a defective title as and for a good one, and the vendee becomes entitled to a return of his money, it may be recovered from the agent, notwithstanding it has been paid over to the latter's principal. Shipherd v. Underwood, 55 Ill. 475.

Where a purchaser of land becomes entitled to rescind because of gross mistake of fact, the agent, who effects a sale in his own name, and receives the purchase money, will be primarily liable therefor, although his principals, who have actually received any portion thereof with full knowledge of the circumstances, must repay the same. Daniel v. Mitchell, 1 Story, 172, Fed. Cas. No. 3,562.

It was held in Bamford v. Shuttleworth, 11 Ad. & El. 926, that one making a deposit with an auctioneer upon the purchase of land, the latter signing the memorandum of sale as agent, in his principal's name, cannot, upon the sale failing by reason of the principal's default, recover the money from the agent, who has disposed of it in settling the expenses of the sale, as the payment to him is a payment to his principal.

What constitutes payment to principal.

Merely passing a payment to the credit of the principal, or making a rest without any 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

new credit being given, new bills accepted, or a further sum advanced by the agent for the former in consequence of such payment, will not be equivalent to a payment which will exonerate the agent from liability to the payer in the event of his becoming entitled to recall the payment. Buller v. Harrison, 2 Cowp. 565; Smith v. Binder, 75 Ill. 492; United States Nat. Bank v. National Park Bank, 59 Hun, 495, 13 N. Y. Supp. 411, affirmed without opinion in 129 N. Y. 647, 29 N. E. 1028; Garland v. Salem Bank, 9 Mass. 408, 6 Am. Dec. 86.

Merely forwarding an account on which a payment has been credited to a principal to the latter, the account not having been settled between them, is not such a payment as will relieve an agent from liability to a payer upon his becoming entitled to recall a payment. Cox v. Prentice, 3 Maule & S. 344.

Where a bank, as agent for another, collects the amount of a raised draft, the payer may recover it upon discovering the forgery, where it appears that the collecting bank has merely credited the amount to the account of the principal. Bank of Commerce v. Union Bank, 3 N. Y. 236.

But where money is credited to a principal, and more than enough remitted him to exhaust the credit before notice of the payer's right to recall it, the agent will be exonerated. National Park Bank v. Seaboard Bank, 44 Hun, 49, affirmed in 114 N. Y. 28, 11 Am. St. Rep. 612, 20 N. E. 632.

Crediting the principal's account, and thereby settling a precedent debt due the agent, after the latter is aware of the issuance of a writ of error to reverse the judgment upon which the payment was made, is not such a payment to his principal as will shield him from liability to refund the money upon a reversal of the judgment. Langley v. Warner, 1 Sandf. 209.

But where an attorney applies a payment upon an execution in satisfaction of his fees due from his principal, it is equivalent to a payment over to the latter, so as to protect the attorney from an action by the payer upon subsequent reversal of the judgment. McDonald v. Napier, 14 Ga. 89.

Dec. 64; Wallace v. Bentley, 77 Cal. 19, 11 Am. St. Rep. 231, 18 Pac. 788. Stripping the contract here of those things which defendants had no authority to bind the owners of the land to perform, it would not be difficult to find remaining an agreement to return to the plaintiff the earnest money. But, independent of anything in the contract itself that would bind the defendants, the law under such circumstances implies an agreement on their part to restore the money because the contract which they assumed to have authority to make has failed, and they have the money of the plaintiff in their hands.

In Buller v. Harrison, 2 Cowp. 565, Lord Mansfield says: "In general, the principle of law is clear that, if money be mispaid to an agent expressly for the use of his principal, and the agent has paid it over, he is not liable in an action by the person who mispaid it, because it is just that one man should not be a loser by the mistake of another; and the person who made the mistake is not without redress, but has his remedy over against the principal. On the other hand, it is just that, as the agent ought not to lose, he should not be a gainer by the mistake; and therefore, if, after the payment so made to him, and before he has paid the money over to his principal, the person corrects the mistake, the agent cannot afterwards pay it over to his principle, without making himself liable to the real owner for the amount." In that case it was held that an action for money had and received, to the use of the person so paying it, will lie against the agent. In the case at bar the bill of particulars upon which the case was tried was for money had and received. In Wallace v. Bentley, supra, it was held that the agent is not liable as principal on a contract signed by him without authority, unless the contract contain apt words to charge him personally; but it is further said that he would be liable, in an action to recover money paid under the contract, by reason of his wrong in assuming to act without authority. In Jefts v. York, 10

So, where an agent has been allowed to retain the amount received by him upon a settlement between him and his principal, it is equivalent to a payment to the latter. Holland v. Russell, 1 Best & S. 424.

Where the agent of a partnership credits a receipt of the money to the latter's account, and it is afterwards transferred from the principal's account to that of the agent, to apply on the agent's private account against one of the copartners, it is equivalent to an actual payment of money, so as to exonerate the agent from liability to the payer. LaFarge v. Kneeland, 7 Cow. 456.

Where an account between principal and agent has been settled and closed, the agent is discharged; and the retainer by the latter of a portion of the money received, with the assent of his principal, in payment of the agent's demand against the principal, operates as a payment, and exonerates the agent from liability to the payer. Mowatt v. McLelan, 1 Wend. 173.

And see also Owen v. Cronk [1895] 1 Q. B. 265, infra, under the subdivision, "Where payment is induced by fraud or wrongful act of agent."

When payment to be returned in certain event.

Money paid an agent for the benefit of a known principal, to be returned the payer upon nonperformance of certain conditions, cannot, upon the payer becoming entitled to its return, be recovered from the agent, as the question whether the payer is entitled to the money is one that does not concern the agent, but is between the payer and the principal. Bleau v. Wright, 110 Mich. 183, 68 N. W. 115; Finnegan v. Geoghegan, 111 N. Y. Supp. 656; Levine v. Field, 114 N. Y. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Supp. 819; Cooper v. Tim, 16 Misc. 372, 38 N. Y. Supp. 67; Tripple v. Littlefield, 46 Wash. 156, 89 Pac. 493.

This doctrine has been applied where, upon the breach of an agreement to convey land to a payer, he becomes entitled to money deposited with an agent, which was to be returned in such event (Tripple v. Littlefield, supra); where a deposit upon a contract for the purchase of a business is to be returned to the payer if the business does not show a specified profit within a designated period (Levine v. Field, supra); where money is paid an agent as the first premium upon a life insurance policy, which is to be returned if the risk is not accepted, and the policy issued is not such as the contract calls for (Bleau v. Wright, supra).

So, where an agent receives a deposit which is to be returned if his principal does not enter into a lease with the payer, in that event the agent will not be liable therefor, where his agency and the principal were known, as, in the absence of fraud, mistake, or other wrongful act, the identity of the agent is merged in the principal, and the obligation is due the payer from the latter. Cohen v. Barry, 108 N. Y. Supp. 573.

And this is true notwithstanding the agent still has possession of the money. Bogart v. Crosby, 80 Cal. 195, 22 Pac. 84; Finnegan v. Geoghegan; Levine v. Field; and Cooper v. Tim,—supra.

The reason given for the rule laid down in the last few cases is that one who deals with an agent of a known principal acquires no right against him, the payer's remedy being against the principal. Bleau v. Wright; Cooper v. Tim; and Levine v. Field,—supra.

Cush. 392, it was held that, where the money had not been paid over to the principal, the measure of damages was the amount retained by the agent; and that it could be recovered in an action for money had and received. To the same effect is Cox v. Prentice, 3 Maule & S. 344, holding that, where the account remains open, and no change of circumstances has taken place, the agent will not be relieved. Of course, where the account between the principal and agent has been settled and closed, the agent is discharged. Mowatt v. McLellan, 1 Wend. 174. In Fowler v. Quall, 36 Kan. 507, 13 Pac. 784, the agent was held not liable on a contract similar to the one in the case at bar. But in that case, after the contract was signed, the parties came together and executed a new contract, and the agent paid the money to the principal in the presence of, and by the consent of, the purchaser. The principal, of course, was bound, and the agent was released from all liability.

But it is well settled, also, that there is no presumption that the agent has paid the money over to the principal, and the burden is upon him to show that he has done so, as well as to show that he had authority to act for the principal. Shipherd v. Underwood, 55 Ill. 475; Frankland v. Johnson, 147 Ill. 520, 37 Am. St. Rep. 234, 35 N. E. 480; Gillaspie v. Weason, 7 Port. (Ala.) 454, 31 Am. Dec. 715. There can be no question that, when an assumed agent receives a consideration of a contract, an implied promise to pay it back arises if there is a failure of the contract, and an action may be maintained against him for money had and received so long as the money remains in his hands. In addition to the authorities cited, see LaFarge v. Kneeland, 7 Cow. 456; Russell v. Koonce, 104 N. C. 237, 10 S. E. 256; Shipherd v. Underwood, supra; Cabot v. Shaw, 148 Mass. 459, 20 N. E. 99; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1129.

The judgment will be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

All the Justices concur.

—personal agreement of agent to return payment.

But where an agent agrees personally to refund money paid him under certain conditions upon the happening thereof, he will be liable to the payer notwithstanding he has paid the money to his principal. White v. Taylor, 113 Mich. 543, 71 N. W. 871; Goodridge v. Wood, 133 Ill. App. 483; Mead v. Altgeld, 136 Ill. 298, 26 N. E. 388, affirming 33 Ill. App. 373.

So, it was held in Goodridge v. Wood, supra, that a broker who receives a payment to apply upon a purchase, and personally agrees to return it to the purchaser in case the contract is not approved by his principal, thereby binds himself to return the money; and, upon the failure of the principal to accept the offer, the payer may recover it from the agent.

And this doctrine was applied in Mead v. Altgeld, supra, where a real estate broker gives a receipt providing that a payment shall be refunded by him in case the title to land sold proves defective.

But where an agent accepts an account against a third person as a part payment upon the purchase of his principal's real estate, it being stipulated that all money shall be returned to the payer if the sale is not ratified by the principal within ten days, upon the rejection of the contract by the latter, the agent is not liable to the payer for the cash amount due upon such account, but is only bound to return the account itself. Mitchell v. Chick, 136 Mo. App. 559, 118 S. W. 517.

If money is received by an agent merely as a stakeholder, to be returned in certain 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

events to the payer, upon the happening thereof it may be recovered from the agent. Ellis v. Goulton [1893] 1 Q. B. 350; Furtado v. Lumley, 6 Times L. R. 168; Gray v. Gutteridge, 3 Car. & P. 40; Burrough v. Skinner, 5 Burr. 2639; White v. Taylor, supra; Martin v. Allen, 125 Mo. App. 636, 103 S. W. 138; Read v. Riddle, 48 N. J. L. 359, 7 Atl. 487.

This doctrine has been applied where an agent or auctioneer, upon selling his principal's property, receives a deposit from the purchaser, to be returned in the event that a good title cannot be given. Furtado v. Lumley and Read v. Riddle, supra.

And this doctrine is not affected by the fact that the agent has already paid the money to his principal. Furtado v. Lumley; Gray v. Gutteridge; Martin v. Allen; and Read v. Riddle,—supra.

Where an auctioneer signs a contract for the sale of his principal's property, in his own name, and receives a deposit in the presence of his principal, and afterward pays it over to him, upon the sale failing by a defect in the title, the purchaser may recover the deposit from the auctioneer. Lord Tenterden said that it was common practice to make such a payment to an auctioneer, trusting to his solvency. Gray v. Gutteridge, supra.

A deposit paid an auctioneer upon the purchase of realty may, upon the purchaser refusing to complete the sale because of a defective title, be recovered from the auctioneer who has possession of the deposit, as he is a mere stakeholder. Burrough v. Skinner, supra.

An agent who holds money as a mere stakeholder, to be paid over upon the happening of a certain contingency, or performance of certain conditions will be liable to the payer if he pays it to his principal before the happening of such contingency or the performance of the conditions. Martin v. Allen and Read v. Riddle, supra.

When payment is induced by fraud or wrongful act of agent.

Where money is paid to one whose agency is known, he will be personally liable therefor, where he is guilty of fraud or mala fides, notwithstanding he may have paid the money to his principal. Oates v. Hudson, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 284; Sadler v. Evans, 4 Burr. 1984; Gulf City Constr. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 121 Ala. 621, 25 So. 579; Shipherd v. Underwood, 55 Ill. 475; Moore v. Shields, 121 Ind. 267, 23 N. E. 89; Hardy v. American Exp. Co. 182 Mass. 328, 59 L.R.A. 731, 65 N. E. 375; Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. 14; Huffman v. Newman, 55 Neb. 713, 76 N. W. 409; Mathews v. O'Shea, 45 Neb. 299, 63 N. W. 820; Cohen v. Barry, 108 N. Y. Supp. 573; Cooper v. Tim, 16 Misc. 372, 38 N. Y. Supp. 67; Seidel v. Peckworth, 10 Serg. & R. 442; Metcalf v. Denson, 4 Baxt. 565; Wright v. Eaton, 7 Wis. 595.

This doctrine will be applied where an agent refuses to deliver to a person certain papers in his possession until a sum alleged to be due his principal is paid, the payer complying with the demand for the purpose of obtaining the papers, and stating that the agent should "hear of this again." Oates v. Hudson, supra.

Likewise, it was applied where a carrier transports goods to the consignor's risk, and collects C. O. D. charges before delivery, without disclosing knowledge of facts indicating that the goods have been damaged in transit, and they are subsequently rejected by the consignee. Hardy v. American Exp. Co. supra.

And where an attorney who is also an auctioneer receives a deposit upon the sale of his principal's property, he is liable to an action therefor where the transaction fails by reason of a defect in the title of which the agent had notice before he paid the money to his principal, and misled the purchaser by stating that he had not paid it over to his principal. Edwards v. Hodding, 5 Taunt. 815.

And a broker who knowingly sells and obtains money for worthless paper will be liable to the payer for the money so received, notwithstanding he may have paid it over to his principal, as money received under such circumstances that, in equity and good conscience, the agent ought not to retain or otherwise dispose of, except to return it to the one from whom it was received, may be recovered from him in an action for money had and received. Moore v. Shields, supra.

So, an attorney who receives a partial payment from a debtor upon a promissory note he has for collection, and pays it over to the creditor without indorsing it on the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

note, and afterwards obtains a judgment thereon for the full amount, will be liable to the debtor in an action for money had and received, for the amount of such payment. Fowler v. Shearer, supra.

And where an attorney is overpaid the amount due on a judgment in favor of his client, which is the result of the former's failure to inform the judgment debtor of a previous payment made thereon by a third person he will be liable therefor, notwithstanding the money has been transmitted to his client before discovery of the mistake, as the rule exonerating the agent from liability after payment to his principal does not apply where the money is received by reason of the agent's own wrong. Metcalf v. Denson, supra.

An agent who extorts or wrongfully obtains money from another cannot defend his liability to respond on the ground that he acted as agent, even though the money may have been paid over to his principal. Wright v. Eaton, supra; Bocchino v. Cook, 67 N. J. L. 467, 51 Atl. 487; Frye v. Lockwood, 4 Cow. 454.

Where an agent obtains money by fraud or duress, he will be liable therefor, and cannot shield himself behind his agency. McDonald v. Napier, 14 Ga. 89.

But where an agent who manages a business for a trustee receives money that, without his knowledge, has been extorted by one of his clerks, which the agent deposits in a bank to the credit of the trustee before notice of how it was obtained, it is such a payment as will exonerate the agent from personal liability to the payer. Owen v. Cronk [1895] 1 Q. B. 265.

As to the general effect of a payment to a principal by an agent before notice of the payer's right to recall, see also the case cited supra under the subdivision entitled, "Where agent has paid money to his principal."

When agency is undisclosed.

Where money is paid by mistake, or under circumstances under which the payer may recall it, to one who does not disclose his agency, he will be liable therefor notwithstanding the money has been paid to the principal. Newall v. Tomlinson, L. R. 6 C. P. 405; Daniel v. Mitchell, 1 Story, 172, Fed. Cas. No. 3,562; Smith v. Kelly, 43 Mich. 390, 5 N. W. 437; Canal Bank v. Bank of Albany, 1 Hill, 287; Holt v. Ross, 54 N. Y. 472, 13 Am. Rep. 815.

This doctrine was applied where, by mistake of a broker's clerk, there was an overpayment of £500 upon a purchase from a broker who was not known to be acting for an undisclosed principal, and which was not discovered until several months later, as the case did not fall within the rule relieving an agent from responsibility where he has bona fide paid over money received by him on account of his disclosed principal. Newall v. Tomlinson, supra.

So, this doctrine was applied in Smith v. Kelly, supra, where money was paid without consideration to one without notice of his agency.

Likewise it has been applied where an express company, without disclosing the fact of its agency, receives payment of a draft with a forged indorsement, and pays the proceeds to its principal, as it is liable to the payer as an actual principal in the transaction, irrespective of the fact that its general business is to act as agent for others; it being necessary, if it desired to protect itself as agent, to give notice thereof. Holt v. Ross, supra.

And it was applied also in Canal Bank v. Bank of Albany, supra, where one, without disclosing his agency, presented and collected a forged draft, notwithstanding notice of the forgery was not given until two months after the money had been transmitted to the principal.

An agent who does not disclose his agency or principal, and sells a bill of exchange without indorsing it, will be personally liable for the money received thereon if the bill subsequently proves to be a forgery, unless, before demand is made on him for reimbursement, he has passed the money to his principal, or shown other special circumstances proving that it would be inequitable, as between the parties, to hold him responsible for it. Morrison v. Currie, 1 Duer, 79.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

E. I. DUDLEY

v.

NORTHAMPTON STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

(202 Mass. 443, 89 N. E. 25.)

Automobile — license — nonresidence — time.

1. In computing the time during which a nonresident is permitted to operate his automobile without a license, on the highways of the state, after entering it, the days on which he runs the machine across the bound-

Case Note. — Effect of operating automobile on highway without a license.

It was held in Doherty v. Ayer, 197 Mass. 241, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 816, 125 Am. St. Rep. 355, 83 N. E. 677, which was an action by one operating an automobile, to recover for injuries sustained by defects in a highway, that the plaintiff made a prima facie case without showing that he was licensed to operate an automobile upon the public highways, or that his automobile was registered according to the same statute that was before the court in DUDLEY v. NORTHAMPTON STREET R. Co. Although the court said that if it appeared affirmatively that the plaintiff was traveling into other states, returning the same day, and those in which the machine is in the repair shop, cannot be excluded.

Same — outlaw — injury.

2. One operating an automobile on a public highway in violation of a statute forbidding the operation thereon of unregistered machines has no right of action against one who injures it merely by want of ordinary care.

(June 21, 1909.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to the direction by the Superior Court for Hampshire County of a verdict in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries and for damages to plaintiff's automobile alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William G. Bassett and John B. O'Donnell, for plaintiff:

If plaintiff was not within the statute, that fact is not a bar to his right of action, as the statute is a regulation like the law of the road, a failure to observe which does not defeat a right of action of a person who is in the exercise of due care.

Clinton v. Revere, 195 Mass. 151, 80 N. E. 813; Baker v. Fall River, 187 Mass. 53, 72 N. E. 336; Black v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 193 Mass. 448, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 148, 79 N. E. 797, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 485.

Messrs. John C. Hammond and Thomas J. Hammond, for defendant:

The unlawful act of the plaintiff in operating his car in this state after the expiration of the statutory days of grace directly contributed to the injury, and is a conclusive bar to his recovery.

Newcomb v. Boston Protective Dept. 140 Mass. 596, 4 Am. St. Rep. 354, 16 N. E. 555; Doherty v. Ayer, 197 Mass. 241, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 816, 125 Am. St. Rep. 355, 83 N. E. 677; Finnegan v. Winslow Skate Mfg. Co. 189 Mass. 580, 76 N. E. 192;

ing without a proper registration of the vehicle or without a license to operate it, it might well be held that he was not a traveler on the highway in a legal sense, and that the town owed him no duty under a statute requiring it to keep its highways in repair, and that a violation of the license statute so affected the direct relation of the violator to the town, in regard to the way and the only use that he was making of it, as to leave him without remedy for an injury caused by a defect therein.

For cases upon the power to require registration and license of automobiles, as well as other regulations as to the use thereof, see the subject note to Christy v. Elliott, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 215.

Co. 14 Allen, 485.

Sheldon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was provided by the statutes in force at the time of this accident that no person should operate an automobile or motorcycle upon any public highway or private way in this commonwealth laid out under authority of statute, unless he had been licensed to do so and unless his automobile or motorcycle had been registered as prescribed. Stat. 1903, chap. 473, p. 507; Stat. 1905, chap. 311, p. 227. But it was also provided by § 2 of the act last cited that "any automobile or motorcycle owned by a nonresident of this state who has complied with the laws relative to motor vehicles and the operation thereof, of the state in which he resides, may be operated by such owner on the roads and highways of this state for a period not exceeding fifteen days, without the license," etc., required in other cases. The first question presented in this case is whether the plaintiff in operating his machine in this commonwealth on the day of the accident was acting in violation of law.

He was a resident of Connecticut. He had complied with all the laws of that state, and had a right to operate his machine on the highways of this commonwealth for a period not exceeding fifteen days. He came into this commonwealth in his automobile on Wednesday, September 13th, and remained here until the day of the accident, September 29th, except that on September 14th he drove to West Suffield, Connecticut, returning to Massachusetts the same evening, and that he went to Brattleboro, Vermont, on one day to attend a fair, staying there that day, but not overnight. Each of these absences was merely a temporary visit to the other state, made with no intention of a permanent stay, and followed by a speedy return; and on each of these days he did actually operate his machine in this commonwealth. After his return from Vermont and before the accident, his machine needed repairs, and was kept in a repair garage a day and a half for that purpose.

It is not necessary to determine whether the statute before us should be interpreted as giving to nonresident owners of motor cars, who have complied with the laws of their own state, merely one period of fifteen days after once coming into the commonwealth, before being forbidden to operate their machines on the roads of this commonwealth without a license under its authority and allowing only one total period of grace during the whole of the license year; or whether it should be construed more liberally by allowing nonresident owners to operate their cars without a license for a period of not more than fifteen days upon any and every occasion when they shall come into this commonwealth. In either event, this plaintiff had exceeded his privilege. He made one visit here; and the running of his fifteen days was not interrupted by his temporary calls into other states. Nor can the period be extended by not counting the days on which his machine was laid up for repairs, or on which, for any other reason, he did not actually operate it. He had driven it into this commonwealth; within the meaning of the statute he was operating it during the whole of his stay. By no process of computation can it be claimed that his stay had lasted for less than sixteen days. It follows that he was acting unlawfully, in violation of the statutes referred to, at the time of the collision between his machine and the defendant's trolley car; and it must be determined whether his violation of law is necessarily fatal to his right of action.

The general rule was stated in Newcomb v. Boston Protective Dept. 146 Mass. 590, 4 Am. St. Rep. 354, 16 N. E. 555, that the plaintiff's unlawful act will prevent his recovery if it directly contributed to his injury. But there is a distinction between an unlawful act which is, at least, a contributing cause of the accident and one which is merely an attendant circumstance or a condition, though perhaps a necessary condition, of that accident. McCarthy v. Morse, 197 Mass. 332, 83 N. E. 1109; Black v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 193 Mass. 448, 452, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 148, 79 N. E. 797, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 485, and cases there cited; Biggio v. Boston, 179 Mass. 356, 60 N. E. 938. And if we had before us simply the case of a plaintiff who was driving his vehicle on a public way in a manner forbidden by law, or without appliances required by law, but who, while himself using all due care, had been injured by an accident due solely to the negligence of a third person, his own violation of law not being a contributory cause of the accident, but merely one of the conditions existing at the time, it could not be said that such a plaintiff was barred of recovery by the mere fact of his violation of the law. But that is not the case which is now presented. We are dealing here with a peculiar kind of vehicle which has only recently come into use, which requires unusual care in its management, and the presence of which upon the highways has been found to involve more than ordinary risks to other travelers. As was said by the chief justice, speaking for the full court in Com. v. Kingsbury, 199 Mass. 542, 544, 127 Am. St. Rep. 513, 85 N. E. 848: "Automobiles are vehicles of great speed and power, whose appearance is frightful to most horses that are unaccustomed to them. The use of them introduces a new element of danger to ordinary travelers on the highways, as well as to those riding in the automobiles. In order to protect the public, great care should be exercised in the use of them. Statutory regulation of their speed while running on the highways is reasonable and proper for the promotion of the safety of the public. It is the duty of the legislature, in the exercise of the police power, to consider the risks that arise from the use of new inventions applying the forces of nature in previously unknown ways. The general principle is too familiar to need discussion. It has been applied to automobiles in different states, with the approval of the courts. Com. v. Boyd, 188 Mass. 79, 108 Am. St. Rep. 464, 74 N. E. 255; Christy v. Elliott, 216 Ill. 31, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 215, 108 Am. St. Rep. 196, 74 N. E. 1035, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 487; People v. Schneider, 139 Mich. 673, 69 L.R.A. 345, 103 N. W. 172, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 790; People v. MacWilliams, 91 App. Div. 176, 86 N. Y. Supp. 357."

Accordingly, the legislature has dealt with this subject. The rights of these parties are governed by Stat. 1903, chap. 473, p. 507, as amended by Stat. 1905, chap. 311, p. 227, which was then in force, and to which we have already referred. But we must now look more closely at the provisions of this statute. We find that, as expressed in the title, it provides comprehensively for "the registration of automobiles and motorcycles and for licensing operators thereof." Section 1 requires that "all automobiles . . . shall be registered," and provides with much detail for the registration by the highway commissioners both of the machines, with identifying numbers or marks, and of the names of the owners. Section 2 allows a general registration to be made by manufacturers of such machines and by dealers therein. Section 4 provides for the licensing of operators or drivers; and by § 5 all unlicensed persons are forbidden to operate such machines. Sections 7, 8, 10, and 11, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) and Stat. 1905, chap. 366, p. 289, contain limitations upon the speed allowed, and requirements of brakes and other appliances, manifestly intended as precautions to be observed for the safety of other persons upon the highways. Section 9 fixes penalties for any violation of the act. Thus far the provisions of the act in question substantially resemble those of the Lord's Day act formerly in force, which made traveling on that day illegal simply by imposing a penalty upon anyone who did so. But § 3 of the act before us (Stat. 1903, chap. 473, p. 507) goes yet further, and expressly ordains that, "except as otherwise provided herein, no automobile or motorcycle shall . . . be operated upon any public highway . . . unless registered as above provided." This provision, in addition to the penalties fixed for any operation of unregistered machines, forbids their being operated upon the highway at all. We cannot avoid the conclusion that it was intended to safeguard persons who were lawfully using the highways, from the serious risks of injury by machines of this character which were operated in defiance of the law, and the owners of which furnished no means by which they could be identified, and compelled to make proper compensation for the injuries which, by their violation of law or by their mere negligence, they might cause to other travelers. The legislature, in the opinion of a majority of the court, intended to outlaw unregistered machines, and to give them, as to persons lawfully using the highways, no other right than that of being exempt from reckless, wanton, or wilful injury. They were to be no more travelers than is a runaway horse. Richards v. Enfield, 13 Gray, 344; Higgins v. Boston, 148 Mass. 484, 20 N. E. 105. The plaintiff as a mere trespasser upon the highway was there not only against the right of the owner of the soil and so liable to an action by him, but also against the rights of all other persons who were lawfully using the highway. He was violating a law made for their protection against him; accordingly, he was a trespasser as to them. It follows that the defendant, which was lawfully using the highway with its cars, owed to the plaintiff no other or further duty than that which it would owe to any trespasser upon its property; that is, not the duty of ordinary care, as those words are commonly used, but merely the duty to abstain from injuring him by wantonness or recklessness. Sullivan v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 199 Mass. 73, 76, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 36, 84 N. E. 844; Fitzmaurice v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 192 Mass. 159, 162, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1146, 116 Am. St. Rep. 236, 78 N. E. 418, 7 A. &

It is difficult to see how § 3 of this act can be given any effect if it is not construed as we have stated. Sections 1 and 9, requiring registration and fixing a penalty for any violation of the act, make of themselves the operation of an unregistered automobile unlawful, as in the case of the Lord's Day act already referred to, and as in the failure to use bells upon a sleigh, under Rev. Laws, chap. 54, § 3. But the purpose of the statute—to afford protection and adequate means of redress to all persons upon the ways—would not then have been fully accomplished. The additional prohibition was made, we must suppose, for the purpose of regulating the rights of travelers among themselves, whether they should be walking, driving vehicles drawn by horses, or operating automobiles. It is a reasonable assumption that the legislature intended to put these forbidden and dangerous machines outside the pale of travelers, not merely for the purpose of the criminal law, but as regards all other persons rightfully upon the streets. The addition of the prohibition was well adapted for this purpose; if not so construed, it was merely a useless iteration of the legal effect of the other provisions of the same act. And our view is confirmed by the fact that the prohibition is not extended to automobiles which are merely traveling without the lights or other appliances required by §§ 10 and 11 of the act. The owner or operator may be liable to a penalty in that case; but the operation of the machine itself was not expressly forbidden.

The real question here is doubtless whether the legislature has created a duty to other travelers upon the highways, or merely a public duty to be enforced in the ordinary administration of the criminal law, while civil rights and liabilities are left to be governed by the general rules which are applicable in such cases, between parties one of whom has been guilty of a violation of law. Monroe v. Hartford Street R. Co. 76 Conn. 201, 206, 56 Atl. 498; Frontier Steam Laundry Co. v. Connolly, 72 Neb. 767, 68 L.R.A. 425, 101 N. W. 995; Cook v. Johnston, 58 Mich. 437, 55 Am. Rep. 703, 25 N. W. 388; Hayes v. Michigan C. R. Co. 111 U. S. 228, 239, 28 L. ed. 414, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 369; Atkinson v. Newcastle & G. Waterworks Co. L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 441. In our opinion the former is the case. Banks v. Highland Street R. Co. 136 Mass. 485; Newcomb v. Boston Protective Dept. 146 Mass. 596, 600, 4 Am. St. Rep. 354 et seq., 16 N. E. 555.

chap. 473, p. 507, as amended by Stat. 1905, chap. 311, p. 227, we do not think it necessary to examine the decisions in Marble v. Ross, 124 Mass. 44; O'Brien v. Hudner, 182 Mass. 381, 65 N. E. 788; Slattery v. Lawrence Ice Co. 190 Mass. 79, 76 N. E. 459; Jaehnig v. J. G. & B. S. Ferguson Co. 197 Mass. 364, 83 N. E. 868, and similar cases.

Of course the defendant would have had no right to run its car into the plaintiff's machine wantonly or recklessly; and that is the point of such cases as Welch v. Wesson, 6 Gray, 505, and McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 183 Mass. 271, 97 Am. St. Rep. 437, 67 N. E. 329. But there was no evidence in the case at bar to warrant a finding for the plaintiff upon this ground.

Accordingly, the verdict for the defendant was rightly ordered; and we need not consider the somewhat doubtful question whether upon the evidence it could have been found that the plaintiff's conduct at the time of the collision was in other respects consistent with the exercise of due care on his part.

Exceptions overruled.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

SOUTH HAVEN & EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Appts.,

v.

WILLIAM CULVER et al.

(— Mich. —, 122 N. W. 95.)

Pleading — demurrer — collateral questions.

1. Collateral questions as to proceedings on appeal and on motions for new trial cannot be raised by demurrer to a bill to set aside a judgment on the ground that it was procured by perjury, which does not set out the facts on which such questions are based.

Injunction — perjured judgment — enforcement.

2. That a judgment was confessedly procured by perjury gives a court of equity no jurisdiction to enjoin its enforcement.

(July 6, 1909.)

Case Note. — Perjury as ground for relief against judgment.

This subject was treated in an exhaustive note to Graves v. Graves, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216. The present note is merely supplementary thereto.

The general rule is that equity will not grant relief from a judgment upon the sole ground that the judgment in question was procured by means of false testimony given upon the trial. While equity has the power to grant relief from judgments procured by fraud, such fraud must be extrinsic to the case; and a party to the suit must be

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Alexis C. Angell, with Mr. Ernest Dale Owen, for appellants:

A court will not take judicial notice of matter of record of another court, to sustain or overrule a demurrer to a pleading.

Thiedt, 137 Wis. 634, 119 N. W. 878.

Thus, in Nelson v. Meehan, supra, it was held that the acts for which a court of equity will, on account of fraud, annul a judgment or decree between the same parties after the term is ended, must have relation to frauds extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried, and not to a fraud such as perjury, in the matter on which the decree was rendered. An appeal from a decree setting aside a judgment on the ground of perjury was dismissed, however, upon the ground that it did not appear that the motion to vacate the judgment was not made during the same term of court.

So, a bill for an injunction to restrain the collection of a judgment on the ground of perjury, will not be sustained, although it contains an averment that the complainant has secured an admission of the perjury from the judgment creditor, as this averment only goes to the character of the proof by which the perjury is to be established. Steel v. Culver (Mich.) 122 N. W. 95.

And in Hedrick v. Smith, supra, it was held that it was a settled doctrine of that court that even an allegation of a fact known to be false, and the establishment of that fact by testimony also known to be false, do not afford sufficient ground for setting aside a judgment on the ground of fraud.

So, in Johnson v. Anna Bldg. & L. Asso. 133 Ill. App. 213, it was held that a bill of review may lie where the false evidence complained of is charged to relate to matters affecting the court's jurisdiction; but the same rule does not apply where the false evidence was simply evidence upon the issues tried and disposed of upon the original hearing.

That a judgment was obtained by perjured testimony, without other matters of equitable cognizance, cannot avail the complainant on a motion to restrain the execution of a judgment at law, founded upon the alleged fraudulent judgment. Wilson v. Anthony, 72 N. J. Eq. 836, 66 Atl. 907.

The following cases present specific reasons, independent of the general rule, why equity will not set aside a judgment procured by perjury:

Thus, the enforcement of a judgment will not be restrained on the ground that it was secured by perjury, unless the perjury is established beyond all reasonable controversy by evidence clear, convincing, and satisfactory. Boring v. Ott, 138 Wis. 260, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1080, 119 N. W. 865.

So, in Kretschmar v. Ruprecht, 230 Ill. 492, 82 N. E. 836, it was held that false testimony given at the trial or false assertions as to liability are not ground for setting aside a judgment, especially where the party applying for relief is not free from negligence.

Delay of five years in bringing the action alone is sufficient to deny relief from a judgment procured by perjury. Whittle v. Whittle, supra.

And where the truthfulness or falsity of testimony was within the full knowledge of the complaining party at the time of the trial, the court will not entertain an action to set the judgment aside merely on the ground of the perjury. Walker v. State, supra.

A divorce will not be vacated on the ground that it was based on perjured testimony knowingly procured by the libellant, after a marriage has been entered into on the faith of the decree, and a child born of the marriage. Zeitlin v. Zeitlin, 202 Mass. 205, post, 569, 86 N. E. 762.

Perjury committed upon the trial has been held not to be a "fraud" within the meaning of statutes giving courts of equity power to set aside judgments obtained by means of fraud.

Thus, false swearing or perjury is not a

And perjury on the part of plaintiff is not within the provisions of a statute allowing the court to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Nelson v. Meehan, supra.

Under § 4277, Rev. Laws 1905, providing for an action to set aside a judgment obtained by means of the perjury, subornation of perjury, or any fraudulent act, practice, or representation of the prevailing party, an action cannot be maintained upon the bare allegation that, on an issue of fact so squarely made that each party knew what the other would attempt to prove, and where neither had a right, or was under any necessity, to depend on the other to prove the fact to be as he himself claimed it, there was false or perjured testimony by the successful party or his witnesses. Hayward v. Larrabee, 106 Minn. 210, 118 N. W. 795. To the same general effect was the decision in Bisseberg v. Ree, 99 Minn. 481, 109 N. W. 1115.

A final judgment cannot be annulled merely because it can be shown to have been based upon perjured testimony.

Guyot, 159 U.

In some cases, where it appears that the perjury was not discovered in time, so that the complaining party could avail himself of the knowledge upon the original trial, a bill to set aside the judgment has been entertained.

Thus, a complaint was held good on demurrer in Sargent Co. v. Baublis, 127 Ill. App. 631, where it was clear, from the averments of the bill, that the appellee perpetrated a fraud upon appellant by means of his own perjured testimony, and that the fraud was practised in the very matter of obtaining the judgment, so that it must be regarded as perpetrated upon the court as well as upon the appellant, and where it further appeared that the fraud shown could not have been litigated in the action in which the judgment was obtained, nor was a matter of which appellant could avail himself in the court giving judgment.

So, equity will enjoin the enforcement of a judgment secured by perjury where the judgment debtor used diligence, but failed to discover the perjury in time to be available at the trial, or to secure the relief provided by statute in such cases. Boring v. Ott, supra.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill filed on the equity side of the court to set aside and restrain the collection of a judgment obtained by the defendant William Culver against the plaintiff railroad company for personal injuries, amounting to the sum of $19,200. The bill alleges that such judgment was obtained in the circuit court for the county of Van Buren; that an appeal was taken to this court from such judgment, where the same was affirmed; that the complainant the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland became surety on the bonds given on such appeal; that subsequently, upon a sale of the complainant railroad company to another railroad system, the complainant Steele entered into an obligation to pay whatever sum might eventually be recovered against the company in said action by said Culver. The bill further alleges certain proceedings taken in the Federal court to restrain the collection of this judgment, which, however, resulted in a dismissal of the case on the ground of want of jurisdiction in the Federal court. The bill alleges that, on the trial of the case of Culver against the railroad company, said Culver and some of his witnesses knowingly and wilfully testified falsely upon the material and determining question in the case, and that he and his attorney, Tabor, suborned said witnesses to swear falsely; that the officers of the railroad company and those in charge of such litigation knew in practical effect that such testimony was false, but that, with all due diligence, they were unable to make proof of such fact, as the same was kept secret and was clandestinely done; that after the rendition of said judgment and after the appeal thereof, and preceding the determination of such appeal, in an effort to make a settlement of the case without the intervention of his lawyers, the said Culver made a full and complete statement and confession to the complainant Steele that he, the said Culver, had testified falsely in such cause on a material and controlling point therein, and that he and his attorney, Tabor, had suborned witnesses to swear falsely in corroboration of his testimony. The prayer of the bill is that the collection of the judgment be forever restrained and enjoined, and for such further relief as equity may require. To this bill of complaint a demurrer was filed, and, upon hearing by the court, was duly sustained. The complainant appeals the case here.

Attention is called in the brief of defendants' counsel to proceedings had upon motions for new trial and to proceedings in this court, which would have an important bearing upon the merits of the case if properly within the issue. But, in so far as the demurrer attempts to raise these collateral questions of fact, we think it is not good pleading. Both counsel, however, seem to be agreed that the question presented is whether the bill makes a case for equitable relief, and that question we proceed to consider.

It is contended by complainant's counsel that the question in the precise form here presented has never been determined by this court. It is true that no case presenting precisely the facts averred in this bill has been called to our attention, but we think that in principle the question is stare decisis. The question arose in Gray v. Barton, 62 Mich. 186, 28 N. W. 813, whether, after a judgment at law had been obtained, a court of equity would interfere to restrain the collection of the judgment and to award a new trial, where the bill averred that the defendant in the chancery case (plaintiff in the law case) had committed perjury upon the trial, and that the complainant was not, at the time of the trial of the suit at law, in possession of the evidence with which to prove the falsity of the defendant's testimony, but had since been able to procure testimony by which he could establish the real truth. In negating the right to maintain the bill, it was said: "The weight of authority is decidedly against the granting of a new trial in a court of equity to impeach the testimony of witnesses, or because a party has committed perjury, or even suborned a witness to commit perjury." It was added: "It might be that a judgment at law might be so manifestly against conscience that a new trial would be granted in equity, as in a case where perjury was established by some instrument or document in writing, or where a witness for the prevailing party has been, subsequent to the trial, convicted of false swearing in the case." The case of Miller v. Morse, 23 Mich. 368, was approved, in which case a new trial was asked in a court of equity to relieve against a judgment at law alleged to have been obtained by conspiracy and false swearing of the plaintiff. In disposing of that case, the court said, speaking through Mr. Justice Cooley: "We do not see why, if this bill should be sustained, the defeated party might not maintain a similar one in nearly every case which the courts of law dispose of." The question again was presented to this court in Codde v. Mahiat, 109 Mich. 186, 66 N. W. 1093. In that case it was averred that the verdict was obtained by perjury on the part of the defendant. Complainant averred in his bill that he had now discovered evidence to the effect that the defendant stated to other parties that she was not engaged to complainant, had no love or affection for him, and would not marry him. Again, the claim was made that these were made controlling questions in the case. But in a very brief opinion by Mr. Justice Grant it was held that the case was ruled by Gray v. Barton. It is undoubted that cases may be found which are not in accord with the views expressed in these two cases, and in which exceptions are introduced which might justify the maintenance of the bill in the present case. But we think the rule is best stated in United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93. In an able opinion by Mr. Justice Miller the rule is stated to be that if, in the trial of a suit at law, a mistake has been made in the law, there is a remedy by writ of error. "If the jury has been mistaken in the facts, the remedy is by motion for new trial. If there has been evidence discovered since the trial, a motion for a new trial will give appropriate relief. But all these are parts of the same proceeding, relief is given in the same suit, and the party is not vexed by another suit for the same matter. So, in a suit in chancery, on proper showing a rehearing is granted. If the injury complained of is an erroneous decision, an appeal to a higher court gives opportunity to correct the error. If new evidence is discovered after the decree has become final, a bill of review on that ground may be filed within the rules prescribed by law on that subject. Here, again, these proceedings are all part of the same suit, and the rule framed for the repose of society is not violated. But there is an admitted exception to this general rule in cases where, by reason of something done by the successful party to a suit, there was, in fact, no adversary trial or decision of the issue in the case. Where the unsuccessful party has been prevented from exhibiting fully his case by fraud or deception practised on him by his opponent, as by keeping him away from court, a false promise of a compromise, or where the defendant never had knowledge of the suit, being kept in ignorance by the acts of the plaintiff, or where an attorney fraudulently or without authority assumes to represent a party and connives at his defeat, or where the attorney regularly employed corruptly sells out his client's interest to the other side,—these and similar cases which show that there has never been a real contest in the trial or hearing of the case are reasons for which a new suit may be sustained to set aside and annul the former judgment or decree, and open the case for a new and a fair hearing. . . . In all these cases and many others which have been examined, relief has been granted on the ground that, by some fraud practised directly upon the party seeking relief against the judgment or decree, that party has been prevented from presenting all of his case to the court. On the other hand, the doctrine is equally well settled that the court will not set aside a judgment because it was founded on a fraudulent instrument, or perjured evidence, or for any matter which was actually presented and considered in the judgment assailed." In our view, this rule is the only one which can be applied and the sanctity of a judgment be maintained. It was further said by Mr. Justice Miller: "The mischief of retrying every case in which the judgment or decree rendered on false testimony given by perjured witnesses, or on contracts or documents whose genuineness or validity was in issue, and which are afterwards ascertained to be forged or fraudulent, would be greater, by reason of the endless nature of the strife, than any compensation arising from doing justice in individual cases." As was said by Chief Justice Shaw in Greene v. Greene, 2

Gray, 361, 61 Am. Dec. 454, referred to by Mr. Justice Miller in United States v. Throckmorton: "The maxim that fraud vitiates every proceeding must be taken, like other general maxims, to apply to cases where proof of fraud is admissible. But where the same matter has been actually tried, or so in issue that it might have been tried, it is not again admissible. The party is estopped to set up such fraud, because the judgment is the highest evidence, and cannot be contradicted."

The case of Edson v. Edson, 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393, is cited by complainant's counsel. As we read that case, however, it in no way militates against the decisions of Mr. Justice Shaw in Greene v. Greene. That case is reviewed at length, and the substance of the decision stated as follows: "Strictly speaking, the decision is an authority only for the proposition that a decree of divorce cannot be called in question or invalidated, on the ground of fraud in its procurement, in a separate and independent libel, subsequently brought between the same parties, when it appears that the first decree was entered after due notice to the adverse party, followed by an adjudication upon evidence offered in support of the allegation in the libel. To this extent there can be no doubt that the decision is in harmony with sound principle and with adjudicated cases." It is then shown that the case under consideration is quite different, in that it appeared that the proceeding was instituted by an innocent party without notice, who was aggrieved by a judgment or decree obtained against her without her knowledge by the fraud of the other party. The following cases are in harmony with the rule laid down in this state, and to which we adhere: Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 13 L.R.A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537; Friese v. Hummel, 26 Or. 145, 46 Am. St. Rep. 610, 37 Pac. 458. In Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Wells, 54 Am. St. Rep. 233 note, it is stated, and we think it is an accurate summary of the authorities, that, while there are a few decisions which are defensible only on the theory that an allegation of perjury or subornation of perjury may be sufficient to invoke the action of the court against a judgment claimed to be due thereto, these decisions are contrary to the great weight of authority on the subject. See also Graves v. Graves, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 216, and accompanying note (132 Iowa, 199, 109 N. W. 707, 10 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1104).

It is contended that the authority of United States v. Throckmorton, supra, has been shaken by the case of Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 589, 35 L. ed. 870, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62. Without reviewing at length 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this latter decision, we think the best answer to this contention is contained in the opinion of Judge Lacombe in United States v. Gleeson, 33 C. C. A. 272, 62 U. S. App. 311, 90 Fed. 778. The precise question of whether Marshall v. Holmes had overturned the doctrine of United States v. Throckmorton was there considered, and the court held, on the contrary, that the rule laid down in the Throckmorton Case was stare decisis. As before intimated, the Michigan rule is established by the two cases of Gray v. Barton and Codde v. Mahiat. The only possible distinction between those cases and the present is that in this case there is an averment that the complainant has secured an admission of the perjury from the party. This, however, only goes to the character of the proof by which the perjury is to be established. The same objection to a retrial of a question foreclosed by a trial and judgment at law would arise, and the same considerations which would preclude a party from proving by evidence of other witnesses the fact of perjury would be quite as persuasive to deny the right to rest upon alleged admissions of a party. We think to ingraft such an exception on the rule would open the door to abuse, and render a judgment obtained after a full trial on the merits precarious, and impose upon the successful party the burden of unbearable expense in maintaining a right already adjudicated.

The decree of the court below, dismissing the bill of complaint, is affirmed, with costs.

GODDA R. ZEITLIN, Resp't.,
v.
ADOLPH ZEITLIN, Appt.

(202 Mass. 205, 88 N. E. 762.)

Divorce — judgment — conclusiveness — perjury.

A divorce will not be vacated on the ground that it was based on perjured testimony knowingly procured by libellant, after a marriage has been entered into on the faith of the decree, and a child born of the marriage.

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Superior Court for Middlesex County in complainant's favor in a suit to vacate a decree of divorce. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — As to perjury as ground for relief against judgment, see case note to South Haven & E. R. Co. v. Culver, ante, 564.

Mr. F. Rockwood Hall for appellant.

Messrs. Robert Homans and Frank J. Sulloway, for appellee:

A decree of divorce will be set aside on a petition in the same proceeding, seasonably brought, if obtained by fraud.

Edson v. Edson, 108 Mass. 590, 11 Am. Rep. 393; Adams v. Adams, 51 N. H. 388, 12 Am. Rep. 134; Helmes v. Helmes, 24 Misc. 125, 52 N. Y. Supp. 734; Nicholson v. Nicholson, 113 Ind. 131, 15 N. E. 223; Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 46 Iowa, 437.

Reasons of public policy or a regard to the consequences which might ensue to innocent parties from the exercise of a power to invalidate a decree of divorce after it has become res judicata do not constitute sufficient reasons for a denial of the existence of the power.

Edson v. Edson, 108 Mass. 598, 11 Am. Rep. 393.

Knowlton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition to vacate a decree of divorce obtained by the respondent against the petitioner. The jurisdiction of the court that granted the divorce, both over the case and the parties, was perfect. The ground on which the petition rests is that the case for a divorce was made out at the hearing by perjured testimony, knowingly procured by the libellant. The only question presented is whether a decree of divorce so obtained should be vacated upon proof of the fraud practised upon the court.

It is in the interests of justice that, after a trial and final judgment in a case, the matters heard and adjudicated shall not be opened for a further hearing because of a supposed error in the determination of facts by the tribunal that heard the evidence. A contention that some part of the material testimony was false might be made with plausibility in a large proportion of the cases that are tried. A contention that the prevailing party knowingly gave or procured false testimony upon an issue involved might be made and strongly supported in a great many cases. It is against public policy to open cases on no other ground than this.

In Keyes v. Brackett, 187 Mass. 306, 72 N. E. 986, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 81, it was assumed, with a citation of authorities, that the law does not permit an attack of this kind upon a judgment or decree entered upon the merits, after a hearing or trial between adverse parties, upon issues arising in an ordinary case in a court of justice. The fraud that was held sufficient to give relief in that case was practised upon a master, on the question whether a bond to dissolve a mechanics' lien should be approved as sufficient. Fraud which is extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried, whereby the court was induced to assume jurisdiction when in fact it had no jurisdiction, or whereby the unsuccessful party was prevented in any way from being properly heard upon a subject which entered into the merits of the matter before the court, may be a ground of vacating a judgment or decree. But in Holbrook v. Holbrook, 114 Mass. 568, Chief Justice Gray said: "A decree of divorce will not be vacated and set aside by the court after the term at which it was entered, without clear proof that the libellee was prevented, by fraud of the libellant or imposition upon the court, from being heard in the original suit upon some matter which, if then proved, would have constituted a good defense." In Greene v. Greene, 2 Gray, 361, 61 Am. Dec. 454, Chief Justice Shaw pointed out very clearly the objections to setting aside a decree for divorce upon an application in subsequent proceedings. One of the facts to which he referred, namely, a marriage upon the faith of the decree, and the birth of a child of the marriage, exists in the present case. In Edson v. Edson, 108 Mass. 591, 11 Am. Rep. 393, it was held that such a decree may be vacated when the jurisdiction of the court was founded wholly or in part upon the fraud of the successful party. The decision in Greene v. Greene, supra, that a libel to set aside a decree of divorce on the ground that it was obtained by false testimony, fraudulently procured, cannot be maintained, is reaffirmed in this later case. The fact that the application to set aside the original decree was contained in a libel in which a divorce was prayed for was treated as immaterial. The chief justice said: "We can perceive no difference between the case where a libellant inserts such an allegation and prayer in an original libel by which she seeks a divorce a vinculo on another ground, and a case where such allegation and prayer are made the only subject of an original libel to set aside a former decree. The object in both cases is to reverse and annul a subsisting decree." This decision is in accordance with the general doctrine in other courts. United States v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, 25 L. ed. 93; Smith v. Lowry, 1 Johns. Ch. 322; Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 13 L.R.A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537; Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 91 Md. 360-374, 46 Atl. 1077; 2 Bishop, Marr. & Div. 1571, and cases cited.

Decree reversed.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

ALFRED A. WRIGHT

v.

ORANGE & PASSAIC VALLEY RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

Street railway—ejection of passenger.

Where a passenger on a street car is entitled by his contract to be carried to a certain point, and the railway company breaks the contract by turning the car back at a point short of the destination, the passenger's right of action is complete; and, if he elects to remain on the car for its return journey, he must pay the fare, and may include the amount in his damages. He is not entitled to remain on the car without payment of fare.

(July 2, 1909.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Essex County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful ejection of plaintiff from defendant's car. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Leonard J. Tynan, for plaintiff in error:

The plaintiff having been informed when the car stopped to turn back that it would not proceed, any action he might have for failure to carry had then matured, and it was his duty to get off the car.

Shelton v. Erie R. Co. 73 N. J. L. 558, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 727, 118 Am. St. Rep. 704, 66 Atl. 403, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 883; Hoelljes v. Interurban Street R. Co. 43 Misc. 350, 87 N. Y. Supp. 133; Baggett v. Baltimore

Headnote by MINTURN, J.

Case Note.—Right of passenger on street car which turns back before reaching destination.

It appears that the only other case directly in point upon this question is Mills v. Seattle, R. & S. R. Co. 50 Wash. 20, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 704, 96 Pac. 520, in which it was held that where a street car turned back before it had reached the passenger's contemplated destination, to which he was entitled to be carried, it was his duty to leave the car upon the conductor's request, and, upon his refusal to leave the car, he became a trespasser, subject to ejection, although the conductor had refused his demand for a transfer to another car, on which he might have completed his journey, but he could not lawfully be ejected while the car was in motion.

& O. R. Co. 3 App. D. C. 522; Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 135 Mass. 407, 46 Am. Rep. 481; Yorton v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 54 Wis. 234, 41 Am. Rep. 23, 11 N. W. 482; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Breckinridge, 99 Ky. 1, 34 S. W. 702; Petrie v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 42 N. J. L. 449; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pierce, 47 Mich. 277, 11 N. W. 157; Martindale v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 60 Mo. 508.

Mr. Chauncy H. Beasley also for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Samuel Kalisch and Frederick M. Payne for defendant in error.

Minturn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Three cases, involving the same question, arising out of an alleged trespass vi et armis by defendant, through its conductor, upon plaintiffs, respectively, were tried together; and the determination of the fundamental question involved in the case sub judice, it is stipulated between counsel, shall be dispositive of the other two cases. The material facts constituting the concrete case are not in dispute. The plaintiff and his two sons resided at Montclair, near Eagle Rock, from and to which place they went and returned each working day in the course of their business, using defendant's street railway car upon their return by transfer from Orange. On February 15, 1906, the plaintiff boarded at Orange a car upon which the sign "Eagle Rock" was displayed. The cars upon this route, owing to the condition of the tracks at that period, had not been running to Eagle Rock for some days, but stopped at a place called Valley Way, which is in the neighborhood of a mile below the former place. At Valley Way the conductor turned the trolley pole, and notified plaintiff

N. W. 793, and Appleby v. St. Paul City R. Co. 54 Minn. 169, 40 Am. St. Rep. 308, 55 N. W. 1117, are cases in which the passengers failed to reach their contemplated destination because the cars stopped at the company's barns, and did not go to the end of the line. In the former it was held that the passenger, having alighted from the car without asking for a transfer ticket, could lawfully be ejected from the next car which he took, going toward his destination, if he refused to pay fare thereon, and that the second conductor was not obliged to take his statement as evidence of his right to ride. In the latter, it was held that the passenger was justified in assuming that the car on which he paid his fare was to go to the end of the line, and the conductor having disappeared, so that he could not get a transfer ticket, he had a right to complete his journey on the next car going in the same direction without again paying fare.

that the car would proceed no further. Plaintiff then said, "We have transfers to Eagle Rock" and the conductor replied, "Well, we don't go any further," and, he continues, "he came around and demanded our fare, and we would not pay any more fare; so they dragged us off the car," which at that time was on its way back towards West Orange. The alleged trespass was of a nominal character, and no claim is made that serious injury resulted to plaintiff therefrom. At the trial the plaintiff's counsel limited the issue by the statement: "We stand upon the assault and battery counts in each declaration. We rely upon so much of the facts in each of the counts as constitutes a cause of action, and that is the wrongful ejection from the car." This narrowed the issue to the determination of the question whether the ejection of plaintiff from the car was wrongful. The defendant met this claim by insisting that after request made upon plaintiff for his fare, and his refusal to pay, he became ipso facto a trespasser; and, upon his refusal to alight, the right inured to defendant to eject him.

It must be conceded that, if the legal status of plaintiff under the circumstances was that of a trespasser, the right of ejection might be properly exercised by defendant; and proof of that fact at common law, conjoined with the plea molliter manus imposit, would afford a complete defense to the action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 500; Gates v. Lounsbury, 20 Johns. 427. The plaintiff insists that he was not a trespasser, but had a legal right to remain on the car because the company had failed to perform its contract to carry him to Eagle Rock. He does not claim that he was entitled to be carried back free to his starting point, but stands upon a right, as he claimed to the conductor, "to stay on that car until it went to Eagle Rock." The trial judge charged that the question for the jury was whether the plaintiff was warned, when he got on the car, that it would not go through to Eagle Rock. We think this was erroneous. The failure to warn him when he got on the car would, under the circumstances of this case, justify an inference that the company had contracted to carry him to Eagle Rock; but the plaintiff's remedy for breach of that contract was an action for damages, and that right of action was complete as soon as the company abandoned the trip and turned the car back. The plaintiff was not obliged to stay on the car any longer to test the readiness of the company to perform its contract. And his remedy for the breach of contract did not include a right to stay on the car indefinitely. He had his election, when the car came to the end of its actual trip, to leave and sue for damages, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

or to make a new contract for carriage on the return trip, and add its cost to his damages, subject, of course, to the rule which requires one to minimize his damages. He chose the latter alternative. Having done so, he became bound to pay his fare to the conductor, who had no authority to carry him free. This is the effect of our decision in Shelton v. Erie R. Co. 73 N. J. L. 558, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 727, 118 Am. St. Rep. 704, 66 Atl. 403, 9 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 883. There is nothing in McDonald v. Central R. Co. 72 N. J. L. 280, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 505, 111 Am. St. Rep. 672, 62 Atl. 405, that supports the plaintiff's contention. What we there decided was that, where the passenger's contract entitled him to be carried to Chester by the train on which he began his journey, he was not bound to get off at an intermediate station, merely because the conductor told him the train would not stop at Chester. He was entitled to make reasonable efforts to exercise his right. So, in this case; the plaintiff was entitled to stay on the car until he knew that the defendant had finally determined not to run it to Eagle Rock. As soon as the company so determined, and started the car on its return trip, his right of action was complete; but his right was a right to damages merely, not a right to occupy the car indefinitely. The right claimed by him would, in effect, deprive the company of the management of its own car, and make the plaintiff a tenant in common. The law of self-help has never been extended as far as that; and, in contemplation of law, damages are a sufficient redress for a private wrong.

The early common law is replete with recorded instances illustrative of the rule that, under such circumstances, the abuse of a legal right or privilege which accrued originally as the result of a contract or a legal obligation or a duty imposed by law, terminable at a certain period, places the transgressor in the status of a trespasser. Thus, Rolle, in his abridgment, instances the case of a lessor who enters to view for waste and stays all night; of the commoner who lawfully enters the common and cuts down trees; of a man who enters an inn and continues all night against the will of the taverner. 2 Rolle, Abr. 561, pl. 2. So, in a recent case, where a passenger remained upon a train for an unreasonable time after it reached its destination, he thereby ceased to be a passenger. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Frazer, 55 Kan. 582, 40 Pac. 923. In like manner, Brenner v. Jonesboro, L. C. & E. R. Co. 82 Ark. 128, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1060, 118 Am. St. Rep. 56, 100 S. W. 893, 12 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 489; Ripley v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 31 N. J. L. 388; Imhoff v. Chicago & M. R. Co. 20 Wis.

344; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 541, and cases cited, afford instances illustrative of the principle that the legal status of the plaintiff was that of a trespasser. At the very basis of these decisions in denial of the plaintiff's right is the fundamental ethical, as well as legal, maxim, Nemo ex proprio dolo consequitur actionem. Ellen v. Topp, 6 Exch. 424. So from this status was evolved that privilege which found judicial recognition as early as the Year Books, and which conceded to every owner whose property is unlawfully invaded the right, after reasonable demand, to eject therefrom the tortfeasor. Case of the Tithes (1507) 1 Y. B. Hen. VII. 27 Pl. 5; Entick v. Carrington, 19 How. St. Tr. 1029; Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 Barn. & Ald. 308; State v. Moore, 31 Conn. 479, 83 Am. Dec. 159. So, also, in the case at bar, the right of defendant, through its agents, to eject the plaintiff from its car, after his refusal to avail himself of the condition which, by right of contract, would have given him a legal status, cannot be successfully controverted, in the light of uniform adjudication wherever the common law is recognized as the law of the land. State v. Overton, 24 N. J. L. 435, 61 Am. Dec. 671; Jardine v. Cornell, 50 N. J. L. 485, 14 Atl. 590; Manning v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 95 Ala. 392, 16 L.R.A. 55, 36 Am. St. Rep. 225, 11 So. 8; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Wilson, 23 Ill. App. 63; Bradshaw v. South Boston R. Co. 135 Mass. 407, 46 Am. Rep. 481; Sanford v. 8th Ave. R. Co. 23 N. Y. 343, 80 Am. Dec. 286.

For these reasons the judgment in this case is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

OKLAHOMA SUPREME COURT.

AYLESBURY MERCANTILE COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,

v.

H. C. FITCH.

(— Okla. —, 99 Pac. 1089.)

Conversion — definition.

1. Conversion is any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exerted over another's personal property in denial of or inconsistent with his rights therein.

Action — conversion — breach of contract.

2. In a case where a retail merchant becoming indebted to a wholesaler executed a note therefor, securing its payment by a chattel mortgage on his stock and a contemporaneous written agreement under which he and his creditor entered jointly into possession of the stock for the purpose of selling the same at retail to liquidate the debt, the sale of a portion of such stock at prices less than its value, or the negligent use of the unsold portion, by such creditor while so in possession, or the unauthorized exclusion of such debtor from the store except during business hours, when he returned and assisted in conducting the business under the contract, would not constitute a cause of action for conversion of such stock, but one for a breach of contract.

Same — evidence — sufficiency.

3. Where, in such a case, the creditor subsequently takes exclusive possession of and appropriates the stock of goods without action, or by replevin under the clause of the chattel mortgage granting such privilege in certain contingencies, the same being taken over the protest and against the will of the debtor, such taking would constitute a conversion of the stock for which the creditor would be liable, where at the time either the debt had been extinguished or the contingency provided for had not lawfully arisen.

Conversion — return of property — mitigation of damages.

4. Where, in such a case, the property is returned to and accepted by the debtor prior to the beginning of the action, this fact is to be considered in mitigation of any damages recoverable.

Same — measure of damages.

5. If the property be wrongfully taken and is, on the order of the court, placed in the hands of a receiver, the measure of the owner's damages for loss of goods or depreciation in value is the difference between the market value thereof at the time of the taking and their value at the time of the receiver comes into possession.

Action — joinder — tort and contract.

6. Causes of action in tort may be joined in separate counts in the same petition with causes of action in contract, when they all arise out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action, and affect all the parties to the action.

(November 12, 1908.)

Case Note. — Sale of property at a loss or on unauthorized terms by one rightfully in possession, as a conversion.

It, without doubt, is the general rule that where one is rightfully in possession of property with authority to sell, the mere fact that such person sells the property at a lower price than the one authorized does not make him guilty of conversion, but the proper remedy of the owner of such goods is a special action on the case or an action for breach of contract. Moore v. McKibbin, 33 Barb. 246; Sarjeant v. Blunt, 16 Johns. 74; Cairnes v. Bleecker, 12 Johns. 300;

ERROR to the District Court for Kingfisher County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action of replevin to recover possession of a stock of goods and to foreclose a chattel mortgage thereon. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. H. Brooks, P. S. Nagel, and Mathew J. Kane for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Bradley & Bradley for defendant in error.

Dunn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controversy in this case grows out of a transaction between plaintiff in error, plaintiff below, and the defendant in error, defendant below, in dealing with a stock of general merchandise located in the town of Hennessey, Oklahoma. Prior to the making up the issues in the pleadings, the case was submitted to a referee with authority to settle the issues, take the evidence, and report with findings of fact and conclusions of law. This reference on the part of the court was made with the consent of both parties to the action. The referee acted in accordance with the reference, and the record made before him, now before us, covers nearly 700 pages of matter, consisting of pleadings, exhibits, and evidence. He found for the defendant, and against the plaintiff, on all the issues, made his report to the district court, which, after hearing the exceptions urged thereto by the plaintiff, overruled them and confirmed the report. Plaintiff thereupon took the case by proceedings in error to the supreme court of the territory of Oklahoma, and the same is now before us by virtue of our succession to that court under the terms of the enabling act (Act June 16, 1906, chap. 3335, 34 Stat. at L. 267), and the schedule to the state Constitution (Bunn's ed. §§ 449-493).

In view of the fact that we are unable to agree with the referee in certain findings of fact, which we regard as not reasonably supported by the evidence, and which, in our judgment, are controlling in the case, as on these were based his conclusions of law, we briefly state the facts as we find them to be shown by the evidence in the case, which evidence is nearly, if not quite, uncontradicted. All of the record and evidence on which he acted was returned by him and made a part of his report, and is now before us. The contracts under which the parties acted were in writing, and are before us for our consideration, just as they were before the referee. 2 Moore, Facts, § 1278; Faulkner v. Simms, 68 Neb. 299, 89 N. W. 171, 94 N. W. 113.

Dufresne v. Hutchinson, 3 Taunt. 117; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 701.

See the review of the above New York cases in AYLESBURY MERCANTILE CO. v. FITCH.

The reason for the above rule was stated in Clark & Skyles on Agency, vol. 1, p. 882, to be as follows: "In such cases the agent does not exercise any right of ownership over the property; he does nothing with it but what he was authorized to do. He disobeyed his instructions as to price or terms of sale only, and is liable for misconduct, but not for a conversion of the property. This distinction may, in a practical sense, seem technical, but it is founded upon the distinction between exercising a right of ownership over the property itself, and an unauthorized interference with the terms of sale, and is well supported by authorities. The proper remedy in such cases is an action for damages, not trover."

However, in Priestman v. Kendrick, 3 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 66, one who received two horses to sell at a certain price, and who, without his principal's authority or assent, sold them at a lower price, seems to have been held guilty of a conversion of the property, and is liable in trover.

So, where a sales agent illegally obtained possession of an automobile, and, in violation of his contract with the owner, sold the machine for a lower price than authorized, he was held to be liable to an action for conversion. Chase v. Baskerville, 93 Minn. 402, 101 N. W. 950.

The fact that an agent sells on credit, when authorized to sell for cash, does not make him guilty of conversion.

Thus, in Loveless v. Fowler, 79 Ga. 134, 11 Am. St. Rep. 407, 4 S. E. 103, it was held that a sale on credit by an agent in possession of the goods, and authorized to sell for cash only, is not a conversion, unless, possibly, it appears that the purchaser had notice of the limitation in the agent's instructions. The court said that the proper remedy against such agent is not trover, but an action on the case for violation of instructions or breach of contract.

Nor is an agent liable for conversion where he, with authority, sells fertilizers on credit, guaranteeing payment, and the goods so sold are not paid for, the remedy of the principal being upon the agent's contract of guaranty. Standard Fertilizer Co. v. Van Valkenburgh, 21 Misc. 559, 47 N. Y. Supp. 703.

However, where one in possession of goods, with mere authority to sell, exchanges the goods, it has been held that he is liable in trover for the conversion. Ainsworth v. Partillo, 18 Ala. 460; Haas v. Damon, 9 Iowa, 589. In each of these cases it was held that demand was not necessary to hold the agent liable for the value of the property.

Cases of sale at a different place than the one authorized, or at an unauthorized time, have been expressly excluded from this note, as well as those cases dealing with the appropriation of the proceeds.

Prior to November, 1901, H. L. Fitch, a gentleman somewhat advanced in years, owned and was in possession of a stock of general merchandise in the town of Hennessey, Oklahoma. He was indebted to a local bank in the sum of $175, and to plaintiff in the sum of $600. While this condition existed, and in the fore part of November, 1901, he transferred by bill of sale the said stock of goods to his son, H. C. Fitch, this defendant, and, on making the said transfer, delivered to him the possession thereof. On this taking place, the bank attached the stock of goods for its debt as the property of H. L. Fitch. The store was closed and placed in the hands of the sheriff, who was invoicing it when W. A. Story, vice president and credit man of plaintiff, the Aylesbury Mercantile Company, appeared on the ground for the purpose of looking after and protecting the debt due his house. Finding the store closed and the stock of goods in the hands of the sheriff, he proposed to defendant, H. C. Fitch, then the owner thereof, that he would take up and pay off the indebtedness of the bank, release the stock, add this to the amount then due from the father, the payment of which had been assumed by the defendant, and take from him a note covering the entire amount, to be secured by a chattel mortgage on the stock. This was accordingly done, and the defendant executed a note covering the whole indebtedness, with some other charges, in the sum of $836.95, to the plaintiff, dated November 12, 1901, drawing 8 per cent interest, due six months after date, the payment of which he secured by a chattel mortgage on all of the merchandise going to make up the stock, as well as the furniture and fixtures. This mortgage contained the usual covenants of instruments of that character, and provided that, if the party to whom it was given should at any time deem itself insecure for any cause, it should be lawful for it to take the property wherever the same could be found, and dispose of it at public auction or private sale, without notice, etc. At the same time, and as a part and parcel of the same contract, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a writing entitled "Contract and Agreement," which, owing to its importance in this controversy, we copy in full. It is as follows:

Know all men by these presents, that Aylesbury Mercantile Company of Wichita, Kansas, party of the first part, and Harry C. Fitch enter into the following stipulated agreement, and contract as follows, to wit:

Witnesseth: That the said party of the first part has a mortgage on the general stock of goods, wares, and merchandise, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

dated of even date herewith and signed and executed by the party of the second part. The Aylesbury Mercantile Company hereby agrees to sell Harry C. Fitch staple groceries which will be necessary in running the business, selling the goods at retail in the usual line of business for cash, at the lowest market price.

It is further agreed the Aylesbury Mercantile Company will put _____ in charge of their interest, at a salary of $50 per month, to assist the said Harry C. Fitch in carrying on the business in paying off said mortgage.

It is understood and agreed that Harry C. Fitch's salary is to be $50 per month, that said salaries are to be deducted from the proceeds of the business under the head of running expenses, the proceeds of the said indebtedness, the sum of $836.95, after deducting the said running expenses from the said net proceeds, are to be applied to the above described indebtedness.

It is hereby expressly agreed that written consent is given hereto to sell and dispose of the above-described goods, without violating any statute that may be in force from prohibiting the sale of property where there is a recorded lien by the said mortgage herein, that this agreement shall take effect and be in force during the entire period the aforesaid of the time of the aforesaid mortgage above referred to.

Witness my hand this 13th day of Nov. 1901. Aylesbury Mercantile Company,
By W. A. Story, V. P.
Harry C. Fitch.

Signed and executed in the presence of the named witnesses:

G. W. Baker,
H. L. Fitch.

November 16, 1901, under the arrangement thus made, plaintiff and defendant opened the store, after making an invoice of the goods contained therein, and began selling the same at retail, which continued until the 19th day of December, 1901, or for approximately a period of one month. It appears from the evidence that the plaintiff placed upon the door of the store a different lock, delivering the key thereof to one Charles Dumar, who, under the contract, was the party placed by the company "in charge of their interest." The defendant was given no key, and was excluded from the store except during the hours of business, when he, in conjunction with Dumar, sold goods at retail during the entire period the business was so operated. Defendant objected to being denied a key to the store, so that he might go and come at other times than during the time the same was open for business. Dumar employed to assist, at a small salary, a young woman of the community, to whom it appears the defendant objected. It is also claimed on the part of the defendant that Dumar and the young woman sold goods at sacrifice prices, far below their actual value, and that this was done over the protest and objection and to the great loss of the defendant. It is further contended that the store was not opened by Dumar as early in the morning, and was not continued open as late in the evening, as defendant desired, and as he claimed was customary for stores so situated, and as he insists the demands of such business properly conducted required. Furthermore, it is the claim of the defendant that the young lady who was introduced into the store by Dumar was not of good reputation, and that the relations existing between her and Dumar were improper, and that these things became so notorious that the reputation of the store was injured thereby. On December 16, 1901, after the store and business had been conducted as above set out for the period of one month, the defendant, acting under that portion of the agreement in which the plaintiff agreed to sell him "staple groceries which will be necessary in running the business, selling the goods at retail in the usual line of business for cash, at the lowest market price," wrote a letter to plaintiff containing an order for groceries, which was as follows: "Please ship by freight at once, the following goods, which we are in need of at the store." That, on receipt of this letter, W. A. Story, acting for the plaintiff, came from Wichita, Kansas, to Hennessey, Oklahoma, for the purpose of investigating the running of the business and to look after its security. He found that up to this time, the store having been in operation about thirty days, there had been received for goods sold the sum of $602.40, of which $127.72 had been paid for salaries of the employees and other expenses, leaving a balance of $474.75, which was credited on defendant's note. It appearing from the evidence that the sales had been constantly diminishing, until, as Story states, the business was eating itself up, he thereupon locked the door, and further selling ceased, the entire possession being then taken by plaintiff. Things remained in this condition until the 30th day of December, 1901, a period of about ten days, when defendant, acting under authority of § 3572, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. Okla. 1903, secured an injunction restraining plaintiff from proceeding to sell the stock under the chattel mortgage without a proceeding of foreclosure, and defendant recovered possession of the stock of goods. He retained possession until the 30th day of January, 1902, or a 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) period of one month, during which time he sold from the stock $106 worth of goods. The stock was then taken by plaintiff in an action of replevin begun by it January 24, 1902. On June 25, 1902, it also brought foreclosure proceedings on its note and mortgage, and on August 7, 1902, on its application, a receiver was appointed to take possession of the goods, and dispose of them under the order of the court. It is defendant's contention that the stock was misused by plaintiff on securing possession, under the action of replevin, by being improperly, carelessly, and negligently packed and stored, and that by reason thereof it greatly deteriorated in value. The receiver, under the order of the court, finally sold the same on the 20th day of December, 1902, receiving therefor the sum of $325.

The action of replevin and the suit for foreclosure were consolidated, and referred to D. K. Cunningham, Esq., with authority, as above set out, to settle the issues, hear the evidence, and report to the court with his findings of fact and conclusions of law. Defendant to this consolidated suit filed answer and cross petition, in which he admitted the incorporation of the plaintiff and the execution of the written instruments above mentioned, but denied any indebtedness to plaintiff, or that it was entitled to the personal property described in its petition, and avers that he had fully paid plaintiff all that was due on the note and chattel mortgage, prior to the commencement of either action. For a cross petition, he admitted generally the facts above stated in reference to the original indebtedness due from himself to the plaintiff, and the assumption by the plaintiff of the debt due the bank, and the execution and the delivery of the note, chattel mortgage, and contract, but averred that plaintiff induced their execution through false representations and promises, except for which they would not have been executed, and that on their execution plaintiff wrongfully, unlawfully, and by force, took possession of all of said personal property, placed a padlock on the front door of the store, and locked defendant out, and kept him out, of the said store every evening, and did not open the store in the morning for business until about 9 o'clock A. M.; averred that the value of the stock was about $5,000, and that while the store was opened for business the said Dumar and the young woman employed sold merchandise at ruinously low prices, and, in addition thereto, injured by careless handling the goods which they did not sell. He entered into much detail in setting out the different items of goods sold by plaintiff for less than their value, all of which constituted a pleading showing on the part of plaintiff a breach of the contract. He further averred improper care of the goods in the packing and storage after they were taken from him in the latter part of January, 1902, and sets up specifically the damage done to the counters, shelvings, and store furniture, and then prays for the total value of the goods and furniture, which he alleged plaintiff converted on the 16th day of November, 1901. For further damages he pleaded that, by the wrongful acts complained of, he was damaged in the sum of $5,000 on account of the destruction of his business, and $2,000 on account of the loss of credit and reputation. The reply was a general denial. On these issues and the evidence introduced, the referee found that the plaintiff was liable to the defendant in damages for conversion of all the goods, wares, merchandise, furniture, and fixtures, at their value on the 16th day of November, 1901; that the value of the same was $5,000; that on this plaintiff was entitled to a credit of $836.95, with interest thereon from the 12th day of November, 1901, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, which was the amount of the note and the rate of interest provided for and set out in plaintiff's petition; that, in addition thereto, plaintiff was entitled to a credit of $106.95, being the amount of goods defendant claims to have sold while in possession of the stock during the month of January, 1902; denied defendant any damage for loss of business and reputation of his store, for the reason that the same was too indefinite, uncertain, and speculative, and gave judgment against plaintiff in the sum of $4,945.50.

From the foregoing it will be observed that the referee based his entire conclusion upon finding that there was a conversion of the stock by plaintiff at the time it and the defendant entered into the possession of the same under the contract on the 16th day of November, 1901. This raises the question, in the forefront of our consideration of the case, as to whether, under the controlling and undisputed facts, there was a conversion at that time, or whether the plaintiff after entering the store, in charge of its interests, by and with the consent of the defendant, and its subsequent doings therein, as pleaded by defendant, prior to December 19, 1901, constituted a breach of the contract under which all parties were acting. The materiality of this inquiry is at once apparent. Counsel for defendant in his cross petition, while urging a conversion of the stock of goods at that time, was unquestionably impressed with the force of the reasoning that plaintiff was guilty of a breach of contract rather than conversion, as is shown by the minuteness of his cross petition, in which he detailed the different articles of merchandise sold by the plaintiff at a price less than their true value. If there was a conversion, it was of no consequence to the defendant what plaintiff did with the goods after taking them into possession. So far as defendant was concerned, he had elected, if the goods were converted, to accept a judgment for the value of the goods rather than the goods themselves, and, when this election had taken place, it was of no concern of the defendant what plaintiff did with them, as any loss incurred would fall on plaintiff, and not on defendant. While, on the other hand, if there was a breach of contract instead of a conversion, the pleading by the defendant was entirely proper for the damages incurred by the sacrifice of the goods, but the damages would not be the value of the entire stock, but the difference only between the market value of the goods sold and the sum plaintiff received therefor. If plaintiff violated the terms of the contract by the employment of the young woman to whom reference is made, and wrongfully paid money belonging to defendant to her for her services, then defendant's damages would be the amount of money which was so paid her. The measure of damages for conversion is laid down in § 2752, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. (Okla.) 1903, as follows: "The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: First, the value of the property at the time of the conversion with the interest from that time; or, second, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party; and, third, a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property." While the measure of damages for a breach of contract as laid down under § 2730, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. supra, is as follows: "For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this chapter, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

While the Code has abolished the numerous common-law forms of actions, and all civil rights are now justifiable in a single proceeding known as a "civil action," it has not nor could it abolish the rights, duties, and liabilities enjoyed, incurred, and borne by men in their intercourse and dealings with each other. Elucidating this idea, Judge Irwin in the case of Phelps, D. & P.

Co. v. Halsell, 11 Okla. 1, 65 Pac. 340, said: "To arrive at a correct solution of the question before the court, it will be necessary to consider the law of conversion, and especially to determine the nature of the action of conversion. It may be contended that under our Code the procedure or forms of action have been abolished. While we have but one form of action in this territory, this does not mean that every action which is brought is controlled by the same rules of law. All actions which are not criminal we call civil, but this does not mean that there is only one kind of civil action. We have the same kind of actions, practically, as existed at common law. We have actions in attachment, replevin, injunction, mandamus, ejectment, etc. Each of these actions has its own rules of law, and, except when modified by statute, is subject to common-law principles. It would be impossible to conduct the business of courts without keeping in mind the essential distinctions existing between the various kinds of actions. By its very nature the practice of law must have some consistency, and when an action is brought in court there must be some way of determining what the character of the action is, and these distinctions are by no means artificial. They are perfectly material, and are necessary to the protection of the rights of litigants, as well as for the information and guidance of the court."

The parties to this action, as members of organized society, owed each other the duty to respect the ownership and right to possession of each to his own property; should either deprive the other thereof without right, the taker then owes the duty of paying therefor, the measure of this payment being set out in the paragraph of the statute first above quoted. Should the parties, however, enlarge their relationship toward each other by entering into a lawful contract involving the property of one, both are entitled to have its provisions fulfilled; should either, acting under this agreement, fail, neglect, or refuse, without lawful right, to carry out his engagement according to the terms, his liability is measured by the second paragraph quoted; and in a case where it is insisted that either of these rights has been violated, modern procedure requires that the written allegations of the parties to the action state the facts, that the proof support and be consistent therewith, and the judgment rendered be in consonance with both. These requirements are not to vindicate a mere dogmatic form prescribed to secure symmetry only, but are absolutely essential to secure the administration of justice. A party is entitled to know, on entering an action, just wherein and how he is charged with having violated an obligation. This constitutes notice to him so he may be prepared in his own right and to assist the court with relevant testimony to ascertain the truth. He is then entitled to have the judgment rendered based on the evidence offered in support of the specific averments of the pleadings as they may be finally settled by the court. So, in the case at bar, the necessity of clearly distinguishing the nature of the responsibility on the facts becomes at once apparent, the pleadings and evidence under one being confined to asserting and establishing the detriment caused by the loss of the value of the whole property involved, with the additional elements mentioned in the statute, while under the second the measure of damages is such as are shown to grow out of the failure of the delinquent party to comply with his engagement. The cross petition of defendant herein contains averments showing a breach of contract, and much testimony is offered to support them. The prayer was for a conversion, and the judgment rendered was in conformity with the prayer rather than the allegations and the evidence.

Now let us see what constitutes conversion, and if, under the facts found in this case, there was a conversion of defendant's property on the 16th day of November, 1901; or whether the acts of plaintiff constituted a breach of the contract under which both acted.

In 21 Encyclopedia of Pleading & Practice, p. 1014, the general rule as to what is required to constitute conversion is laid down as follows: "Any distinct act of dominion wrongfully exerted over another's personal property, in denial of his right or inconsistent with it, amounts to and may be treated as a conversion, for which trover is a remedy."

The supreme court of the state of Minnesota in the case of Latusek v. Davies, 79 Minn. 279, 82 N. W. 587, states the facts necessary to maintain an action of conversion to be as follows: First, a proof of a general or special property in plaintiff; second, the right of possession at the time of the conversion; and, third, that the defendant had converted the same to his own use. The right to recover is then established.

The case of Moore v. McKibbin, from the supreme court of New York, 33 Barb. 246, was one wherein an agent was intrusted with certain horses to sell for a sum not less than $500, and who sold them for $200. He was sued in conversion, and the court held in the syllabus: "Where an agent intrusted to sell property for not less than a specified sum sells the same for less than the price fixed, an action for the conversion of the property will not lie against him.

Where the complaint is for a wrongful conversion of property, and the proof establishes another and different cause of action, viz., a mere breach of duty on the part of the defendant, it is not a case of variance, which may be remedied by amendment, but is a failure of proof of the cause of action alleged, and the plaintiff should be nonsuited." In the discussion of the case, the court said: "The case of Sarjeant v. Blunt, 16 Johns. 74, is directly upon the point that an action for the conversion of the property will not lie against an agent for selling under the price fixed. The same rule is laid down in Cairnes v. Bleeker, 12 Johns. 300, though the point was not there decided. See also McMorris v. Simpson, 21 Wend. 610. This must be so upon principle, or else the purchaser would get no title. No one, I apprehend, would pretend that the purchaser did not get a good title because the agent, having power to sell, sold for a price something less than he was instructed to sell at. If the purchaser gets a good title, it must be upon the ground that the agent had the right to sell. If he could sell and transfer a valid title, the sale could not be tortious. The wrong in such a case consists not in the act of selling, which is authorized, but in the breach of duty in selling at the reduced and unauthorized price. It is not the want of authority, but the exercise of it contrary to the measure prescribed, which constitutes the wrong."

The case of Sarjeant v. Blunt, favorably cited in the quotation from Moore v. McKibbin, supra, was one wherein the plaintiff deposited a chronometer with the defendant, to be sold by him for a price not less than $500. The defendant sold the same for $300. The court in this case held in the syllabus as follows: "When goods are deposited with a person, to be sold at not less than a certain fixed price, and the depository sells the property at less than that sum, the owner cannot maintain trover against him, but the proper remedy is a special action on the case."

Another case from the supreme court of Minnesota, that of Chase v. Blaisdell, 4 Minn. 90, Gil. 60, was one where Blaisdell sued the appellants, setting out in the complaint a contract by which they were to pick up and sell certain logs, and make returns to him, averring the sale of the logs by them pursuant to the agreement, but that they failed to make returns and account to him according to the contract. The verdict being rendered for plaintiff, appeal was taken to the supreme court, which held in the syllabus that "where a party comes into possession of and disposes of property pursuant to an agreement with the owner, he cannot be held for a conversion of the property. . . . His liability, if any, grows out of the disposition of the proceeds of the property, and in such case the value of the property disposed of is not the measure of damages." In the discussion of the case, the court said: "Had the defendants become possessed of the plaintiff's logs without authority from him, and converted them to their own use, or, being lawfully possessed, had they afterwards made any disposition of them contrary to authority, they would have been liable in damages for the conversion, and the measure of such damage would have been the value of the logs. But when, as in this case, a party comes into possession of property under an agreement with the owner, and afterwards sells it, in pursuance of the terms of the agreement, for the sole use and benefit of the owner, he cannot by any possibility be guilty of converting the property originally intrusted to him, and his only responsibility results from the disposition he may make of the proceeds of such sale. If the proceeds be in money, and he refuse to pay it over upon reasonable demand, or contrary to the terms of the agreement with the owner, he would be liable therefor as for so much money had and received; or, if the proceeds consist of property other than money, he, upon a like refusal, would be held to have converted it (the proceeds) to his own use, and would be liable in damages, the measure of which would be the value, not of the property originally committed to his charge, for that, having been sold in pursuance of authority, has never been converted, but the value of the property received in exchange therefor. . . . The defendants could not be held for more than they received on the sale of the logs, unless they wilfully or negligently sold them below their value, in which case there should have been an allegation to that effect, and a special claim for the damages sustained by reason thereof."

To constitute conversion for which trover will lie, nonconsent to the possession and disposition of the property by the defendant is indispensable. Van Dusen v. Arnold, 5 S. D. 588, 59 N. W. 961.

And it is essential to the right of recovery that plaintiff have a right to immediate possession of the goods at the time of the alleged conversion. Robison v. Hardy, 22 Ill. App. 512.

Other cases to the same effect are as follows: McMorris v. Simpson, 21 Wend. 610; Worth v. Buck, 34 Neb. 703, 52 N. W. 566.

Thus, we conclude that under the facts as shown in this case, plaintiff having gone into possession under and by virtue of the contract, which provided that it might place an agent in charge of its interest, he had the right to sell the goods, and, the defendant having consented to the same, there could be no conversion of the stock. We suppose that defendant would hardly contend that the people to whom plaintiff sold goods from the store secured no title thereto, and yet, if they did, there would be no conversion. If there was a conversion on the part of the plaintiff, it had no title, and defendant might have maintained an action of conversion or replevin against all of the customers purchasing goods, equally as well as an action against plaintiff itself. Does anyone think this could have been done? Nor are we able to find any sufficient evidence on which to predicate the finding that the contract was procured by fraud. The action of both parties under it, the acquiescence in its operation for thirty days, all, stronger than any spoken words, fixed the validity of the instrument under the terms of which they acted. The action of the defendant in entering jointly with the agent of plaintiff into the possession of the stock, and remaining there, assisting in the sale of the goods under the contract for thirty days and then ordering more goods, is absolutely inconsistent with any theory of fraud or conversion. So that we hold that there was no conversion in plaintiff taking possession of the stock jointly with the defendant under the contract above referred to, and that whatever wrongful acts may have been committed by it while thus in possession were breaches of contract, and damages would lie against it for any specific injuries sustained by the defendant from these breaches, and that the pleadings and the evidence on this phase of the case should be restricted to these things.

On the closing and taking possession of the store by the plaintiff on the 19th day of December, 1901, entirely excluding defendant therefrom, if against his will, as he contends, a new and a different situation arose, the effects of which depend upon the following conditions: If the debt secured by the mortgage had been extinguished, or, if not, if the condition under which plaintiff might lawfully take possession of the stock under its chattel mortgage had not arisen, then its taking exclusive possession of the goods against the will of the defendant, and over his protest, was wrongful, and would amount to a conversion, for which he could maintain an action, even though the goods were recovered by him, as shown by the evidence, at the expiration of ten days. See 28 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 2d ed. p. 683, where the general rule in such cases is stated as follows: "It seems to be well settled that trover for a conversion may be maintained, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) in case of an unlawful taking or exercise of dominion over the chattels of the plaintiff, though the property may have been returned to the plaintiff and accepted by him prior to the institution of the action, or though he may have reacquired possession by purchase from a third person or by means of an action of replevin." Plaintiff's measure of damages in such a case is stated in the same volume, at page 684, to be as follows: "Where the property has been returned to and accepted by the plaintiff, this fact is to be considered in mitigation of the damages recoverable for the conversion, and in some instances it has been held that the court had power to permit the defendant to return the chattel in mitigation of damages."

Defendant reacquired possession of the stock of goods on the 30th day of December, 1901, and held the same until the 29th of January, 1902, when it was again taken from him under plaintiff's action in replevin. The goods were then, as stated above, taken into possession by the plaintiff and held by it until turned over to a receiver, appointed by the court in August following. On this occurring, we are again confronted by the same proposition that arose at the time of the taking of the goods in December. If plaintiff's debt had not been liquidated, and the situation was such as to legally entitle it to possess itself of the stock under its chattel mortgage, then there was no conversion, but its possession was lawful. If, on the other hand, the debt had been extinguished, or the condition mentioned had not arisen, then its possession was tortious, for which it was liable in damages to the defendant. The goods, it will be remembered, were, on the 7th day of August, 1902, placed in the hands of a receiver; and the correct measure of plaintiff's damages under such a case is laid down in the case of Tootle v. Kent, 12 Okla. 674, 73 Pac. 310, as follows: "The measure of plaintiff's damages for loss of goods or depreciation in value is the difference between the market value of the goods at the time they were taken possession of under the chattel mortgage by the defendants, and its value at the time the property was placed in the hands of the receiver." Of course, being placed in the hands of a receiver, plaintiff would not then be liable for any depreciation or loss in the value of the goods by reason of any improper care or wrongful act on the part of the officer, as he would then be the one responsible therefor.

The conclusion to which we have come in this case necessarily presents to the defendant the question of whether or not his claim for damages growing out of the alleged breach of contract and his claim of damages growing out of the alleged conversion may be joined in the same cross petition. Believing that this question is properly within the scope of the case as presented to us, we have considered it, and hold the general rule to be as is stated in 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 415, wherein it is laid down that "under the Codes, as at common law, a cause of action in tort cannot, as a general rule, be joined with a cause of action on contract [here follows a number of exceptions]. . . . Another general exception results from the provision in many of the Codes, that causes of action arising out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action may be joined, and the same exception has been drawn from the general intent of the Codes, in the absence of such an express provision as just stated." Under this there are cited a variety of cases from a great number of the so-called "Code states." Justice Valentine of the supreme court of the state of Kansas, from which our Code is taken, in the case of Hoye v. Raymond, 25 Kan. 665 (2d ed. 465), in dealing with the question, said: "Causes of action in tort can only be united with causes of action on contract where they all arise out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action. Civil Code, § 83. But even then they cannot be united unless they all 'affect all the parties to the action.'" This is cited approvingly by the same court in the case of Haskell County Bank v. Bank of Santa Fé, 51 Kan. 39, 32 Pac. 624. In an earlier case in the discussion of this section of the Code, Justice Valentine, in the case of Scarborough v. Smith, 18 Kan. 399, enters into an elaborate discussion of the scope and meaning of this section of the Code. But these different causes of action, the one for breach of contract, and the one sounding in tort, should be stated in separate counts of the petition. Shinn v. Guyton & H. Mule Co. 109 Mo. App. 557, 83 S. W. 1015. The causes of action in this case all arose out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of the action,—which was defendant's claim of right in and to the goods involved,—and hence may be joined in separate counts in one petition.

It therefore follows that the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial, with instructions to grant defendant the right to amend his pleadings and proceed in accordance with the principles declared herein.

OKLAHOMA CRIMINAL COURT OF APPEALS.

CHARLEY FLETCHER, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF OKLAHOMA.

(— Okla. Crim. App. —, 101 Pac. 599.)

Indictment — statutory offense — requisites.

1. In an indictment or information for committing a statutory offense, the indictment or information may describe the offense in the general language of the statute; but the description must be accompanied by a statement of the particulars essential to constitute the crime or offense with which the defendant is charged, and acquaint the accused with what he must meet upon the trial.

Intoxicating liquors — indictment — requisites.

2. An indictment or information for a single sale of intoxicating liquors must allege the name of the person or persons to whom such sale was made. If the names of such persons are unknown, then this fact must be stated. This, however, would not be necessary where the prosecution was for maintaining a nuisance, or for having possession of liquor to be illegally disposed of.

Criminal law — instruction — credibility of accused.

3. It is error for a trial judge to single out the defendant, personally, and instruct the jury upon the credibility of his evidence.

Same — credibility of witnesses.

4. Care should be taken, in instructing juries upon the credibility of witnesses, to make such instructions apply alike to all of the witnesses, whether they are for the prosecution or for the defense.

(April 24, 1909.)

Headnotes by FURMAN, P. J.

Case Note. — Must indictment or information for unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors state name of person to whom sale is made.

The sufficiency of an indictment, information, or complaint for an illegal sale, which does not name anyone as a buyer, is the sole question to be covered by this note. The questions of the effect of alleging a sale to a principal when, in fact, made to his agent, or vice versa, or other misnomers and variances, are omitted.

Sale to prohibited class.

It is uniformly held that the name of the buyer must be alleged, where it is made an offense to sell to a particular class of persons, e. g., men of known intemperate habits (Com. v. Powers, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 304); minors (Com. v. Liebtreu, 1 Pearson [Pa.] 07; Com. v. Pfaff, 17 Pa. Co. Ct. 302; Tro-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Muskogee County Court convicting him of an illegal sale of intoxicating liquors. Reversed.

Statement by Furman, P. J.:

On the 19th of June, 1908, an information was filed against Charley Fletcher (hereinafter called the defendant), charging him with unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor. The defendant demurred to the information upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. This demurrer was by the court overruled, and the defendant reserved an exception. Upon the trial of the cause, the defendant was found guilty, and his punishment was assessed by the jury at a fine of meter v. District of Columbia, 24 App. D. C. 242; State v. Martin, 44 Mo. App. 45; slaves (Francois v. State, 20 Ala. 84; Com. v. Cook, 13 B. Mon. 149; State v. Blythe, 18 N. C. [1 Dev. & B. L.] 199; State v. Schroder, 3 Hill, L. 63).

Sale within prohibited distance.

And all the cases agree that an indictment for selling liquor, contrary to law, within a given distance from a particular building or place, need not name the buyer. State v. Bailey, 43 Ark. 150; State v. Muse, 20 N. C. 463; (4 Dev. & B. L. 319); State v. Heldt, 41 Tex. 220; State v. Staley, 3 Lea, 505; Langan v. People, 32 Colo. 414, 76 Pac. 1048.

Charge against one as common dealer, etc.

Likewise, it is agreed that the buyer's name need not be alleged where defendant is charged with being a common seller or dealer in intoxicating liquors (Com. v. Pray, 13 Pick. 359; Jordan v. State, 22 Fla. 528); or pursuing the occupation of a retail liquor dealer without having paid the occupation tax (Mansfield v. State, 17 Tex. App. 468); or keeping intoxicating liquor for sale (State v. Becker, 20 Iowa, 438; Hornberger v. State, 47 Neb. 40, 66 N. W. 23); or keeping a place for the sale of liquor (Donovan v. State, 170 Ind. 123, 83 N. E. 744; Dalrymple v. State, 26 Ohio C. C. 562).

Sale contrary to prohibitory statute or ordinance.

The decisions are in hopeless and irreconcilable conflict as to this class of sales.

Thus, where the sale was in violation of a prohibitory statute or ordinance, it has been held necessary to allege the name of a person to whom the liquor was sold. Dorman v. State, 34 Ala. 216; State v. Allen, 32 Iowa, 491; State v. Tisdale, 145 N. C. 422, 58 S. E. 998, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 125; State v. Burchard, 4 S. D. 548, 57 N. W. 491.

But a greater number of such cases have held that this allegation was not necessary. Nelson v. United States, 30 Fed. 112; McCuen v. State, 19 Ark. 630; Hill v. Dalton, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.)

$50 and thirty days' confinement in jail. Motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment were filed and overruled, and the defendant excepted. The case is regularly before us upon appeal.

Messrs. S. M. Rutherford and Bailey & Kistler for appellant.

Mr. Fred S. Caldwell, for appellee:

In charging illegal selling in any form, it is unnecessary to state the name of the person to whom the sale was made.

Sales in local option districts.

Where the sale was unlawful because made in territory in which a local option law was in force, it has been held that the buyer's name must be alleged. State v. Ridgway, 73 Ohio St. 31, 76 N. E. 95, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 94; Stewart v. State, 25 Ohio C. C. 438; Dixon v. State, 21 Tex. App. 517, 1 S. W. 448; Martin v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 27, 19 S. W. 434; Ellington v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 86 S. W. 330; Drechsel v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 580, 34 S. W. 934.

But, on the other hand, in Williams v. State, 89 Ga. 493, 15 S. E. 552; State v. Wingfield, 115 Mo. 428, 87 Am. St. Rep. 406, 22 S. W. 363; State v. Houts, 36 Mo. App. 265, it was held that this allegation was unnecessary.

Sales without license or bond.

There is the same conflict as to indictments for sales without a license. Thus, the following cases hold that the name of the buyer must be alleged: State v. Stucky, 2 Blackf. 289; State v. Burgess, 4 Ind. 606; Wilson v. Com. 14 Bush, 159; Com. v. Dean, 21 Pick. 334; State v. Schmail, 25 Minn. 368; Neales v. State, 10 Mo. 498 (overruled in later cases); State v. Pischel, 16 Neb. 608, 21 N. W. 408; State, Flanagan, Prosecutor, v. Plainfield, 44 N. J. L. 118; Roberson v. Lambertville, 38 N. J. L. 69; State v. Delancey (N. J. L.) 69 Atl. 958; Weston v. Territory (Okla. Crim. App.) 98 Pac. 360; Lightle v. State (Okla. Crim. App.) 101 Pac. 608; Banks v. State (Okla. Crim. App.) 101 Pac. 610; Mitchell v. State (Okla. Crim. App.) 101 Pac. 1100; Simmons v. State (Okla. Crim. App.) 101 Pac.

But the following cases hold that indictments for sales without a license need not name the buyer: United States v. Gordon, 1 Cranch, C. C. 58, Fed. Cas. No. 15,233; Johnson v. State, 40 Ark. 453; People v. Sweetser, 1 Dak. 308, 46 N. W. 452; Dansey v. State, 23 Fla. 316, 2 So. 692; Brass v. State, 45 Fla. 1, 34 So. 307; Carter v. State, 68 Ga. 826; Wells v. Sales on prohibited days.

It has been held that an indictment for selling liquor on Sunday, contrary to law, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

15,233; State v. Hickerson, 3 Heisk. 375; Lea v. State, 64 Miss. 201, 1 So. 51; Jordan v. State, 22 Fla. 528; State v. Brown, 41 La. Ann. 771, 6 So. 638; Mansfield v. State, 17 Tex. must name the person or persons to whom the liquors were sold (Capritz v. State, 1 Md. 569; Martin v. State, 30 Neb. 421, 46 N. W. 618; R. v. Cavanagh, 27 U. C. C. P. 537); but the greater number of cases have held that, since the gravamen of the charge is a desecration of the Sabbath, it is not necessary to name the person to whom the liquor was sold (State v. Parnell, 16 Ark. 506, 63 Am. Dec. 72; Trometer v. District of Columbia, 24 App. D. C. 242; State v. Merget, 129 Mo. App. 46, 107 S. W. 1015; Com. v. Liebtreu, 1 Pearson [Pa.] 107; State v. Hickerson, 3 Heisk. 375).

An indictment for selling intoxicating liquors on election day, in violation of the law, must name the buyer. State v. Stamey, 71 N. C. 202; contra, Newman v. State, 101 Ga. 534, 28 S. E. 1005.

Sales in prohibited quantities.

An indictment for selling liquor in a smaller quantity than authorized by law, without stating to whom the sale was made, is bad. State v. Walker, 3 Harr. (Del.) 547; State v. Faucett, 20 N. C. 239 (4 Dev. & B. L.) 107; Com. v. Bengel, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 591; contra, State v. Ford, 47 Mo. App. 601.

Sales by druggists, on prescription.

Where druggists are authorized to sell liquors, provided the purchaser first procure a prescription therefor from a registered physician, the indictment must name the buyer, else the defendant, for his defense, would be compelled to take with him to the trial all prescriptions filed, the prosecutions for which would not be barred by the statute of limitations. State v. Martin, 44 Mo. App. 45, affirmed in 108 Mo. 117, 18 S. W. 1005; State v. Harris, 47 Mo. App. 558; State v. Cassity, 49 Mo. App. 300; State v. Quinn, 49 Mo. App. 602; State v. Major, 81 Mo. App. 289.

But under like statutes it has been held that the buyer's name need not be alleged. Riley v. State, 43 Miss. 397; State v. Elam, 21 Mo. App. 290; State v. Ferrell, 30 W. Va. 683, 5 S. E. 155.

In State v. Gibson, 61 Mo. App. 368, it was ticular person is injured. I conceive, however, that this distinction is immaterial or unimportant, and that it is really a question touching the essential right of the defendant in the prosecution,—his right to be informed by the indictment of the particular sale alleged to be unlawful. . . . This indictment is for but one offense; but one penalty can be imposed under it. Why should the omission of the name of the purchaser make it an exception to the general rule that, under an indictment of one count, but one offense can be proven, and the rule that, where several offenses have been offered in evidence, the prosecution must elect the particular one on which it will rely? It is argued that it would be illogical to require the indictment to contain several similar counts, only to prove more than one offense. The answer is based on old rules of evidence, that where there is but one count, but one offense can be proven; where there are several counts, several offenses may be proven. These rules are fundamental and established; they are unchanged. See Lebkovitz v. State, 113 Ind. 27, 14 N. E. 363, 597."

We indorse the reasoning of this case, but we do not indorse the action of the court in considering itself bound by precedents which its judgment condemned. We decline to follow any precedents which are not founded upon justice and supported by reason. It is the earnest desire and sole purpose of this court to give to Oklahoma a system of criminal jurisprudence unhampered by ill-considered precedents and free from arbitrary, senseless technicalities. We will be guided alone by the justice of those decisions which we adopt and follow. Reason alone will govern our conduct, it matters not how many decisions may be cited to the contrary. In this way only can we faithfully discharge the laborious and important duties of the position which we occupy, and protect the rights of all classes of our people. We cannot, without doing great violence to our consciences, make any distinctions as to persons and classes. We cannot have one rule for one class of cases and another rule for other classes of cases. The same rules must be applicable to all; the same justice and consideration is the right of all. The more prejudice that may exist against a person charged with crime, the greater the necessity for the strict enforcement by the courts of those rules which experience and reason show to be necessary to the protection of the liberties and rights of the people. It is the sworn duty of this court to see that the law is enforced in Oklahoma without distinction as to persons or classes, and we are going to discharge this duty to the best of our ability, let it please or shake whomsoever it may. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Counsel for the state cite: State v. Miller, 24 Mo. 532; State v. Spain, 29 Mo. 415; State v. Fanning, 38 Mo. 359; State v. Rogers, 39 Mo. 432; State v. Jaques, 68 Mo. 200. These cases are all based upon the case of State v. Ladd, 15 Mo. 430. An examination of Ladd's Case will disclose that the question which we are now considering was not raised by the counsel in that case. The exact language of the supreme court, on page 431, is as follows: "I will first consider the indictment. It charges that the defendant sold intoxicating liquors in a quantity less than a quart, to wit, one pint of whisky, one pint of gin, etc., to divers persons to the jurors unknown, without any license, etc. The only objection made to it rests on the omission to state the price for which the liquor was sold." If this was the only objection made to the indictment, then this was the only question rightfully before the court, and anything stated by the judge who wrote the opinion with reference to matters not presented is purely obiter dictum, and is not, in any sense of the word, binding as an authority. The decision of the court that it is not necessary to state the price paid for such liquors is correct. The price of liquor sold or given away in no manner affects the crime committed, either as to identity, degree, or punishment, and therefore need not be alleged; but there can be no sale or gift of liquor without a purchaser or receiver. Therefore the existence of such purchaser or receiver is a constituent element of the offense, and the name of such person must be given to describe the offense with which the party is charged. Again, the indictment in this case was good because it stated that the names of the persons to whom the sale was made were unknown. This is always permissible, and would be good in any kind of indictment. The subsequent Missouri cases cited by counsel for the state are all based upon an obiter dictum of the judge who wrote the opinion in the Ladd Case. As they all rest upon the same foundation, when it is shown that this foundation is unsound, we cannot consider these cases as authorities in point.

Counsel cite Cannady v. People, 17 Ill. 158, and Rice v. People, 38 Ill. 435. In Cannady v. People is cited Com. v. Odlin, 23 Pick. 277. The court says: "In the Massachusetts statutes there are two offenses defined, and different penalties imposed. One against common sellers, or retailers, and the other against persons guilty of a single act, without a license. Where the indictment charged the latter offense, the court held it necessary to charge the time, place, and to a person named, or that the name was unknown. Com. v. Thurlow, 24 Pick. 379. But in an indictment against a common seller, etc., it was unnecessary to name the person."

We are at a loss to know why this citation was made. It is directly in conflict with the decision which it claims to be founded upon. We agree fully with what the Massachusetts court says on this subject. It is worthy of note that Cannady's Case was decided by a divided court. This further weakens its force as an authority. Also in Cannady's Case, the indictment alleged that the sale was made to persons whose names were unknown. This destroys the force of the decision, because the judge who rendered it went outside of the question submitted to him for decision. In the Rice Case the decision is based alone upon the Cannady Case. We cannot recognize such ill-considered cases as these. Counsel cite State v. Heldt, 41 Tex. 220. This does not support the contention of counsel because the indictment expressly charges that the liquors were sold to persons to the grand jury unknown. Equally unfortunate for the contention of counsel is the citation of Mansfield v. State, 17 Tex. App. 468. On page 470, the court said: "The other cases cited by appellant's counsel in his brief, viz., Burch v. Republic, 1 Tex. 608, and Alexander v. State, 29 Tex. 495, were cases arising under statutes regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, and cannot, we think, be held applicable to the article of the Penal Code under which this indictment was framed, which article creates and describes a very different offense; that is, pursuing any occupation, etc., taxed by law, without first obtaining a license therefor. It is not the sale of intoxicating liquors that constitutes the offense denounced by said article, but it is the act of pursuing a taxable occupation without obtaining a license therefor. We think the indictment sufficiently alleges this offense, and that the exceptions to the same were properly overruled." As neither of these cases in any wise touch upon the question now before us, we are at a loss to understand why they are cited. State v. Doyle, 15 R. I. 527, 9 Atl. 900, is also relied upon by counsel for the state. That was not a case for selling liquors, but was a case for maintaining a nuisance. We commend this case as being a correct statement of the law upon the subject of nuisances. It would be well for the county attorneys to follow this case in such prosecutions in this state. We give it our hearty commendation.

State v. Jordan, 39 Iowa, 387, is also cited by counsel. The charge in this case is also for maintaining a nuisance. We approve the decision in this case also, except that the indictment would not be good in Oklahoma, because it does not conclude as our Constitution directs. The indictment is as follows: "The grand jury of the county of Wapello, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) in the name and by the authority of the state of Iowa, accuse Kinsey Jordan of the crime of nuisance, committed as follows: The said defendant, in the state of Iowa, on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1873, in the county aforesaid, did then and there keep a certain house in which he then and there kept for sale and sold intoxicating liquors." In this case the offense was for keeping intoxicating liquors for sale. It was immaterial as to whether any sales were made. Therefore the words "and sold" were surplusage, and need not be proven.

United States v. Warwick (D. C.) 51 Fed. 280, is cited. This is only the individual opinion of the congressional district judge of Alaska, and is altogether unsupported by any line of reasoning. No lawyer will contend that it should be treated as an authority.

Jordan v. State, 22 Fla. 529, and Dansey v. State, 23 Fla. 317, 2 So. 692, are cited by counsel for the state. In both these cases the defendants were indicted for pursuing the occupation of selling intoxicating liquors without a license. It is one offense to pursue an occupation, and it is another offense to do a single act. As to the first offense, some courts do contend that it is not necessary to allege the names of the persons to whom sales are made. This position can be defended with some show of reason. The offense is complete when a person professes and holds himself out to the public as being engaged in such an occupation. If a person has in his possession such liquors and offers them for sale, it is not necessary for a single sale to be made or proven; but these reasons do not apply to cases charging a single sale.

State v. Becker, 20 Iowa, 439, is also cited by counsel. The indictment charges that the defendant, in a certain building, kept intoxicating liquors for sale and did sell them. The offense charged was for keeping such liquors for sale, and it was therefore not necessary to allege to whom they were sold, neither was it necessary to allege or prove any sale. The words "and did sell" were surplusage. Such evidence would be admissible to prove the main fact, viz., that the liquors were kept for sale. This intention might also be proven by other evidence. This is the substance of the decision relied upon.

Counsel also cite State v. Kuhn, 24 La. Ann. 474, and State v. Brown, 41 La. Ann. 771, 6 So. 638. These indictments were for retailing spirituous liquors without having first obtained a license. They were for pursuing an unlawful occupation, and not for a single offense. They are therefore not in point.

State v. Bielby, 21 Wis. 206, is cited. This indictment is for trafficking in and giving away spirituous liquors without having first obtained a license therefor. Here the occupation of the defendant is the subject of the indictment, and not any particular sale.

With one exception, so far as we have been able to find, the cases cited by counsel for the state are in the condition of those above discussed. A number of the citations could not be found in the books. When counsel has one grain of wheat, why hide it in a bushel of chaff? This illustrates the danger of making citations from digests. It entails an immense amount of useless work upon appellate courts. It hinders, instead of assists, the courts. It is one thing to understand and discuss the principles of the law; it is another and very different thing to pile up digest citations. We earnestly request the members of the bar in this state to cite in their briefs only such decisions as they have personally examined and found to be applicable to their cases. By so doing they will greatly lighten the burdens of this court, and strengthen themselves in the confidence and respect of the court. It is not evidence of industry, learning, or ability to file lengthy briefs filled with citations from digests, which, upon critical examination, are found to have but little, if any, application to the questions involved in the particular case before the court. We have been forced in many cases to spend a great deal of time in such work. It is unjust to the members of the court; and also to the state. We are already overwhelmed with work, and are over a year behind with cases now on the docket. We should only be expected to consider those decisions which are applicable to the questions before us.

The case cited, which, upon its face, supports the contention of counsel, is State v. Ferrell, 30 W. Va. 683, 5 S. E. 155. The court said: "The indictment, omitting the caption, is in these words: 'The grand jurors of the state of West Virginia, in and for the body of the county of Ritchie, and now attending such court, upon their oaths present that Patrick Ferrell, on the ——— day of June, 1887, in the said county, was a druggist, and as such druggist, at his drug store in the town of Pennsboro, in the county aforesaid, did then and there unlawfully sell alcohol, spirituous liquors, and wines, said sale not having been made for medicinal, mechanical, or scientific purposes, against the peace and dignity of the state.'" This was not an indictment for pursuing an occupation without license, but for a special sale. The court did sustain the indictment, although it failed to allege the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold. In its opinion the court said: "So far from this rule operating with peculiar hardship upon the licensed druggist while engaged in legiti-mate business, the duties imposed upon him by the statute which confers his peculiar privilege on him, if faithfully performed, secure to him perfect immunity against every groundless prosecution. As a druggist, he has no authority whatever to sell alcohol, spirituous liquors, or wines as a medicine, except the sale be made upon the written prescription of a practising physician in good standing in his profession, etc., specifying the name of the person, and the kind and quantity of the liquors to be furnished to him, and not 'more than one sale shall be made upon the same prescription.' And the production of such prescription by him at the trial of an indictment against him for the sale of alcohol, spirituous liquor, or wines shall be sufficient to rebut the presumption arising from the proof of such sale, if the jury believe, from all the evidence in the case, that the sale was made in good faith, under the belief that such prescription and statement were true."

How could a druggist know what prescription to produce in his defense unless the name of the purchaser is stated in the indictment? The defendant may live at a point distant from the place of trial. After the state has proven the sale to a certain person, would the court stop and allow the defendant to send for his prescriptions? Suppose that the defendant brings all of the prescriptions which he has filed within the time in which the indictment would not be barred by the statute of limitations, must the court stop and be delayed while the defendant is looking for the prescription? But the evidence might disclose a sale not on a prescription, but one made for sacramental, scientific, or mechanical purposes. What good would the prescriptions do the defendant? The defendant, not knowing what particular sale he is charged with having made, has been wholly unable to prepare his defense. Will the court stop and wait until the defendant can go out and gather up his witnesses? This line of reasoning does not apply to conditions existing in Oklahoma, because all sales are unlawful here, just as all acts of larceny are unlawful. But who will contend that, in a case of larceny, the name of the person from whom the theft was committed need not be given in the information?

Counsel, in his oral argument before the court, earnestly insisted upon three propositions to sustain his contention that it is not necessary to state in an information or indictment for the single sale of intoxicating liquor the name of the person or persons to whom such sale was made, viz.: (1) That if an information or indictment follows and uses the language of the statute creating the offense, it is sufficient. (2) That the date upon which the sale is alleged to have been made sufficiently informs a defendant of the particular offense with which he is charged.

(3) That a different rule of pleading applies to those offenses which violate the personal rights of other individuals from those offenses which do not violate the personal rights of others. Counsel admitted that in the first class of cases it was necessary to give the name of the individuals whose personal rights were violated, but insisted that, as to cases where no personal wrong was done to others, this rule, upon principle, would not apply. We will now proceed to consider each of these propositions in the order named.

First. It is a general rule of law that if an indictment uses the words of a statute, or words of equal import, to this extent the indictment or information is good. But suppose that an indictment or information for murder, or for an assault, or for larceny, perjury, libel, embezzlement, or for any offense, would simply use the language of the statute,—who is bold enough to assert that this is all that the law requires, and that such an indictment or information would be sufficient to charge any offense? We dislike to differ from the eminent counsel for the state, but we at least have respectable authority behind us: "In an indictment for committing an offense against a statute, the offense may be described in the general language of the act, but the description must be accompanied by a statement of all the particulars essential to constitute the offense or crime, and to acquaint the accused with what he must meet on trial." United States v. Hess, 124 U. S. 483, 31 L. ed. 516, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571.

Second. The position that the date of the alleged offense charged in the information or indictment is sufficient to put the defendant upon notice of the particular offense which he is required to meet is equally untenable. Every lawyer knows that time is not the essence of the offense, and only becomes material in connection with the statute of limitations. The state is not bound by the alleged date of the commission of an offense, except that the offense charged must have been committed prior to the filing of the information or indictment, and that any date prior thereto may be proven within the date of the limitations prescribed by statute for the given offense alleged in the indictment or information. It is a travesty upon reason to say that the alleged date of an offense gives the defendant the least notice of "all the particulars essential to constitute the offense or crime, and acquaints the accused with what he must meet upon trial." It must be remembered that the Supreme Court of the United States is the highest court of the land. This is the language of 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that court, which is the most illustrious judicial tribunal on earth, in the case just quoted from, and we are content to accept its conclusions, it matters not how severely they may be criticized or bitterly denounced by the eminent counsel for the state. The rule thus established is not an arbitrary, senseless technicality; but it is absolutely necessary to the substantial rights of a defendant, and is based upon justice and supported by the soundest reasons.

Third. The contention that different rules of pleading exist as between those offenses which involve an invasion of the personal rights of other persons than the defendant, and those which simply constitute a public offense, is equally unsound. One illustration will demonstrate this to an absolute certainty. If A is indicted for having suborned a witness to commit perjury in his behalf, in a case against A for selling whisky, whose personal rights have been invaded? Who will assert that it is not necessary to allege in an indictment for such an offense the name of the witness so suborned, or the substance of such false evidence, or the allegation that it was material to the issues involved?

Again, the contention made is squarely against two provisions in the Bill of Rights of our Constitution: "Sec. 16. Due Process of Law. Sec. 7. No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." Section 16, Bunn's Constitution of Oklahoma. No one will deny that due process of law includes notice of the specific offense charged, and reasonable time in which to prepare to make a defense. Who will contend that this has been done when the indictment or information does not contain a statement of all the particulars essential to constitute the offense or crime? How can there be a sale or a gift without a purchaser or receiver? Are they not necessary constituent elements of the crime? How can it be said that a defendant has been given reasonable time in which to prepare his defense, when, after the state has introduced its evidence, he learns for the first time the particulars essential to constitute the crime?

But again: "Sec. 29. Criminal Prosecutions; Change of Venue; to be Confronted with Witnesses. Sec. 20. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the county in which the crime shall have been committed: Provided, that the venue may be changed to some other county of the state, on the application of the accused, in such manner as may be prescribed by law. He shall be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and have a copy thereof, and be confronted with the witnesses against him, and have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his behalf. He shall have the right to be heard by himself and counsel; and in capital cases, at least two days before the case is called for trial, he shall be furnished with a list of the witnesses that will be called in chief, to prove the allegations of the indictment or information, together with their postoffice addresses." Section 29, Bunn's Constitution of Oklahoma. If an indictment or information does not state the nature and cause of the accusation against the defendant, it is void. This means substantially the same thing as due process of law. Even if this were an open question, we would be bound by these constitutional provisions. "In criminal cases the accused has the constitutional right 'to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation.' Amendment to U. S. Const. art. 6, §§ 134-168. The indictment must set forth the offense with clearness and all necessary certainty, to apprise the accused of the crime with which he stands charged, and every ingredient of which the crime is composed must be accurately and clearly alleged. It is an elementary principle of criminal pleading that the indictment must furnish the accused with such a description of the charge against him as will enable him to make his defense and avail himself of his conviction or acquittal for protection against a further prosecution for the same cause; and also to inform the court of the facts alleged, so that it may decide whether they are sufficient in law to support a conviction if one should be had. For these facts are to be stated and set forth in the indictment with reasonable particularity of time, place, and circumstances. United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. ed. 588; Cooley, Const. Lim. 374; Wharton, Crim. Pl. & Pr. 153." Slover v. Territory, 5 Okla. 509, 49 Pac. 1009.

Again: Section 5358, Wilson's Oklahoma Statutes, is as follows: Sec. 5358. "The indictment must be direct and certain as it regards: First. The party charged. Second. The offense charged. Third. The particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense." Here is a mandatory provision of our statutes which forces this court to hold all indictments fatally defective which fail to give the particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense. The language of the statute is that, as to these matters, the indictment must be direct and certain. As we have hereinbefore said, there can be no sale without a purchaser, and no gift without a receiver. A sale or a gift necessarily implies the existence of two or more persons; neither can be accomplished except under these conditions. The mere statement of this proposition amounts to its demonstration to a mathematical certainty. Therefore the existence of such purchaser or receiver is a constituent element of the offense, and his or her name must be alleged in the information or indictment, if known, if not known, that fact must be alleged.

This matter has been before passed upon by this court in Weston v. Territory (Okla. Crim. App.) 98 Pac. 360. We there held that an indictment for a single gift was fatally defective because it omitted to allege the name of the parties to whom the intoxicating liquors were given. At the earnest request of the counsel who represents the state in this case, we have gone over this question again and more fully. The result of this investigation has only strengthened our confidence in the views there expressed. We would quote from (not simply cite) well-reasoned cases enough to fill a volume, sustaining the conclusion at which we arrived in the Weston Case; but, as we are entirely satisfied with the reasoning in the Weston Case, and the authorities there quoted from, and as we have an overwhelming amount of work on our hands, we will content ourselves with only a few additional quotations.

Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 1037, says: "Where the wrong consists of specific sales, the most ready and apt way of pointing out and identifying the transaction is to give the names of the persons to whom the sales were made. And, in the absence of any other adequate identification, such names should, in principle, be alleged if known, or the fact of their being unknown should be averred in excuse. Yet there is a good deal of authority, more in the older cases than in the later ones, to the proposition that the names are not essential. On the other hand, it has been even held that a statute dispensing with this allegation is unconstitutional and void; and, in one way or another, the doctrine which requires the name, or the averred excuse for its omission, is widely maintained. Where the charge is being a common seller, no names of persons to whom sales are made need be set out, for, in this offense, not even instances of sale are required to be averred."

In the case of Bush v. Republic, 1 Tex. 459, will be found the following language: "It is a general rule that 'the indictment must state all the circumstances which constitute the definition of the offense in the act, so as to bring the defendant precisely within it.' 'It is in every case desirable to attend with the greatest nicety to the words contained in the act, for no others can be so proper to describe the crime.' 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 281, 288; 2 Archbold, Crim. Pl. & Pl. 47. But if the definition and description embraced in the statute be departed from in any material respect, and any ingredient in the definition of the offense be omitted, the indictment will be bad. Ibid."

In the case of State v. Pischel, 16 Neb. 608, 21 N. W. 468, the court says: "It is thought expedient to decide the question suggested without a further hearing, or imposing the expense of printing additional briefs. The first question presented is whether or not it is necessary, in an indictment for selling the prohibited liquors, to allege the name of the person to whom the liquors were sold. To this question we answer, 'Yes.' The statute makes each act of selling a crime. It is proper that that act be so described as to identify it from other acts of a similar kind, as near as practicable, and this can be best done by giving the name of the vendee, if known, or, if unknown, so alleged. Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 1037, and cases cited in note 2. Also, see State v. Doyle, 11 R. I. 574."

In the case of Martin v. State, 30 Neb. 421, 46 N. W. 618, the same doctrine is laid down, and a great many cases cited to support it. In the case of State v. Stamey, 71 N. C. 202, 203, will be found the following language: "1. It does not set forth the name of any person to whom the liquor was given or sold. The offense charged is highly penal, and in order to defend himself the defendant must know not only the offense charged, but the name of the person upon whom it was committed. A conviction upon this bill could not be pleaded in bar of another indictment for the same offense. An indictment charging the defendant with selling spirits to slaves is not good unless their names are given. State v. Blythe, 18 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. L.) 199. So, to charge a white man with playing cards with a slave, without naming him. State v. Ritchie, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 29. The purpose of setting forth the name of the person on whom the offense has been committed is to identify the particular fact or transaction on which the indictment is founded, so that the accused may have notice of the specific charge, and have the benefit of an acquittal or conviction if accused a second time."

In the case of State v. Allen, 32 Iowa, 493, will be found the following language: "If, then, any one of the material facts going to make up the offense be left out of the information, it fails to charge an offense, and no judgment can be rendered thereon upon a verdict of guilty. That the sale was made to some 'other person' is as material as that the thing sold was intoxicating liquor. A sale of intoxicating liquors to some person is the very gist of the offense. The offense can only be defined by charging the person accused with selling intoxicating liquor to another person. The person to whom the liquor has been sold should be named, if known, and, if not known, that fact should be stated. This is necessary to enable the defendant, if convicted or acquitted, to plead such conviction or acquittal in bar of any subsequent prosecution for the same offense. The information in this case is, in these respects, clearly and fatally defective."

In the case of Alexander v. State, 20 Tex. 495, 497, it is said: "In the case of Burch v. Republic, 1 Tex. 608, which was a case like the present, this court said: 'It is not sufficient to aver generally that the defendant did vend spirituous liquors in a quantity of a quart and over,' without stating at whose house or establishment, or to whom the vending took place, or some other fact tending to identify the transaction. This is the true principle of the certainty that is required. 'The transaction' of which the party is accused must be identified with reasonable certainty. The indictment, in a case like the present, should name the person to whom the liquor was sold; or, if the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold was unknown to the grand jurors, then other circumstances tending to identify the transaction should be alleged, so that the accused may know what he will be called upon to answer, so that, in case of conviction or acquittal, he may be able to plead the judgment in bar of another prosecution for the same offense. See the case of State v. Hanson, 23 Tex. 232."

In the case of Wilson v. Com. 14 Bush, 159, the same doctrine is announced. In the case of Com. v. Cook, 13 B. Mon. 149, is announced the same doctrine.

In the case of Com. v. Blood, 4 Gray, 32, the court uses the following language: "Nothing can be more clear than the duty of the commonwealth to prove the identity of the offense charged in a complaint or indictment, with that on which it seeks to convict the party charged before the jury of trials. The fundamental principles of our government require this as an essential safeguard to the rights and liberty of the citizen. If it were not so, the constitutional privilege of a party, before he is held to answer to an offense, to have it 'fully and plainly, substantially and formally, described to him,' and to be secure from arrest until 'the cause or foundation of the warrant be previously supported by oath or affirmation,' might be violated at the pleasure of prosecutors. Such a practice would be also in direct contravention of § 2, chap. 135, Rev. Stat. 1836, which requires that, when a complaint shall be made to a magistrate that a criminal offense has been committed, he shall examine the complainant under oath, and, if it appear that such offense has been committed, he shall issue his warrant, reciting the substance of the accusation. These provisions of our Constitution and of the statute are but a declaration and affirmation of the ancient rule of the common law that no one shall be held to answer to an indictment or information unless the crime with which it is intended to charge him is set forth with precision and fullness. Petition of Right, 3 Car. I., § 5; R. v. St. George, 9 Car. & P. 491; Com. v. Phillips, 16 Pick. 213. So strictly is this held that, if an indictment charges a party with committing an offense upon the body or property of a person unknown, and it is made to appear at the trial that the name of the person was in fact known to the grand jury at the time when the indictment was found, the defendant will be entitled to an acquittal. The offense must not only be proved as charged, but it must be charged as proved. Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 5th Am. ed. 36; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 213; 2 East, P. C. 651, 781; R. v. Walker, 3 Campb. 264; R. v. Robinson, Holt, N. P. 595.

In State v. Doyle, 11 R. I. 575, it is said: "The complaint is in the usual form. It charges, with the usual negative averments, that on the 28th day of November, A. D. 1876, the defendant 'did unlawfully sell and suffer to be sold, and not for the purpose of exportation, ale, wine, rum, and other strong and malt liquors and mixed liquors,' etc. The only objection made to the complaint is that it does not state the name of the purchaser, nor state that the sale was to some person to the complainant unknown. The question, then, is whether such an averment is indispensable. The cases cited for the defendant show that, in several states where the question has arisen, it has been held that the certainty required in criminal pleading makes it necessary to name the purchaser, unless his name is unknown, in which case it is permissible to describe him as some person to the jurors or complainant unknown. Com. v. Thurlow, 24 Pick. 374; Blodget v. State, 3 Ind. 403; Capritz v. State, 1 Md. 569; Dorman v. State, 34 Ala. 216; State v. Faucett, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L. 107), 239; State v. Cox, 29 Mo. 475. The only decision which we find to the contrary of this is People v. Adams, 17 Wend. 475, decided in 1837. The decisions rest on the indisputable right of the accused to be charged specifically, so that he may know beforehand what the particular offense is of which he is accused, and be able to prepare his defense, and so, also, that he may not be accused of one offense and be tried for another; and, finally, so that the record of his acquittal or conviction may be a good bar in case he is again indicted or complained of for the same offense. It is evident that this right has not been duly respected in the complaint before us. The offense charged is not so identified as to give the defendant certain information of what in particular she was accused, nor so but that she may have been tried for one offense when she was accused of another, totally distinct from it. Her right 'to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation' is a constitutional as well as a common-law right, and ought to be carefully guarded and maintained. It is true that even naming the purchaser is not always a perfect mode of identification, but it is the approved mode, and it is perhaps as perfect as any that can be devised. In this state the practice is to omit the name. This practice has prevailed for more than a generation. We do not know that it has ever been questioned. If it has, it has doubtless been sustained. We should be glad if we could sanction it for pending complaints, but we are declaring the law, not simply for pending complaints, but for them and all others after them; and we do not see how, upon either principle or precedent, the practice can be upheld. It is suggested that the objection comes too late. We do not find it so. Ordinarily any defect which is fatal on demurrer is also fatal upon motion in arrest of judgment. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 1109. In Capritz v. State and in State v. Faucett, supra, the objection was taken on motion in arrest of judgment."

In Wilson v. Com. 14 Bush, 160, the court said: "The general charge that a merchant has sold whisky, etc., without a license so to do, without stating to whom the sale was made, is too general, as it does not inform the defendant with reasonable certainty of the offense charged, and the record of conviction would not be a safe reliance against another indictment for the same offense."

In Dorman v. State, 34 Ala. 217, counsel contended: "The indictment also fails to specify the name of the person to whom the alleged sale was made, or to allege that it was made to any person whatever, and in this particular it is fatally defective. Francois v. State, 20 Ala. 84; Brown v. Mobile, 23 Ala. 722."

In Martin v. State, 31 Tex.-Crim. Rep. 28, 19 S. W. 434, the court said: "A general allegation that the accused sold liquor in contravention of law is too general in its terms to charge this offense. The particular offense, with such circumstances as will identify it, should be alleged; otherwise an accused party would not know what particular sale he is to answer for, and could not be prepared to meet the accusation against him. The allegations charging the offense should be specific enough to enable the accused to plead a judgment of conviction or acquittal thereunder in bar of another prosecution for the same offense. The information should allege the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold, or, if the name of such person is unknown, that fact should be averred."

In Capritz v. State, 1 Md. 574, the court said: "The indictment does not mention the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold, but merely avers that 'he, the said James Capritz, then and there being a regular licensed ordinary keeper, unlawfully exposed for sale, and then and there did sell, spirituous liquors; to wit, brandy,' etc. In such an indictment, time is immaterial; that is to say, the particular Sunday is immaterial. If the offense be laid on a Sunday previous to the finding of the indictment, it will be sufficient, and the state will not be called upon to prove the day, in exact conformity with the designation of the indictment. It is essential, however, that the name of the person to whom the liquor was sold should be mentioned. State v. Nutwell, 1 Gill, 54. Unless this be furnished, the party has no means of preparing for his defense. Where the name of the purchaser is unknown to the jurors, he may be described as 'a certain person to the jurors aforesaid unknown.'"

These cases present our fixed conclusion upon this question. We will not have time to go over it again.

2. Upon the trial of this case the court instructed the jury as follows: "No. 3. The court instructs the jury that the defendant in this case is a competent witness in this case, and you must consider his testimony in arriving at a verdict; but, in determining what weight and credibility you must give to his testimony in making up your verdict, you may take into consideration the fact that he is the defendant in this case and on trial, his interest in the result of the trial, together with any other fact or circumstance of the trial affecting the credit to be given the testimony of any of the witnesses in the case."

A similar instruction was condemned by this court in the case of Green v. United States (Okla. Crim. App.) 101 Pac. 112, and that case was reversed in part on this account. The same question came up again before us in the case of Hendrix v. United States (Okla. Crim. App.) 101 Pac. 125. The instruction was again condemned, but was held to be harmless error in that case for reasons given in the opinion. We think that it is error for the court to single out any special witness, personally, and burden his testimony with any suggestions which might indicate to the jury that, in the opinion of the court, such witness was liable to testify falsely. Instructions as to the credibility of witnesses should be general, and apply equally to all of the witnesses for the state and the defendant alike. Because a 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

witness may be the defendant is no reason why he should be visited with condemnation upon the one hand, or clothed with sanctity upon the other. He is before the court as a witness, and should be treated by both the court and the jury just as other witnesses are treated,—no better and no worse. We trust that the courts in Oklahoma will cease to give such instructions in the future; otherwise it will result in the reversal of many convictions which, but for such instructions, would be affirmed.

For the reasons hereinbefore given, this case is reversed and remanded, with instructions to the county judge of Muskogee county to set aside the verdict of the jury, and to sustain the demurrer to the information.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

LOUIS WIENER FOR USE OF J. R. PRINGLE

v.

AMERICAN INSURANCE COMPANY OF BOSTON et al.

PHOENIX INSURANCE COMPANY, Garnishee, Appt.

(224 Pa. 292, 73 Atl. 443.)

Garnishment — corporate debt — non-residence.

A debt due from one corporation to another, without any limitation with respect to payment, may be garnished in the hands of such corporation in any state where jurisdiction of the debtor can be secured, although neither debtor nor creditor is located therein.

Note. — As the debt garnished in this instance was payable generally, and not expressly payable in a state other than Pennsylvania, and as the garnishee, though a foreign corporation, would apparently have been subject to suit in respect of the indebtedness by the principal defendant, the jurisdiction to garnish the same is clear, under the doctrine of Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797, supplemented by Harris v. Balk, 198 U. S. 215, 49 L. ed. 1023, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1084.

Upon the general subject as to the jurisdiction to garnish an indebtedness due to a nonresident not personally within the jurisdiction of the court, see exhaustive note to Goodwin v. Clayton, 67 L.R.A. 209; and as to place of payment of debt, as affecting jurisdiction to garnish the same, see case notes to Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Allen, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 608, and Steer v. Dow, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263.

APPEAL by the garnishee from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, Number 2, for Philadelphia County, in plaintiff's favor in a foreign attachment proceeding. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Francis S. Laws and John F. Lewis for appellant.

Messrs. G. Helde Norris and Theodore F. Jenkins, for appellee:

A debt due to a nonresident is liable to foreign attachment when the debtor is within reach of our process.

Pennock*, 51 Pa. 244; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Deer, 200 U. S. 176, 50 L. ed. 426, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This foreign attachment was issued against the American Insurance Company of Boston, a Massachusetts corporation, as defendant, and the Phoenix Insurance Company of New York, a New York corporation, as garnishee. The defendant appeared, and judgment was entered against it for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense. Subsequently judgment was entered against the garnishee on its answers to the interrogatories filed, and from that judgment it has appealed. What was attached was a debt due from the garnishee to the defendant in the attachment, and we are asked to say that this was not attachable, because it was not, in contemplation of law, within the jurisdiction of the court at the time the writ issued. Authorities are not wanting to sustain this contention of the appellant, but we cannot follow them.

If, under the attachment in his hands, the sheriff had undertaken to seize tangible property of the defendant in the possession of the garnishee, beyond the jurisdiction of the court, such property would not have been bound by the attachment. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Pennock, 51 Pa. 244. By the act of June 13, 1836 (P. L. 568), the goods and effects of a defendant in a foreign attachment, in the hands of the garnishee, shall, after service of the writ, be bound by it, and be in the officer's power; and, if susceptible of seizure or manual occupation, the officer shall proceed to secure the same, to answer and abide the judgment of the court in the case. If tangible goods are not in the possession of the garnishee within the jurisdiction of the court out of which the writ of attachment issued, they cannot be touched by that writ, and are therefore not bound by it. An intangible thing—a debt due from the garnishee to the defendant—cannot be actually seized anywhere; but, being an effect of the defendant in the hands of his creditor, is bound by the attachment from the time it is served. "All debts are payable everywhere, unless there be some special limitation or provision in respect to the payment; the rule being that debts as such have no locus or situs, but accompany the creditor everywhere." 2 Parsons, Contr. 8th ed. 702.

It does not appear from the answers to the interrogatories that the debt due by the garnishee to the defendant had imposed upon it any "special limitation or provision in respect to the payment." It was payable generally, and unquestionably could have been sued on here in Pennsylvania, and therefore was attachable here. "This is the principle and effect of the best-considered cases,—the inevitable effect from the nature of transitory actions and the purpose of foreign attachment laws, if we would enforce that purpose." Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Sturm, 174 U. S. 710, 43 L. ed. 1144, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 797. The rule that, to give a court jurisdiction in a foreign attachment, the res must be within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, applies only to tangible assets, capable of actual seizure, and does not apply to choses in action. Jurisdiction to fasten choses in action by garnishee process depends upon the ability to serve that process upon the debtor or the absent defendant, within the jurisdiction of the court. National F. Ins. Co. v. Chambers, 53 N. J. Eq. 468, 32 Atl. 663. This case is cited with approval in Harris v. Balk, 198 U. S. 215, 49 L. ed. 1023, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1084. In that case a citizen of North Carolina, indebted to another citizen of that state, was, while temporarily in Maryland, garnished by a creditor of the man to whom he owed the money, and judgment was duly entered according to the Maryland practice, and paid. Subsequently the original creditor of the garnishee sued him in North Carolina, and the defense was set up of judgment against the garnishee and its payment by him; but the North Carolina courts held that, as the situs of the debt was in North Carolina, the Maryland judgment was not a bar to a recovery by the North Carolina creditor, and judgment was awarded against the debtor. On a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, that court, in reversing the judgment, held that, as under the laws of Maryland the garnishee could have been sued by his creditor in the courts of that state, he was subject to a garnishee process if found and served there, even though there only temporarily, no matter where the situs of the debt was originally, and it was said: "The cases holding that the state court obtains no jurisdiction over the garnishee if he be but temporarily within the state proceed upon the theory that the situs of the debt is at the domicile either of the creditor or of the debtor, and that it does not follow the debtor in his casual or temporary journey into another state, and the garnishee has no possession of any property or credit of the principal debtor in the foreign state. We regard the contention of the plaintiff in error as the correct one. The authorities in the various state courts upon this question are not at all in harmony. They have been collected by counsel, and will be found in their respective briefs, and it is not necessary to here enlarge upon them. Attachment is the creature of the local law; that is, unless there is a law of the state providing for and permitting the attachment, it cannot be levied there. If there be a law of the state providing for the attachment of the debt, then, if the garnishee be found in that state, and process be personally served upon him therein, we think the court thereby acquires jurisdiction over him, and can garnish the debt due from him to the debtor of the plaintiff, and condemn it, provided the garnishee could himself be sued by his creditor in that state. We do not see how the question of jurisdiction vel non can properly be made to depend upon the so-called original situs of the debt, or upon the character of the stay of the garnishee, whether temporary or permanent, in the state where the attachment is issued. Power over the person of the garnishee confers jurisdiction on the courts of the state where the writ issues. Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 206, 47 L. ed. 439, 445, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277. If, while temporarily there, his creditor might sue him there and recover the debt, then he is liable to process of garnishment, no matter where the situs of the debt was originally. We do not see the materiality of the expression 'situs of the debt,' when used in connection with attachment proceedings. If by situs is meant the place of the creation of the debt, that fact is immaterial. If it be meant that the obligation to pay the debt can only be enforced at the situs thus fixed, we think it plainly untrue. The obligation of the debtor to pay his debt clings to and accompanies him wherever he goes. He is as much bound to pay his debt in a foreign state, when therein sued upon his obligation by his creditor, as he was in the state where the debt was contracted. We speak of ordinary debts, such as the one in this case. It would be no defense to such suit for the debtor to plead that he was only in the foreign state casually or temporarily. His obligation to pay would be the same whether he was there in that way or with an intention to remain. It is nothing but the obligation to pay which is garnished or attached. This obligation can be enforced by the courts of the foreign state after personal service of process therein, just as well as by the courts of the domicile of the debtor. If the debtor leave the foreign state without appearing, a judgment by default may be entered, upon which execution may issue, or the judgment may be sued upon in any other state where the debtor might be found. In such case the situs is unimportant. It is not a question of possession in the foreign state, for possession cannot be taken of a debt or of the obligation to pay it, as tangible property might be taken possession of. Notice to the debtor (garnishee) of the commencement of the suit, and notice not to pay to his creditor, is all that can be given, whether the garnishee be a mere casual and temporary comer, or a resident of the state where the attachment is laid. His obligation to pay his creditor is thereby arrested, and a lien created upon the debt itself. Cahoon v. Morgan, 38 Vt. 234, 230; National F. Ins. Co. v. Chambers, 53 N. J. Eq. 468, 483, 32 Atl. 663. We can see no reason why the attachment could not be thus laid, provided the creditor of the garnishee could himself sue in that state, and its laws permitted the attachment."

The foregoing is in accord with what was held in Fithian v. New York & E. R. Co. 31 Pa. 114, where the question was whether a debt due by a foreign corporation, which was evidenced by a judgment obtained against it in a foreign state, was attachable here at the instance of a creditor of the corporation's creditor, and we decided that such debt could be attached, and that the garnishee was not protected by paying over the amount of the judgment against it to the attorneys of its judgment creditor in the state of New York, in disregard of the attachment. The attachment, it is true, was one in execution under the act of June 13, 1836, but that act, directing that a debt due to a defendant may be attached, provides that it is to be attached in the manner allowed in the case of a foreign attachment. If the debt was attachable in the attachment execution, it clearly would have been so in a foreign attachment.

The assignment of error is overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL AP-PEALS.

MILT DUPREE, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(— Tex. Crim. App. —, 120 S. W. 871.)

Former conviction—appeal—effect.

1. A pending appeal from conviction of an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor will prevent the conviction from being a bar to another prosecution for the same offense.

Judicial notice—former conviction.

2. A court will take judicial notice, in a prosecution for illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, of the fact that an appeal has been taken from its former judgment convicting accused of the same offense.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Brown County Court, convicting him of the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—Effect of a pending appeal from a conviction upon its operation as a bar to another prosecution for the same offense.

It is not expressly stated in the foregoing case whether the second indictment was for the same offense as the first or not; and a portion of the language of the court would seem to imply that the court was discussing indictments for different offenses; but the general argument of the court would be unintelligible if such were the fact, and upon the rehearing the court expressly states that, if the judgment introduced was in another case and in respect to a separate transaction, it could not avail appellant as the basis of a plea of former conviction. It is suggested that the second indictment was an attempt to convict the defendant of an entirely distinct offense: but the indictment was drawn in such a form, and the evidence introduced upon the trial was of such a character, that no sufficient distinction between the two actions could be made, and the state was obliged to rely upon the fact that an appeal was pending from the first conviction in order to defeat the defendant's plea of former conviction. This is not expressly stated in the record, but an examination of the original briefs seems to warrant the inference.

There are but few authorities upon the question of the effect of the defendant's taking an appeal from a conviction upon his right to plead the conviction as a bar to a second prosecution for the same offense, and these seem to be in direct conflict.

The language of the court in Maines v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 617, 40 S. W. 490, which is discussed and quoted at length 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Harrison & Wayman, for appellant:

An appeal does not suspend the judgment so that a plea of former conviction cannot be based on that judgment.

The trial court is not charged with notice, and need not take judicial cognizance, that an appeal has been perfected in the case pleaded in bar.

in DUPREE v. STATE, seems fully to support the decision in the latter case. The court, however, in the Maines Case, held that the granting of the new trial eliminated from the case the question of former jeopardy, and consequently the case, in reality, is not in point upon the question.

The decision in Harvey v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 121 S. W. 501, is squarely in point, and supports the decision in DUPREE v. STATE. In this case it was held that evidence to sustain a plea of former jeopardy would have been admissible upon the second trial, except for the fact that the lower court certified that the cause upon which the plea of former conviction rested had been appealed from, and was pending on appeal in the appellate court. The court said: "Under all the authorities, this was not a final judgment, or such a judgment as would furnish a basis for a plea of former conviction." It is to be noted, however, that no authorities are cited.

There appear to be no other cases which expressly support this view. It is stated in Wharton, Crim. Pl. & Pr. 9th ed. §435, that a conviction on which there is no judgment, as where the case is pending on error, is not necessarily a bar to a second prosecution for the same offense; but most of the cases cited to this proposition are clearly distinguishable. The decision in Com. v. Fraher, 126 Mass. 265, supports the text somewhat. In this case it was held that where no judgment had been rendered on a verdict of guilty on the first indictment, and the question whether that verdict should stand was still open and pending on a bill of exceptions filed by the defendant himself, the former verdict would not sup-

Mr. F. J. McCord, for appellee:

In order to establish the plea of former conviction, the accused must prove the judgment showing a conviction, that such judgment has never been set aside, that a new trial has not been granted, and that the case has not been reversed, nor the judgment arrested.

State, 2 Tex. App. 239, 28 Am. Rep. 435; Maines v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 617, 40 S. W. 490.

Ramsey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction had in the county court of Brown county on October 13, 1908, convicting appellant of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors in said county, and assessing his punishment at a fine of $50 and thirty days' confinement in the county jail.

In this case a statement of the facts was filed, which was duly approved by the court, and in the case there is properly raised the issue and question as to the validity of appellant's plea of former conviction. This plea in substance contained averments that appellant had heretofore been convicted of the same offense, and is well drawn, and is, we think, sufficient, if sustained by the evidence, in that it in terms avers a conviction had in the county court of Brown county on the 28th day of July, 1907, convicting appellant of the sale of intoxicating liquors on a sale to the witness Couch, on a general port the plea of former conviction, even assuming that both prosecutions were for the same offense.

Some other cases bearing somewhat on the subject may be noted.

In Williams v. State, 20 Tex. App. 357, the defendant was indicted a second time for the same offense on the same day that the judgment of conviction on the first indictment was reversed on appeal. On a motion in arrest of judgment on the second conviction, the court held that the pending appeal from the first conviction was not a good ground for an arrest of the second judgment. This decision, however, is based solely on the terms of the statute governing the granting of arrests of judgment, and does not reach the merits of the question under discussion.

Where a motion to arrest judgment of conviction upon an indictment conceded to be invalid by the prosecuting officer had been made, it was held in State v. Huffman, Addison (Pa.) 140, that the first conviction was not a bar to a second conviction for the same offense. It does not appear, however, that the first conviction had not been set aside, or that the motion in arrest of judgment was still pending.

The arresting of judgment after conviction on an indictment for felony was held in People v. Casborus, 13 Johns. 351, not to be a bar to a second indictment for the same offense. Cases, however, in which the judgment has been arrested, are not in point upon this question, for, as is pointed out in the Casborus Case, the effect of arresting a judgment is the same as quashing the indictment; and the arrest of judgment cannot be pleaded in bar to another prosecution for the same matter, because there is 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) no judgment of the court susceptible of review.

The decision in United States v. Olsen, 57 Fed. 579, is directly in conflict with the Texas decisions cited above. In this case the court, after quoting with approval a statement of Mr. Justice Clifford in Coleman v. Tennessee, 97 U. S. 509, 24 L. ed. 1118, to the effect that a plea of former conviction is bad unless it contains the averment that the prior judgment is in full force and unreversed, said that it was not prepared to say that the plea must also show that no appeal or writ of error had been taken from the judgment pleaded at bar, and it was held that even though an appeal was pending, the defendant was not, for that reason, deprived of the protection of the judgment if it was otherwise sufficient. And the court cited with approval Bishop, Crim. Law, § 1021, to the effect that there can be no second prosecution while the judgment, even if void, is unreversed; not because there has been a jeopardy, but because an erroneous final judgment is voidable only, and of the same effect while it stands as a valid one.

There is undoubtedly much authority in civil cases for the proposition that an appeal or writ of error, during its pendency, deprives the judgment of that finality of character necessary to entitle it to admission as res judicata; but it may be considered doubtful whether a rule of the civil courts, in which both parties stand upon an equal footing, is applicable to a criminal case, where the defendant is entitled to have statutes and rules of procedure construed strictly in his favor.

charge, and is followed by the allegation that the "offense for which he is now being prosecuted is, under the law, one and the same transaction and offense as that for which he has heretofore been convicted, and that said judgment has not been set aside or reversed, but remains in full force and effect, and that he, affiant, is one and the same person who was thus tried and convicted, and against whom the judgment aforesaid was rendered in said court; and, further, that the evidence of the witness Couch upon which the judgment aforesaid was predicated was to the substance and effect that he bought various and sundry drinks of whisky and intoxicants from appellant on or about the day alleged in this case, all of which was before the jury in the cause in which he was convicted." On the trial appellant offered in evidence in support of his plea of former conviction the indictment in said cause No. 2,989, in which he had theretofore been convicted, which charges the sale of intoxicating liquor by appellant to J. C. Couch on or about the 10th day of April, 1907, the judgment of conviction had thereon in the county court of Brown county, Texas, on the 28th day of July, 1907, and the charge of the court, submitting this issue to the jury, wherein the court gives this charge: "Now, if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, in Brown county, Texas, on or about the 10th day of April, 1907, and since the 16th day of November, 1906, next before the filing of the indictment herein, did unlawfully sell one drink of whisky, the same then and there being intoxicating liquor, to J. C. Couch, as charged, and that the sale of intoxicating liquor had theretofore been and was then and there prohibited in said Brown county under and by the laws of this state, then you will find defendant guilty, and assess his punishment by a fine of not less than $25, nor more than $100, and imprisonment in the county jail for not less than twenty nor more than sixty days." There was no proof offered as to what had become of this judgment,—as to whether it was final, had been set aside, or appealed from. As a matter of fact, it had been appealed from, the appeal was then pending, and is to-day before this court.

Appellant relies, to sustain his plea, upon the decisions of this court in the case of Piper v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 550, 110 S. W. 899, and Alexander v. State, 53 Tex. Crim. Rep. 553, 110 S. W. 918. As applied to the facts of those cases, there is and can be no doubt about the correctness of the decisions therein rendered. It is our judgment that plea of former conviction in this case should not have been submitted at all, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) and furnishes absolutely no protection to appellant. The court below, as all the courts of record, was authorized, and indeed required, to take notice of his own proceedings and records. The court and judge presiding knew, and was charged by law with knowing, that the conviction in the original case, the basis of the plea, had been appealed from, and on such appeal the judgment and its effect suspended. It was held in the case of Maines v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 617, 40 S. W. 490, that on a plea of former conviction, where it appeared that defendant's motion for a new trial in the case in which the conviction was had was still pending, it was his duty to ask for a postponement of his trial; and it was his right to have a final disposition of the first case before being forced to trial in the second, in order that he might avail of such disposition on his plea of former conviction. In discussing the case, Judge Henderson says: "In our opinion, it was the duty of appellant, when he was placed on trial, in view of the fact that a motion for a new trial was pending in said former case, to have asked that the case then called for trial be postponed until the former case should be finally disposed of. It was his right to have a final disposition made of said other case before he was forced to trial in the last-mentioned case, in order that he might set up such final disposition. This was not done. The record shows that there was really no final judgment against the appellant when he set up his special plea, and it further shows that, while a new trial was then pending, before the record was made up and the bill of exceptions approved by the court in this case, a new trial was granted." To the same effect, see Brown v. State, 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 272, 64 S. W. 1056; Washington v. State, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 156, 32 S. W. 694; Powell v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 11, 57 S. W. 94.

This question came before this court in the early case of Thompson v. State, 9 Tex. App. 649, in which Judge Winkler says: "The position of counsel, that the defendant had once before been placed in jeopardy and could not be again tried, though supported by an able and ingenious argument, in which numerous authorities are cited, is wholly untenable. The circumstances are briefly these: The defendant had previously been tried and convicted. On his own appeal the conviction was set aside, the judgment reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. 4 Tex. App. 44. The effect of this action of the court of appeals upon the defendant's case was to place his case in precisely the same condition as if the district court had granted a new trial and there had been no appeal. Code Crim. Proc. 1879, art. 876. In such a case the doctrine of former jeopardy has no application whatever, for the simple reason that there had been no final adjudication of the case. Vestal v. State, 3 Tex. App. 648, and authorities there cited; Simco v. State, 9 Tex. App. 338. The action of this court on the former appeal is known to us, and it is shown by the record that it was known to the court below on the present trial. The plea of former jeopardy was properly stricken out on the motion and demurrer of the county attorney." It will be noted by the language of this case that an appeal had been had and a reversal obtained in this court. In many cases cited in the books (Dubose v. State, 13 Tex. App. 418, and Parchman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 239, 28 Am. Rep. 435) it appeared that a motion for a new trial had been granted, and for these reasons the plea of former conviction was held unavailable. It would, indeed, be a singular doctrine to hold that because in one case, in prosecutions covering many months, a conviction for violating the local option law had been had, while contesting this conviction and resorting to all the means known to law to escape its result, the appellant would be able to use such conviction, while still denying its force and while suspending its effect, as a shield against prosecution for other sales. If this could be done, it might easily happen that, while contesting the first of thirteen cases, an acquittal might be obtained in the remaining twelve cases on the ground of former conviction, and finally, on appeal, a reversal obtained in the first case, and ultimately a judgment of acquittal therein secured. It would thus happen that appellant would secure the benefit of a former conviction in the twelve cases, whereas it might result that in the case used as a shield he would go free, and we would have the strange anomaly of twelve acquittals by reason of a former conviction, when finally it should be determined that the appellant was not guilty at all, and he would escape punishment in all thirteen cases, in some or all of which he might be guilty, on the ground of a conviction in the trial court, contested by him, in which it had been finally determined that in fact he was not guilty of any offense.

Our ruling is directly in keeping with the rule laid down in our supreme court. It was held in the case of Texas Trunk R. Co. v. Jackson Bros. 85 Tex. 608, 22 S. W. 1030, that an appeal or writ of error, whether prosecuted under cost or supersedeas bond, during pendency, deprives judgment of finality of character necessary to entitle it to admission as res judicata. It was also held in the case of Maxwell v. First Nat. Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 848, that res judicata cannot be pleaded while judgment relied upon is pending appeal in another suit. It was later held in the case of Buckner v. Lancaster (Tex. Civ. App.) 40 S. W. 631, that a judgment from which an appeal is pending is not admissible in evidence as conclusive of the issue it involves. It is urged, however, that to adopt this practice would involve the application of a rule that would delay proceedings in courts and cause much confusion. That this might result is undoubtedly true; but, at least, it would follow the rule everywhere adopted in this state, and would, while perhaps occasioning delay, result in the due administration of justice, and would not involve the absurd and ridiculous result which the construction contended for by appellant would necessarily cause to apply.

Finding no error, the judgment is affirmed.

Brooks, J., absent.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Ramsey, J., on June 23, 1909, handed down the following additional opinion:

In this case counsel for appellant have filed a very able, thoughtful, and well-considered motion for rehearing, in which the correctness of the opinion of the court is questioned and its conclusion attacked with great vigor. It is with entire candor admitted in the motion that the conclusion of the court in holding that an appeal from a judgment, during the pendency of such appeal, deprives same of the finality of character necessary before it can be pleaded in bar of another prosecution. This, it is conceded, is the rule of our supreme court, and is also the rule adhered to in very many of the other states of the Union. It is recognized that this is the first time the doctrine has been applied in this court, though the correctness of the doctrine laid down by us is substantially conceded. The conclusion of the opinion, with which issue is taken, is that part of same which holds, in substance, that a trial court would and should take judicial notice that an appeal was pending in this tribunal, in the absence of any direct evidence to this effect.

In the original opinion we made the following statement: "The court below, as all the courts of record, was authorized, and indeed required, to take notice of his own proceedings and records. The court and judge presiding knew, and was charged by law with knowing, that the conviction in the original case, the basis of the plea, had been appealed from, and on such appeal the judgment and its effect suspended." This statement was made on the assumption that the case from which the former conviction resulted was, indeed, the same case on which appellant was in the instant case being prosceuted. If the judgment introduced was in another case, and in respect to a separate transaction, it could not avail appellant as basis of a plea of former conviction. By the words "in another case" we mean, of course, another separate and severable transaction. So that it seems to us that appellant's argument defeats itself. If, as a necessary result of his position, it is asserted that in the instant case the conviction could not be had for the reason that a former conviction in respect to the same matter had once been had against appellant, then where the parties were the same, the transaction the same, and before the same court, by all the rules of law the court must take cognizance of its own judgments in respect to such matter. If it be conceded it is a different case and different transaction, then it is not available as a basis of a plea of former conviction at all. We do not attach any importance to the fact that the former conviction was had in a merely different numbered case. The true test is, as we understand: Were the parties the same? Was the transaction the same? To illustrate: If one should be indicted for murder, and on trial convicted of manslaughter, a new trial granted, and, for any reason, a new indictment found, the case docketed under a new number, could it be doubted that, where pending in the same court, the judge must take cognizance of the proceedings and judgments in the different numbered case against the same defendant? The statement in the original opinion was perhaps rather broader than should have been made, and not stated with that exactitude and accuracy which is always desirable in opinions of courts of last resort; but we assumed that it would be understood and read with reference to and in the light of the facts shown by the record.

There are many authorities holding that the courts are not required to take judicial cognizance and notice of their own judgments in cases pending therein between other parties. This rule is well established and supported by the cases cited by appellant, and of this rule the case of Slaughter v. Cooper (Tex. Civ. App.) 107 S. W. 898, is an excellent illustration. In that case the judgment in the suit of Cooper v. Heffner was admitted in evidence, and it appeared on the face of judgment that notice of appeal was given; but it was not shown that the appeal was ever perfected, so as to give it that finality necessary to make it admissible in evidence. And it was further objected to because the appellant was not a party to the case, and his rights were not concluded by reason thereof in this case. It was there held, following the case of Rust v. Burke, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

57 Tex. 343, that the fact that an appeal was ever perfected cannot be presumed, and that the judgment must be held to be a subsisting and valid judgment until the contrary was shown. There, as will be noted, the judgment was between different parties, and one to which appellant was in no sense a party, and by which, in the nature of things, he could not be bound.

We think, further, in any event, that appellant is without complaint, for the reason that the court did, in an admirable charge, submit the issue of former conviction to the jury. This matter was submitted to them in this language: "In this case the defendant has pleaded specially that he has heretofore been tried and convicted of the same offense for which he is now being tried, and evidence has been introduced before you with regard to said plea. You are charged that in order to sustain said plea you must be satisfied from the evidence that the offense for which the defendant was formerly convicted was the identical case for which he is now on trial before you; that is, that the evidence in the former case and that introduced in this case establishes one and the same state of facts and circumstances. Or, if you find from the evidence and the former charge of the court the jury in former case could have convicted defendant of the charge for which he is now being tried, if you are so satisfied and so believe from the evidence, then the form of your verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find that the matters alleged in the defendant's plea of former conviction are true;' and you need not inquire any further into nor render or return any further verdict in the case. But should you not be so satisfied from the evidence, and upon further inquiry, under the other instructions herein given you, you should find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, then and in that event the form of your verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find that the matters alleged in the defendant's plea of former conviction are untrue, and we further find that the defendant is guilty as charged in the indictment,' and assess his punishment at five and imprisonment as directed under the other instructions herein given you." It was, of course, under the well-settled rules, incumbent on appellant to show a conviction for the same offense as that wherein he is here charged.

We have carefully considered the matter, and are clearly of opinion that appellant is without just cause of complaint, and that the judgment is correct.

The motion for rehearing is in all things overruled.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

HYRUM BELNAP, Appt.,

v.

LIZZIE CONDON et al., Respts.

(34 Utah, 213, 97 Pac. 111.)

Lien — materialman — contract — parol.

1. A materialman may show a parol agreement between a conditional vendor and his vendee from which authority to purchase material to improve the property may directly appear or be inferred, and is not bound by the terms of the written agreement between them.

Same — agent's orders — conditional vendee.

2. The mere expectation by a conditional vendor of real estate that the purchaser will make improvements upon it and thereby enhance its value, or permission to do so, is not sufficient to establish the relation of principal and agent between them, so as to give the one furnishing the material a right to a lien on the vendor's interest, under a statute giving liens for materials furnished, whether at the instance of the owner, or of "any other person acting by his authority or under him as agent."

Same — vendor's interest — alteration of account.

3. One furnishing materials for a building to a conditional vendee of the real estate on which it is to be placed, to whom it is charged, cannot change the account so as to bind the interest of the vendor without his consent, upon ascertaining the true state of the title.

(August 4, 1908.)

Case Note. — Power of lessee or vendee to subject owner's interests to mechanics' liens.

It is the purpose of this note to show under what conditions a lessee, vendee, licensee, or other person bearing some similar contractual relationship with the owner, may subject the latter's interests to a mechanics' lien under the various statutes affording liens for labor or materials furnished in erecting buildings or making other improvements upon lands. Cases involving improvements made by persons bearing some legal relationship, such as husband, guardian, etc., have been excluded.

The character of the contractual relationship borne by the person causing the improvements to be made, to the owner, is apparently immaterial, as the result is the same in practically every case, whether such person be a lessee, vendee, or licensee. If the court makes any distinction in this respect, the fact will be noted in connection with the case.

Two distinct and directly opposed rules of construction are frequently applied to mechanics' lien statutes. Some courts hold that they are to be strictly construed, as being in derogation of the common law. On the other hand, it has been said that as they are highly remedial in character, they should receive a liberal construction. It is suggested that both rules are to be applied. Asserting rights in derogation of the common law, the lienor must bring himself strictly within the requirements of the statute; but, having brought himself within the provisions of the statute, and having shown that he is one of the class to whom it was intended to give a special remedy for enforcing his claim, the statute is to be liberally construed, so that he may receive the benefits which the legislature intended to grant him.

It should be noted at the outset that great difficulty has been experienced in grouping the cases according to any logical scheme of classification, so that the rulings of the various courts as to the effect of statutes of the same general import, under similar conditions, may be shown. The statutes not only differ greatly in their terms, but also are the subject of frequent amendment. As many of the cases do not set out the statute in terms, nor make mention of the particular provision under which the lien is claimed, it has been necessary in many cases to compare the decision with others from the same jurisdiction in order to determine the bearing of the case upon the point in question. A number of cases which, apparently, are determined without reference to any particular statute, have been grouped at the close of the note.

Furthermore, different provisions of the same statute frequently are apparently inconsistent, and a lien may be claimed under one provision, when other provisions would seem to negative the right to a lien. The attempt has been made, however, to group, so far as possible, cases according to the particular provision upon which the case turns.

Statutes giving liens for improvements made under contracts with the owner—general rule.

Under statutes confining mechanics' liens to claims for labor or materials furnished for improvements made under contracts with the owner, or with the owner or proprietor, it may be stated generally that no contract for labor and material, made by a lessee or vendee, will subject the owner's interests to a lien; and this is so, even if the owner has knowledge that the labor and material is being furnished. One exception to this rule, recognized in some states, but not in all, is where the contract between the owner and his vendee or lessee expressly requires the latter to make specified improvements, the cost of which, or a part thereof, is to be borne by the owner.

Under statutes of this general character, the following cases hold that contracts for improvements made with lessees or vendees, or with parties holding bonds for title, do not subject the legal owner's interests to APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Weber County in favor of the owner of the fee in a proceeding to enforce a mechanics' lien on real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. D. Skeen and W. L. Maginnis, for appellant:

Where a contract of sale requires the vendee to make improvements on the land, the vendor thereby either constitutes the vendee his agent to make the improvements, or contracts that the fee-simple title to the land may be bound by a mechanics' lien to pay for the improvements.

Builders who contract with leasees have no lien on the property, there being no privity between the builder and the owner. Hoffman v. Laurans, 18 La. 70; Sewall v. Duplessis, 2 Rob. (La.) 66.

And in Nicholson v. Nichols, 115 N. C. 200, 20 S. E. 294, it was held that no lien would attach unless work was done or the materials were furnished under a contract with the owner, express or implied.

So, in Conner v. Lewis, 16 Me. 268, it was held that one who merely held a contract of conveyance was not the proprietor or owner within the meaning of the statute giving liens for labor and material furnished under contract with the owner or proprietor, and the fact that the true owner's name is in the body of the contract for the building will not cause the lien to attach to his interest, where he did not sign the contract.

And in Getto v. Friend, 46 Kan. 24, 26 Pac. 473, it was held that, in actions to foreclose mechanics' liens for work done and for material furnished under a contract with one who has an executory contract for the purchase of land, and is in possession thereof, the lien of mechanic or materialman must be measured by the extent of the equity of the purchaser under the contract. And to the same effect were the decisions in Johnson v. Badger Lumber Co. 8 Kan. App. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

580, 55 Pac. 517, and Seitz v. Union P. R. Co. 16 Kan. 133.

Where the plaintiffs, when they performed the work and furnished the materials, knew that the ones at whose instance the work was done had only an oral contract, or a privilege or option to purchase, it was held in Thomas v. Ellison, 57 Ark. 481, 22 S. W. 95, that they had no lien upon the interests of the owner, where the work was done without the owner's authority and he in no way misled them, or did anything to prevent the vendee from acquiring the legal title.

A plea by defendant that she was the proprietor of the land, and did not contract for the erection of the building, was held good in Sibley v. Casey, 6 Mo. 164, where the statute gave a lien to those only who contracted with the proprietor.

And in Hawley v. Henderson, 34 Miss. 261, it was held that a complaint which alleges that material was furnished to one who was in possession of and in control of the property was bad on demurrer, where the express provision of the statute confined liens to those under contracts with the proprietor or lessor of property.

And where the lease provided that no alteration should be made without the owners' written consent, and the owners supervised improvements at the lessee's request, to see to it that the alterations which were being made in the building were not injurious to their interests, it was held in Muldoon v. Pitt, 54 N. Y. 269, that the directions given by the owners did not in any sense constitute them parties to the contract for the improvement. And to the same effect was the decision in Cornell v. Barney, 94 N. Y. 394.

A contract by the owner to sell the property, and to advance money to the vendee to build upon it, does not make the vendee a contractor with the owner within the meaning of a statute giving liens for material or labor furnished to one who contracts with the owner to make improvements on the property. Loonie v. Hogan, 9 N. Y. 435, 61 Am. Dec. 683.

So, a vendor of land who agreed to make

Messrs. James H. DeVine and James N. Kimball, for respondent Condon:

Requiring the vendee to build a house upon the premises would not give him authority from vendor, or make him her agent, to purchase material for the house, or subject her interest in the lot to a mechanics' lien.

Morrow v. Merritt, 16 Utah, 412, 52 Pac. 667; Morrison, M. & Co. v. Clark, 20 Utah, 438, 77 Am. St. Rep. 924, 59 Pac. 235.

The lien attached only to such title as the purchaser had, and the vendor could not be required to part with his title until the purchase money was paid.

Hickox v. Greenwood, 94 Ill. 266.

advances for the purpose of assisting the vendee in erecting buildings thereon is not the owner of the buildings, within the meaning of a statute providing for liens made under contract with the owner, so as to subject his interests to the lien. Burbridge v. Marcy, 54 How. Pr. 446; Dugan v. Brophy, 55 How. Pr. 121; Holley v. Van Dolsen, 55 How. Pr. 333; Hallahan v. Herbert, 4 Daly, 209, affirmed in 57 N. Y. 409; Walker v. Paine, 2 E. D. Smith, 662; Gay v. Brown, 1 E. D. Smith, 725. These cases all cite with approval the Loonle Case and arrive at the same result, but apparently approach the question from another point of view.

But a vendee under an executory contract of sale can subject the legal title to a lien where the holder of such title with full knowledge that the improvements are being made, does not disclose to the contractor the true condition of the title. Donaldson v. Holmes, 23 Ill. 85.

So, where certain material was furnished to one holding under a contract of sale, and, with the full knowledge of the owner, was put into the construction of a building, it was held in Weber v. Weatherby, 34 Md. 656, that the materials must be considered to have been furnished upon the authority of the owner, within the meaning of the statute, as the latter, by his conduct, accepted the agency of the vendee. And to the same effect was the decision in Blake v. Pitcher, 46 Md. 453.

The following cases present somewhat unusual features:

In Scales v. Griffin, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 54, after stating that a mere trespasser could not subject the owner's interest to a mechanics' lien, the court said: "Little less monstrous would be the doctrine that the owner, who has contracted to convey a lot upon certain terms, and given the possession until those terms be fulfilled, without parting with his title, but who, on account of a breach of the contract, was obliged to take possession of his land again, should be subject to be deprived of his title by virtue of such a lien for buildings erected for the contractor, and without the privity or consent of the owner." And to the same effect was the decision in Wager v. Briscoe, 38 Mich. 587.

Mr. Theodore Maloney for respondent Becker.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant instituted this action to foreclose a mechanics' lien. In his complaint he in substance alleges that the respondents were indebted to him in the sum of $218.61 for a balance due for certain materials furnished by him to them at their special instance and request, to be used in the construction of a certain building to be erected upon certain premises, which are described in the complaint, and that said materials were furnished between the 29th day of August and the 26th day of October, 1904, and were used for the purposes aforesaid.

And in Fuller v. Detroit Loan & Bldg. Asso. 119 Mich. 71, 77 N. W. 642, where the statute gave a lien for labor and materials furnished under contract with the owner, part owner, or lessee, to the extent of the interest of such owner, part owner, or lessee, it was held that one holding under a land contract, who completed a building being erected upon the land with money furnished by the owner, but which was to be repaid, was not a contractor with the owner, so as to make the plaintiff, who furnished labor and material, a subcontractor, and entitle him to a lien upon the owner's premises. The court said that a provision of the statute that the lienor who contracted with a vendee should be subrogated to the interests of the latter in case the contract should be surrendered, upon his performance of the vendee's obligations within a stated period, took the case out of the class of cases like Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Kountze, 30 Neb. 719, 12 L.R.A. 33, 46 N. W. 1123, which hold that where the construction of a building by a vendee is authorized by the vendor, the lien attaches to the whole land.

And the holder of a grantor's lien cannot subject the property to a lien in favor of one whom he hired to take care of the property, where the statute requires that a lien shall attach only where there is a contract with the owner. Griffin v. Seymour, 15 Colo. App. 487, 63 Pac. 809.

And where a lease provided that the lessee was to pay for repairs, and there was a special fund set apart by the lessee for their payment, and the premises were not to be bound for the repairs, it was held in Boone v. Chatfield, 118 N. C. 916, 24 S. E. 745, that no lien could attach to premises for such repairs, made at the instance of the lessee.

In Willverding v. Offineer, 87 Iowa, 475, 54 N. W. 592, where a daughter purchased a house for the use of her father and mother, and the latter had a right to do with the property anything which the daughter could have done, and the daughter knew that ma-

These allegations are followed by the usual allegations in such cases with respect to the filing of a notice of intention to claim a lien upon the premises in question, and with a prayer for foreclosure of the lien. The respondent Becker made no appearance in the action, and default was entered against him. The respondent Mrs. Lizzie Condon answered the complaint, in which she denied that she was indebted to plaintiff, or that she purchased or authorized the purchase of the material for the purposes aforesaid, or for any purpose, and alleged that she is, and prior to the alleged furnishing of said materials was, the owner of the premises described in the complaint; that she, prior to said time, had sold said premises to the respondent Becker, and had agreed to convey the same to him upon payment of the purchase price therefor; and that no part of the purchase price had been paid.

Upon a hearing the court found the facts to be substantially as follows: (1) That the respondent Mrs. Lizzie Condon was not indebted to the appellant in any sum. (2) That she was, at all times mentioned in the complaint, the owner in fee of the premises set forth in the complaint; that she at no time requested the appellant, or anyone acting in his behalf, to furnish any material for the purposes of erecting a building upon the premises described in the complaint. (3) That on the 4th day of August, 1904, said Lizzie Condon entered into an agreement with the respondent Becker and wife, whereby she sold the premises described in the materials were furnished and labor performed in making improvements to the building, it was held that the interests of the daughter would be subjected to a lien for the improvements.

A mechanics' lien for improvements upon land, constructed with the consent of the owner, under an oral contract with one holding a written contract or bond for a deed, was held in Middletown Sav. Bank v. Fellows, 42 Conn. 36, not to affect the interests of the legal owner, so as to take precedence of a mortgage executed by the vendee in such a manner that the giving of the mortgage and his receiving the deed to the premises from the original owner constituted one transaction.

The general requirements of the later Indiana statutes are shown in the following statement from Adams v. Buhler, 116 Ind. 100, 18 N. E. 269: "Mechanics' liens rest upon contract, express or implied, with the owner or other person whose interest in the real estate it is proposed to bind or affect by the lien; and while persons who perform labor or furnish material for a contractor may secure a lien upon the real estate or building by notifying the owner and taking the other necessary steps, it is nevertheless essential to the sufficiency of a complaint to foreclose such a lien that it should appear therein who owned the real estate, or the interest to be affected, at the time the building was erected, and that it was erected in pursuance of a contract, express or implied, with such owner."

So, in Hopkins v. Hudson, 107 Ind. 191, 8 N. E. 91, it was held that the lien of a subcontractor or materialman is upheld upon the theory of an implied authority from the owner to the original contractor, to employ men and purchase materials for the structure, which is adding to the value of the owner's property. The lien must be founded on contract with the owner, either directly or indirectly. But the court said: "No analogy can be maintained between the case of a contractor, who is supposed to possess implied authority to bind the property of the owner to the extent of subjecting it to a lien imposed by law in favor of subcontractors and materialmen, and that of a tenant or lessee, who has no such authority." And to the same effect were the decisions in McCarty v. Burnet, 84 Ind. 23, and Coburn v. Stephens, 137 Ind. 683, 45 Am. St. Rep. 218, 36 N. E. 132.

And in People's Sav. L. & Bldg. Assn. v. Spears, 115 Ind. 297, 17 N. E. 570, the court said: "That the purchaser in possession under a contract of purchase made improvements or repairs with the knowledge and consent of the vendor did not estop the latter to assert its prior title. Something more than mere inactive consent is necessary in order that a lien may be acquired against the owner of property."

So, in Rusche v. Pittman, 34 Ind. App. 159, 72 N. E. 473, it was held that a party in possession of real estate under a contract of purchase, accompanied by a title bond binding the vendor to convey the property upon the payment of the full purchase price, cannot, by contract, create a mechanics' lien which the holder thereof may enforce against the premises in derogation of the legal title of the vendor. And to the same effect was the decision in Davis v. Elliott, 7 Ind. App. 246, 34 N. E. 591.

—where improvements are required by lease or contract of sale.

As was suggested above, there is a conflict of opinion as to whether a provision in a lease or contract of sale requiring the lessee or vendee to construct the improvements authorizes the lessee or vendee to subject the owner's interests to a lien.

Thus, in Hillhouse v. Pratt, 74 Conn. 113, 49 Atl. 905, it was held that a mere agreement to sell land does not, of itself, give to the vendee such an equitable estate in the property as to enable him by contract to create a lien as owner which would affect the vendor's title, even if the materials for which the lien is claimed were furnished with the owner's consent; but where the contract of sale requires certain buildings to be erected, and the deed is not to be transferred until the buildings are completed, then the vendee may subject the vendor's interest to a lien for the required improvements.

complaint, to said Beckers, and upon the payment of the purchase price she agreed to convey the same to them by proper deed of conveyance. (4) That no part of the purchase price was paid upon said agreement. (5) That at and for a long time prior to the time that said material was furnished, said Lizzie Condon was the owner in fee of said premises, and that during all of said time the deed evidencing the title in her was of record in Weber county, Utah, where the land is situate. (6) That appellant furnished lumber and material to respondent Becker of the value of $218.61, but that no part thereof was furnished or delivered to said Lizzie Condon, and that she never promised to pay said Belnap, or anyone for him, for said lumber or material. There are further findings, but it is not deemed necessary to mention them here. Upon these findings the court made conclusions of law, and entered judgment against the respondent Becker for the amount claimed by appellant, and in favor of respondent Lizzie Condon, and awarded her costs.

The appellant now insists that the court erred in making findings 1, 2, and 6, upon the ground that the evidence does not support such findings, or any of them. The evidence upon which these findings are based, briefly stated, shows that some time in July, 1904, the respondent Becker and his wife orally agreed to purchase the premises in question from the respondent Lizzie Condon for the agreed price of $625. On the 1st day of August following, Lizzie Condon entered into

So, in Henderson v. Connelly, 123 Ill. 98, 5 Am. St. Rep. 490, 14 N. E. 1, it was held that where a contract of sale did not authorize or in any wise empower the purchaser to erect buildings on the premises, or to incur any liability for the improvement thereof, and the vendor was in no manner connected with the building which the purchaser erected on the premises, but merely sold the lot, leaving the purchaser to improve it or not, as he pleased, then the lien of the mechanic could attach only to such title as the purchaser had; but, if the vendor authorized and empowered the purchaser to erect a building on the premises, the mechanic who furnished labor and material before the termination of the contract would be entitled to subject the vendor's legal title to the lien. And to the same effect was the decision in Paulsen v. Manske, 126 Ill. 72, 9 Am. St. Rep. 532, 18 N. E. 275.

And if the owner of land authorized a third person to have a building erected thereon, it was held in Hough v. Collins, 176 Ill. 188, 52 N. E. 847, that his land would be subject to a lien for the labor and materials furnished.

And in Shearer v. Wilder, 56 Kan. 252, 43 Pac. 224, it was held that a purchaser under an executory contract of sale which required him to erect a number of houses according to certain plans, at a limited cost, and which provided that the vendor should make certain advances, but that no advances should be made and no conveyance made until all liens had been paid, was authorized, as agent of the owner, to contract for materials and labor with which to build the houses, and the laborers and materialmen were entitled to a lien against all the property and all of the legal and equitable interests of the owner therein.

But in Williamson v. Shank, 41 Ind. App. 513, 83 N. E. 641, where a tenant at will was put in possession of property for the purpose of erecting a building, it was held that a materialman furnishing material for the building was not entitled to a lien upon the land.

And where an owner agreed to transfer a certain lot upon the consideration, among 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

others, that the vendee would erect a building thereon, the latter to forfeit all his claims if he failed to fulfil his contract, it was held in McGinniss v. Purrington, 43 Conn. 143, that a mason who built the wall for the building would have no lien upon the land after the vendee's interests had become forfeited, as the owner had not, directly or indirectly, contracted for the work.

Where the statute provided that a lien could attach by virtue of a contract with the owner, it was held in Chicago Lumber Co. v. Schweiter, 45 Kan. 207, 25 Pac. 592, that one in possession of certain lots, holding under an executory contract of sale which required him to build upon the lots, but which reserved the legal title in the vendor until full payment had been made, and which provided that until that time the vendee should have no authority to subject the land to liens of any kind or description, could not subject the owner's interests to a lien.

That the lessor required the lessee, by his lease, to construct a building of a certain value, and made advances to the lessee, secured by a mortgage upon the latter's interests, and the improvements were to revert to the lessor at the end of the term, was held in Cornell v. Barney, 94 N. Y. 394, not to show any contract between the lessor and a materialman furnishing materials for the improvements.

Statutes giving liens on interests of the one "causing" the improvements to be made.

A few statutes give liens upon the interests of the one causing the improvements to be made, or at whose instance they are made. For the most part, such statutes are construed to mean that, in the absence of a contract with the owner, no lien will attach to the owner's interest.

Thus, in Bremen v. Foreman, 1 Ariz. 413, 25 Pac. 539, it was held that, under such a statute, no lien attaches to the interests of the owner or his grantee for improvements caused to be made by a vendee, although the contract of sale required large improvements to be made.

a written contract with said Becker and his wife, whereby she agreed to convey said real estate to said Beckers upon the payment of said sum of $625, $25 of which was to be paid then, and the remainder on the 1st day of August, 1909, with interest at 6 per cent per annum. It further appears from the evidence that the respondent Becker is a carpenter, and, at the time of the purchase, told Mrs. Condon that he wanted to build a shanty upon the property during the fall of 1904, and that he intended to build a better house on it the year following; that he said he had made arrangements with a Mr. Scowcroft for the lumber to put up the shanty; that, instead of getting lumber from Mr. Scowcroft, Becker, in July or August, 1904, bought the lumber and some other material from the appellant; that Mrs. Condon did not know anything about Becker's purchase of lumber until some time in October following, when her attention was called to it by appellant; that the lumber and material were charged to Mr. Becker upon the books of appellant, but in October, when appellant ascertained the true condition of the ownership of the property, and the contract of sale by Mrs. Condon to the Beckers, the account was changed upon the books so as to include Mrs. Condon. This change the appellant claims was made for the reason that Mrs. Condon, whom he went to see about the matter in the fall of 1904, told him that "if you will wait until the first of the year, I will see that the whole thing is paid." This statement appellant

And a mechanics' lien for improvements does not attach to the owner's interest where the tenant advertised for bids in his own name, and made a contract with the lowest bidder also in his own name, although the owner advanced money to make the improvements. Johnson v. Dewey, 36 Cal. 623. The court held that the tenant was the person who "caused" the improvements to be made, within the meaning of the statute, and the lien would attach to his interests only.

And under the same statute it was held in Worden v. Hammond, 37 Cal. 61, that a vendee under an executory contract of sale could not subject the owner's interests to a mechanics' lien.

So, in Harsh v. Morgan, 1 Kan. 293, it was held that a vendee under an unrecorded agreement to convey could not subject the interest of the vendor to a lien under a statute giving a lien upon the interests of the one causing the improvements or buildings to be made.

And in Sisson v. Holcomb, 58 Mich. 634, 26 N. W. 155, where the statute provided that the lien should attach only to such interest of the "owner, part owner, or lessee" who caused the building to be erected, as he had at the time when the materials began to be furnished, it was held that a materialman who had furnished materials to one who had no right, equitable or legal, to the land, did not acquire a lien which would affect the rights of a subsequent bona fide grantee without notice.

Under the Montana statute providing that, if the person contracting for the labor and material owns less than the fee simple in the land, then the lien shall attach to his interest only, the interest of the owners of leased premises is not subject to liens for improvements made under contracts with lessees. Pelton v. Minah Consol. Min. Co. 11 Mont. 281, 28 Pac. 310; Block v. Murray, 12 Mont. 545, 31 Pac. 550; Stenberg v. Liennemann, 20 Mont. 457, 63 Am. St. Rep. 636, 52 Pac. 84.

Under a statute providing that, when buildings were erected by a lessee, the lien would attach to his interests only, it was held in Mills v. Matthews, 7 Md. 315, that 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the fact that the owner was to advance money to aid in the building would not subject his interests to the lien. And to the same effect were the decisions in Lenderking v. Rosenthal, 63 Md. 34, and Hoffman v. McColgan, 81 Md. 390, 32 Atl. 179.

In Gable v. Preachers' Fund Soc. 59 Md. 455, certain premises were leased for a long period at a low rental, and the lessee erected buildings thereon. While the buildings were in the process of construction, a new lease at a greatly increased rental was made, and the reversion sold to a third party. A materialman sought to enforce his lien against the grantee upon the ground that the leasehold interests at the increased rental would not satisfy his lien, and the grantee, at the time of the conveyance, knew that the buildings were being constructed. But the court said: "The materialman who relies upon his lien must look to the state of the title of the land upon which his materials are to be used. If he finds the party with whom he deals is not the owner, but is the architect, builder, or agent of the owner, the law prescribes a mode by which, upon notice to the owner, he can make the land liable. If he finds that such party is lessee or tenant for life or years, he can only claim a lien to the extent of such estate. The complainants, therefore, before parting with their materials, should have looked into the title, and, finding it the subject of an agreement to lease at a prescribed rent, they should have required the agreement, or the lease it calls for, to be recorded, so that no one could be led into a dealing with the title without record notice of its condition." And to the same effect was the decision in Beehler v. Ijams, 72 Md. 193, 19 Atl. 646.

In Rothe v. Bellingrath, 71 Ala. 55, it was held that the relationship of principal and agent cannot be inferred from that of landlord and tenant, and the fact that the landlord authorized the tenant to make the improvements, the latter to be reimbursed by deducting their valuation from the rent, does not change the rule, but is rather a negation of agency. The statute provided that a mechanics' lien should attach only to claims was made by Mrs. Condon when he informed her that he thought he could hold her land for the material which he had sold to Mr. Becker for the building. Mrs. Condon denies that she made any such statement, but says that, when appellant claimed that he could hold the land, she told him that "I will see about it, Mr. Belnap. I am very busy; . . . but I will let you know before the first of the year what I will do about it." After this, she says, she went to see her lawyer about the matter, and then phoned to Mr. Belnap and told him: "I found that he [appellant] could not take my land from me, and I refused to have any more bother about that lumber bill."

Mrs. Condon further testified on cross-examination, and, as appellant seems specially to rely upon this part of her testimony, we set it forth in full as the same appears in appellant's abstract, as follows:

Q. You were perfectly willing to part with this lot for five years, and not get a cent for it?

A. Yes, sir; he said he would put up a little shanty and live in it this winter, and he said: "I am tired of paying rent, and most anything will do for us rather than pay rent." They were to pay interest.

Q. In five years from now that lot may be worth considerable more money. Didn't you know that he intended to put a house on it?

the interests of the person for whose immediate use or benefit the labor was done or things were furnished.

Work done for the holder of an option to buy a mine who has liberty to work the same, the net proceeds to be applied on the purchase price, cannot be said to be done "at the instance" of the owner. Anderson v. Godsall, 7 B. C. 404.

In Pennsylvania the statute provided for a lien upon the interests of the one at whose instance the labor and material were furnished. Under this statute the court in Long v. McLanahan, 103 Pa. 537, said: "Where the tenant contracts with the landlord to build, or to add to or repair buildings, to be paid for by the landlord, either in money or the use of the premises, he is the landlord's agent, and the building is liable to a mechanics' lien as in all other cases of contract."

And numerous Pennsylvania cases have held that a lease requiring the lessee to erect a building or make other similar improvements for which the lessor would pay a fixed sum upon its completion, in addition to giving the annual rental or a portion thereof, was an improvement lease as between the lessor and the lessee, but, as to laborers and materialmen, it was a contract to build; and the lessor's interests would be liable to a lien for the labor and material. Woodward v. Leiby, 36 Pa. 437; Leiby v. Wilson, 40 Pa. 63; Hopper v. Childs, 43 Pa. 310; Fisher v. Rush, 71 Pa. 40; Barclay v. Wainwright, 86 Pa. 191; Hall v. Parker, 94 Pa. 109, affirming 14 Phila. 619; Amos v. Clare, 9 Phila. 35; Rush v. Perot, 12 Phila. 175.

But in Reid v. Kenney, 4 W. N. C. 452, it was held that a mere permission to build upon the property, which the lessee might or might not avail himself of, and which in no wise affected the amount of rental, would not subject the lessor's interests to a lien. And to the same effect was the decision in Dietrich v. Crabtree, 8 W. N. C. 418.

And in Weaver v. Sheeler, 118 Pa. 634, 12 Atl. 558, it was held that no lien would attach to the owner of the legal title for labor and materials furnished under contract and materials furnished to the holder of the equitable title, where the rule is that a lien can attach only to the title of him by whom the building is erected. And this doctrine was adhered to when the case came before the court on a second appeal (124 Pa. 473, 17 Atl. 17). And to the same effect was the decision in Snyder v. Zane, 15 Pa. Super. Ct. 403.

So, in Carey v. Wintersteen, 60 Pa. 395, it was held that where work and material were furnished to a lessee and for the leasehold interest, the fee was not bound.

Where a lot was sold under a parol agreement, the vendor retaining the title deeds until a house should be built upon the lot, when he was to deliver the deeds and take back a mortgage, it was held in Kline v. Lewis, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 31, that a mechanics' lien for labor and material furnished for the house would not affect the owner's interests.

In Bickel v. James, 7 Watts, 9, it was held that a vendor could not recover in ejectment premises sold under the foreclosure of a mechanics' lien filed for improvements made by the vendee, the court holding that the mechanic clearly had a lien upon the building, and it was apparently the intention of the legislature to make the land follow the building. And to the same effect was the decision in Holdship v. Abercrombie, 9 Watts, 52.

But in Evans v. Montgomery, 4 Watts & S. 218, it was held that the act of 1840 modified the remedy of the lienor so that no lien would attach to any interest greater than that held by him at whose instance the material and labor were furnished.

Statutes giving liens for improvements made by contract with, or at the request of, the owner.

Where the statute gives a lien for materials and labor furnished "by contract with, or at the request of, the owner," it was held in Long Island Brick Co. v. Arnold, 18 R. I. 455, 28 Atl. 801, that a lien does not attach to the owner's interest for labor and materials furnished under con-under him as agent, contractor, or otherwise." From the foregoing it would seem that the person who can bind the owner's land for the things for which a lien is given must in some way obtain his authority to do so from the owner. Without such authority, express or implied, in the first instance, or by subsequent ratification by the owner, the owner's property is not bound, although the improvements may benefit his land.

This court has in effect passed upon the question involved in this case. In the case of Morrow v. Merritt, 16 Utah, 412, 52 Pac. 667, it was held that, under the section of the statute above referred to, material furnished at the request of a tenant of the owner does not bind the owner's interest in the land, although the tenant was by his con-wording of the statute; and the fact that there was an agreement between the owner and the one making the repairs that the latter should bear the expense of the repairs and purchase the property did not affect the relation so far as third parties were concerned.

But if, by the terms of the lease, the building was to be erected and paid for by the lessor, he would be the one who was erecting, even though the lessee was to have the direction and control of the erection, and the former's interests would be subject to a lien. Kremer v. Walton, 11 Wash. 120, 48 Am. St. Rep. 870, 39 Pac. 374, rehearing in 16 Wash. 139, 47 Pac. 238.

And where a son living with his father made improvements to a house, it was held in Cannon v. Helfrick, 99 Ind. 164, that, as the father knew all about the improvements when they were made, he could not afterward accept them as a gift from his son, freed from a lien for their payment. The son was not a tenant, and must be deemed, under the circumstances of the case, to be the agent of his father.

And where a tenant erected buildings upon leased property without authority from the landlord, but the landlord afterwards acknowledged the expense of erecting such buildings as a proper charge by the tenant against him, and settled with the tenant upon that basis, it was held in Scroggin v. National Lumber Co. 41 Neb. 195, 59 N. W. 548, that such facts constituted a ratification of the tenant's acts, and rendered the landlord's estate subject to a mechanics' lien arising out of such improvements.

There is a sharp conflict of authority as to whether, if the owner, in his contract with the lessee or vendee, requires the latter to make the improvements, he thereby constitutes him his agent within the meaning of the statute.

Thus, in Pinkerton v. Le Beau, 3 S. D. 440, 54 N. W. 97, it was held that a stipulation in a contract for the sale of land, that it was understood between the parties that tract of lease in writing obligated to make the improvements. Mr. Chief Justice Zane, at page 417, of 16 Utah, speaking for the court, said: "Doubtless statutes of other states may be found, giving a lien upon the interest of the lessor of land without a contract with him or his agent, when material or labor is furnished to the tenant, and employed with his consent in erecting buildings or making improvements on the land. But, as we have seen, the Utah statute, upon which the plaintiff must rely, requires the materials to be furnished or the services to be rendered upon the request of the owner of the land, or his agent, before the lien can arise upon his interest." It is thus held in that case that the landlord does not constitute the tenant his agent, so the vendee should erect a building upon the land, did not, of itself, constitute the vendee the agent of the vendor, within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, nor authorize the vendee to subject the land of the vendor to a lien for material furnished for a building contracted for by such vendee. The court said: "To subject the vendor's interest in the land to a lien under a contract for material or labor, made by the vendee, it must clearly appear that such vendee is the agent of the vendor, authorized by such vendor to bind his interest in the land for the payment of the debt. He must be an actual, as contradistinguished from a constructive, agent."

And to the same effect were the following decisions: Lapham v. Ransford, 27 Ohio C. C. 80; Morrow v. Merritt, 16 Utah, 412, 52 Pac. 667; Schrage v. Miller, 44 Neb. 818, 62 N. W. 1091; Northwest Bridge Co. v. Tacoma Shipbuilding Co. 36 Wash. 333, 78 Pac. 998.

A covenant in a lease that the lessee should make certain improvements at his own expense, and surrender the property at the end of the lease without charge to the lessor, was held in Albaugh v. Litho-Marble Decorating Co. 14 App. D. C. 113, not to constitute the lessee the agent of the lessor within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, so as to subject the latter's interest to a mechanics' lien.

And the Albaugh Case was cited with approval and followed in Langley v. D'Audigne, 31 App. D. C. 409, where it was held that a lease which provided the lessee might make certain improvements, and that a certain allowance therefor would be deducted from the rent, did not constitute the lessee the agent of the lessor, so as to subject his interests to a lien.

Under a statute providing for liens for labor and material furnished under a contract with the owner or his agent, it was held in Knapp v. Brown, 45 N. Y. 207, that a lessee has no power to bind the lessor's interest, notwithstanding the fact that the lease required the lessee to make the improvements, and the statute provided that, for the purposes of the act, any person or as to bind the landlord's interest in the land, by requiring the tenant to make permanent improvements upon the leased premises. There are many decisions wherein it is held that, where the owner of land, as lessor or vendor, requires his lessee or vendee to make improvements, permanent or otherwise, upon the premises demised or sold, this constitutes the lessee or vendee the agent of the owner for the purpose of purchasing the material or in procuring the labor in making the improvements, and subjects the interest of the owner in the premises to the statutory lien. The decision of this court above referred to, however, directly holds that under such circumstances, as between lessor and lessee, the interest of the lessor is not affected by such an alleged lien. Whether a different rule should apply in case a vendor requires his vendee to make improvements as part of the written contract of sale is not involved in this case, as there is no claim that, in the written contract of sale in this case, such a condition was imposed. In the case of Morrison, M. & Co. v. Clark, 20 Utah, 432, 77 Am. St. Rep. 924, 59 Pac. '235, the question was again before this court in another form, and it was there held that mere knowledge by the owner that improvements are made upon his land is insufficient to subject his interest therein to a mechanics' lien. The doctrine is, however, reaffirmed in the last case mentioned, that a mechanics' lien cannot be acquired upon land unless the labor is done or materials persons who may have sold or disposed of his or their lands upon an executory contract of purchase contingent upon the erection of buildings thereon shall be deemed the owner and his vendee the contractor, and said owner shall in all respects be subject to the provisions of the act. This is one of the very few cases in which a distinction is made between the authority of a vendee and that of a lessee to subject the owner's interests to a lien, and this point is not expressly noted in the opinion.

Where the owner of a mining claim entered into a written executory contract to sell a half interest in the claim upon the consideration that the vendee should expend a certain amount of money in developing the claim, it was held in Maher v. Shull, 11 Colo. App. 322, 52 Pac. 1115, that the vendee was neither the owner nor reputed owner or agent of the owner of the property, and no lien would attach to the owner's interest. The ultimate result in this case seems to be contrary to the other Colorado decisions, but the discussion is mainly confined to other questions.

On the other hand, there are a number of cases which hold that, if the owner requires his lessee or vendee to make improvements, the latter is thereby constituted his agent, with power to subject his interests to a lien.

Thus, in Dougherty-Moss Lumber Co. v. Churchill, 114 Mo. App. 578, 90 S. W. 405, the court said that it may be considered as settled that when a lessor contracts with his lessee for the making of improvements of substantial benefit to the estate of the former, materialmen and workmen who furnish material and labor in the construction of the improvement are entitled to liens for their unpaid accounts, which may be enforced against the estates of both lessor and lessee. And this decision was followed in a second appeal in 104 S. W. 478, and in Curtin-Clark Hardware Co. v. Churchill, 126 Mo. App. 462, 104 S. W. 476. And to the same effect was the decision in Philip Gruner & Bros. Lumber Co. v. Jones, 71 Mo. App. 110.

Ingersoll, 14 Colo. App. 240, 59 Pac. 970, the court said: "Miners who work for lessees may not have a lien on the property of the lessor simply because they were hired by the lessee and worked on the property. There must be some showing to the point that the owner of the realty was in some manner obligated, either because he was a privy and party to the contract of employment, or because in some other way than by the lease he authorized the lessee to contract, or because the agreement, by its terms, gave the lessee authority."

So, in O'Leary v. Roe, 45 Mo. App. 587, under a contract between the vendor and the purchaser, the latter was, within ninety days, to build upon the lots and obtain a first loan upon the same, with the improvements thereon, with which to make the first of the deferred payments of the purchase money; and the court held that the only fair and reasonable construction to be placed upon this provision of the contract was that the purchaser was authorized and empowered by the vendor to enter into contracts with the builders to furnish material and erect the buildings, or any part thereof, on the lots to which he had the legal title.

Under a statute providing that a lien will attach where the work is done or material is furnished at the instance of the owner or of any other person acting by his authority as agent, contractor, or otherwise, it was held in Shapleigh v. Hull, 21 Colo. 419, 41 Pac. 1108, that a mechanics' lien would attach to the interests of a vendor where the contract of sale expressly required the vendee to make the improvements in question. To the same effect were the decisions in Colorado Iron Works v. Taylor, 12 Colo. App. 451, 55 Pac. 942, writ of error dismissed in 33 Colo. 179, 80 Pac. 129; Hendrie & B. Mfg. Co. v. Holy Cross Gold Min. & Mill. Co. 17 Colo. App. 341, 68 Pac. 785. Whether the rule asserted in these cases would apply in the case of a lessee where the lease required him to make certain improvements was questioned, but not determined, in Antlers Park Regent Min.

are furnished at the instance of the owner or of some person acting by his authority.

It is, however, contended by appellant, that it appears from the testimony of Mrs. Condon that she expected that the Beckers would build upon and improve the property, and that hence the authority from her to bind her interest in the property is implied. In this connection it is also insisted that the appellant is not limited by the terms of a written agreement which may bind the parties to it only, but that he may show any parol agreement between Mrs. Condon and Mr. Becker from which the authority from her to him to purchase material to improve the property may directly appear or be inferred. This contention, in our judgment, is sound. The real question involved in such case is to establish the relation of principal and agent between the vendor and purchaser. If, therefore, the person furnishing material which is purchased for the improvement of certain property can show that the purchaser of the material was the agent of the real owner of the property, the agency may be established in such a case precisely as it may be in any other case. But the evidence in such a case must establish agency. Without this there can be no authority in the person purchasing the material to bind the owner of the property, who is the principal. This is well illustrated in the case of Sheehy v. Fulton, 38 Neb. 691, 41 Am. St. Rep. 767, 57 N. W. 395,—a case upon which appellant strongly relies. The principle stated above

Co. v. Cunningham, 29 Colo. 284, 68 Pac. 226.

In Nebraska the statute provided for liens made by virtue of a contract or agreement, express or implied, with the owner or his agents, and under this statute it was held in Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Kountze, 30 Neb. 719, 12 L.R.A. 33, 46 N. W. 1123, that where a vendee of real estate, under a contract of sale which contained a stipulation that the purchaser should construct a building upon the premises, erected a building thereon, the laborers and materialmen were entitled to a lien against the premises paramount to the lien of the vendor. And this decision is cited with approval and followed by numerous other Nebraska cases. Mill-sap v. Ball 30 Neb. 728, 46 N. W. 1125; Irish v. O'Hanlon, 34 Neb. 786, 52 N. W. 695; Sheehy v. Fulton, 38 Neb. 691, 41 Am. St. Rep. 767, 57 N. W. 395; Fuller v. Pauley, 48 Neb. 138, 66 N. W. 1115; West v. Reeves, 53 Neb. 472, 73 N. W. 935; Guiou v. Ryckman, 77 Neb. 833, 124 Am. St. Rep. 877, 110 N. W. 759.

And the vendor in an executory contract for the sale of land will subject his rights in the property to be conveyed to a mechanics' lien by directly, though in conjunction with the vendee, contracting for improvements for the construction of which the mechanics' lien is sought to be enforced. Pickens v. Plattsmouth Invest. Co. 37 Neb. 272, 55 N. W. 947.

A lessor who not only consented to the making of the improvements, but bound the lessee to make them, and expressly agreed to pay for the same by deducting the cost thereof from the rent, thereby made the lessee his agent. Whitcomb v. Gans (Ark.) 119 S. W. 676.

So, where a vendor required a vendee to build upon the premises, and knew that he was so doing, it was held in Janes v. Osborne, 108 Iowa, 409, 79 N. W. 143, that the vendor's interest would be subjected to a lien, as he had made the vendee his agent, within the meaning of the statute.

In Eaman v. Bashford, 4 Ariz. 199, 37 Pac. 24, it was held that the lessee of a mine, who, by the terms of his lease, was 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to make certain improvements at his own expense, and was to turn over to the lessor the entire net proceeds for six months, and a percentage thereafter, which improvements and payments were to be forfeited to the lessor in case the lessee failed to purchase the mine,—had charge and control of the mine within the meaning of a statute which provided that a person who was in "charge and control" of mines should be deemed the agent of the owner, with power to subject the property to mechanics' liens.

But where persons were merely given the right to take possession of land for the purpose of building on it at their own expense, but were under no obligation to exercise the right, it was held in Westport Lumber Co. v. Harris, 131 Mo. App. 94, 110 S. W. 609, that they had no authority to subject the owner's interests to a lien.

Where statute gives lien for improvements made with consent of owner.

A provision quite frequently found in mechanics' lien statutes is that materialmen and mechanics are entitled to liens for material or labor furnished with the "consent" of the owner. If the consent is express, of course, the right to the lien is plain; but in many cases the consent, if any, can only be inferred from the attending circumstances.

—circumstances from which consent is not inferred.

A number of cases hold generally that mere knowledge of the owner that improvements are being made by a lessee or vendee, and acquiescence therein, do not show the statutory consent. Ottwell v. Watkins, 15 Daly, 308, 6 N. Y. Supp. 518, affirmed in 125 N. Y. 706, 26 N. E. 752; Havens v. West Side Electric Light & P. Co. 49 N. Y. S. R. 771, 20 N. Y. Supp. 704, affirmed in 143 N. Y. 632, 37 N. E. 827; Moore v. McLaughlin, 11 App. Div. 477, 42 N. Y. Supp. 256; McCauley v. Hatfield, 59 N. Y. S. R. 552, 28 N. Y. Supp. 648; Hayes v. Fessenden, 106 Mass. 228; Courtemanche v. Blackstone Valley Street R. Co. 170 Mass.

is illustrated and applied in that case. The mere expectation by the owner and vendor of the land that the purchaser will make improvements upon it, and in that way enhance its value, is not sufficient to establish the relation of principal and agent between the vendor and vendee. Nor do we think that mere permission by the vendor to the vendee to make improvements would be sufficient; and certainly mere knowledge or acquiescence on the part of the owner is not sufficient under our statute. In the case last above cited, at page 696 of 38 Neb., in referring to the subject-matter now under consideration, the supreme court of Nebraska uses the following language: "When one sells land to another, and places that other in possession, in the absence of any restrictive covenants, there is always an implied license that the vendee may make improvements on the land. The expression of direct authority to do so, independent of other circumstances, would not charge the vendor's estate." It requires no argument to establish the soundness of the principle enunciated in the foregoing statement. No doubt, when one purchases land of any kind, he has at least the implied power to improve it in his own way. If he does so upon his own responsibility, it is not easy to perceive how, in the absence of an express statute, he thereby binds the owner of the title for the value of the improvements. Nor do we think it changes the rule if the owner either expresses his assent to the making of the improvements, or per-

50, 64 Am. St. Rep. 275, 48 N. E. 937; Saunders v. Bennett, 160 Mass. 48, 39 Am. St. Rep. 456, 35 N. E. 111.

So, it was held in Gray v. Walker, 16 S. C. 143, that the bare knowledge of the agent of the owner that the plaintiff was employed on the house did not amount to a consent by the owner in the sense of the act, which would impose a lien upon her property and subject it to the stringent provisions thereof. The court defined "consent," within the meaning of the statute, as follows: "Consent here, we think, implies something more than a mere acquiescence in a state of things already in existence. It implies an agreement to that which, but for the consent, could not exist, and which the party consenting has a right to forbid." And to the same effect was the decision in Geddes v. Bowden, 19 S. C. 1.

Consent of the owner will not be implied from the fact that his agents visited the premises while the improvements were being made, for the purpose of collecting rents. Sekir v. Krizer, 48 Misc. 25, 96 N. Y. Supp. 74.

The fact that the owner remarked to the workman, employed by the lessee that she hoped he would do her a good job, and that the same kind of work would be done on all the houses, does not show consent. Eichler v. Warner, 46 Misc. 246, 91 N. Y. Supp. 793.

A landlord who merely recommended a mechanic to his tenant, who was about to make repairs at his own expense, in consideration of a reduction in his rent, and who expressed satisfaction with the manner in which the work was being done, did not thereby give statutory consent. Hedlund v. Payne, 60 Misc. 603, 113 N. Y. Supp. 841.

A general covenant on the part of the tenant to keep the premises in repair does not constitute consent on the part of the landlord. Ætna Elevator Co. v. Deeves, 67 Misc. 632, 108 N. Y. Supp. 718, affirmed in 125 App. Div. 842, 110 N. Y. Supp. 124. The court said: "We think the statute requires either that the particular repairs be specifically provided for in the lease, or that the owner shall expressly consent to or request the particular repairs made, or that, with a knowledge of the employment and its purposes, he acquiesces therein."

So, in Jones v. Manning, 25 N. Y. S. R. 771, 6 N. Y. Supp. 338, the court said: "The mere consent of the owner of the fee that his tenant for a term of years may improve the premises by erecting buildings thereon, or repairing those already constructed, does not obligate him, either legally or morally, to pay for the same. The tenant had the right to make the repairs without the consent of his lessors, and it is absurd to claim that the approval of the act of their tenant in this respect amounted to a consent on their part that their title might be charged with the cost of the repairs, if the tenant failed to keep his promise to pay the contractor therefor."

A mere general consent or requirement on the part of the owner that the lessee may or shall, at his own expense, make alterations and repairs to the premises, does not constitute "consent" within the meaning of the lien law. Ætna Elevator Co. v. Deeves, 125 App. Div. 842, 110 N. Y. Supp. 124; Garber v. Spivak, 114 N. Y. Supp. 762, second appeal 119 N. Y. Supp. 269.

A provision in a lease that the tenant shall make all the repairs at his own expense does not imply the consent required by the statute. Berger Mfg. Co. v. Zabriskie, 75 N. Y. Supp. 1038.

So, a lessee whose lease authorizes him to make repairs at his own expense cannot subject the lessor's interests to a mechanics' lien. Conant v. Brackett, 112 Mass. 18.

So, a mere general agreement to the effect that a third person may, at his own expense, make alterations in a building occupied by him, does not, without more, amount to the statutory consent. Hankinson v. Vantine, 152 N. Y. 20, 46 N. E. 292.

Where there was no agreement in the lease or contemporaneous with it, binding the tenants to build a mill on the premises or make other improvements, it was held in J. B. Alfsee Mfg. Co. v. Henry, 96 Wis. 327, 71 N. W. 370, that the lessor's interest would not be subject to a lien for the improvements, although the landlord made advances for certain improvements which

Y. 556, 85 N. E. 1106, affirming the decision of the appellate division (116 App. Div. 535, 101 N. Y. Supp. 502), which is included in the earlier note.

So, in Cook v. Goodyear, 79 Wis. 606, 48 N. W. 860, it was held that one who entered into a contract with the owner of premises, whereby he was to cut, log, and saw certain timber, and for that purpose was to erect a sawmill on the premises, had such an interest in the premises as to subject them to a mechanics' lien for the material for the mill, where it was built with the full knowledge and consent of the owner.

And in Edwards & M. Lumber Co. v. Mosher, 88 Wis. 672, 60 N. W. 264, it was held that where the vendor required the erection of a building, and title to it as well as to the lot was to be retained as security for the purchase money, the vendor's interest would be subject to a lien. And this decision was cited with approval and followed in Bentley v. Adams, 92 Wis. 386, 66 N. W. 505, in which case the improvements were made by a lessee whose lease required him to make the improvements.

In Schuyler v. Hayward, 67 N. Y. 253, it was held that the result of a statute which expressly provided that, for the purposes of the act, any person who might have sold or disposed of lands upon an executory contract of sale contingent upon the erection of a building thereon should be considered the owner, and the vendee the contractor, was the same as that accomplished in other statutes giving a lien wherever buildings are erected upon lands with the consent of the owner.

Where there was evidence sufficient to support the finding of the court that the owner consented to the contract of the tenant for the erection of the building, it was held in Butler v. Flynn, 51 App. Div. 225, 64 N. Y. Supp. 877, that the land would be held subject to the lien. The court said that the consent clause in the statute proceeded upon the equitable principle that one who knowingly receives the benefit of labor or property of another in the form of improvements upon his land ought to have his property subjected to a lien for the value of such improvements. And this case was cited with approval and followed in Fischer v. Jordan, 54 App. Div. 621, 66 N. Y. Supp. 286, affirmed in 169 N. Y. 615, 62 N. E. 1095.

A complaint which alleged that the defendant was the owner of the fee of the premises, had full knowledge of the work, and consented to the same, was held to be good on demurrer in Ross v. Simon, 16 Daly, 159, 9 N. Y. Supp. 536, 10 N. Y. Supp. 742.

Where a vendor took back the premises upon the contract of sale being surrendered, it was held in Kerrick v. Ruggles, 78 Wis. 274, 47 N. W. 437, that he took it back subject to a lien for improvements made by the vendee with the vendor's full knowledge and consent.

In Engfer v. Roemer, 71 Wis. 11, 36 N. W. 618, it was held that a lessor was not liable for a lien for improvements put on the premises without his authority, knowledge, or consent.

Where there was nothing to justify a holding that a vendor was to advance money or give credit to enable the vendee to build a house on the land, it was held in Perkins v. Davis, 120 Mass. 408, that the vendee could not subject the vendor's interest to a lien which, upon the sale of the property to the vendee, would be superior to a mortgage given back as a part payment of the premises.

A lien will not attach to land for work furnished to one who had contracted to buy; and a lien for work furnished after the deed passed will not be superior to a mortgage given for the purchase money and for advances for the improvements, where there was nothing from which to imply consent other than the advances. Ettridge v. Bassett, 136 Mass. 314.

And in Morse v. Dole, 73 Me. 351, it was held that a mechanics' lien for materials or labor furnished to a mortgagor in possession did not affect the rights of a prior mortgagee, where the latter was not a party to the delivery of the materials nor to the work done, by consent either tacitly or expressly given.

A lien creditor cannot attach, as personal property of the vendee, a building erected by one who made a verbal purchase of land, partly paid for it, and erected the building, where there was no agreement between him and the owner that the building was to remain the property of the builder. Dustin v. Crosby, 75 Me. 75.

Where a lease provided that the structure to be erected by a lessee was to remain his property, it was held in Johnson v. Alexander, 23 App. Div. 538, 48 N. Y. Supp. 541, that no lien would attach to the land.

In Miller v. Schmitt, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1077, it was held that the assent of two owners that their common vendee might use the adjoining lots as one piece of land by constructing one building across both, and that the plaintiff might furnish material towards the erection of such structure, sufficiently charged the property with the plaintiff's lien.

Where a lease forbade the lessee to make any improvements or alterations without the consent of the owner on pain of forfeiture and liability for damages, it was held in Hankinson v. Vantine, 152 N. Y. 20, 46 N. E. 292, that the purpose of a written consent by the owner that the lessee might make certain improvements at his own expense was merely to avoid a forfeiture of the lease, and did not constitute consent within the meaning of the lien law.

In Hartley v. Murtha, 36 App. Div. 196, 56 N. Y. Supp. 686, where the lease contained similar provisions, the court recognized the rule in Hankinson v. Vantine, supra, and held that no consent was shown where the lease provided for certain specific improvements to be made by the lessee upon certain conditions precedent, and the conditions had not been fulfilled.

In Wheeler v. Hall, 41 Wis. 447, it was held that where one in actual possession of premises, with the full knowledge, approbation, and consent of the owner, employed the plaintiff to construct improvements, and he did so, the owner would be personally liable, and therefore the premises upon which the work was done would be subject to a mechanics' lien for such work. This decision, however, is based rather upon the equitable principle that, if one accepts or knowingly avails himself of the benefit of services done for him without his authority or request, he shall be held to pay for them.

But the Wheeler Case was criticized in Lauer v. Bandow, 43 Wis. 556, 28 Am. Rep. 571, where it was held that a lien did not attach to a wife's property for improvements made by the husband in his own name, and not as agent for his wife.

And in Leismann v. Lovely, 45 Wis. 420, it was held, following Lauer v. Bandow, supra, that one might contract for an improvement upon the land of another which he was cultivating for some advantage of his own, without charging the owner for its payment.

Statutes giving liens for improvements made with the permission of the owner.

Some statutes give a mechanics' lien against the property of an owner who knowingly permits improvements to be made thereon; the general intent of such a statute does not, of course, materially differ from those giving liens for improvements made with the "consent" of the owner. Under such a statute, the property of a lessor who consents to improvements being made by a lessee, which are to revert to the lessor, will be subject to a lien therefor. R. Haas Electric & Mfg. Co. v. Springfield Amusement Park Co. 236 Ill. 452, post, 620, 127 Am. St. Rep. 297, 86 N. E. 248.

And in West v. Pullen, 88 Ill. App. 620, it was held that a mechanics' lien would attach to the fee where the owner permitted his agent to sell the same by verbal contract, and the vendee caused buildings to be erected thereon.

Knowledge and consent amount to "permission" within the meaning of such a statute. Rollin v. Cross, 45 N. Y. 766; Le Forgee v. Colby Bros. 69 Ill. App. 443.

But in McRae v. Murdoch Campbell Co. 94 Ill. App. 105, it was held that mere knowledge on the part of the owner that the work was being done, and failure upon his part to forbid it or expressly to disclaim any responsibility for it, were not sufficient to subject his interests.

And in McGraw v. Godfrey, 16 Abb. Pr. N. S. 358, it was held that a lien could not be acquired for work and materials furnished under a contract with the equitable owner as against one holding the legal title, unless the work or material was furnished with the latter's permission. And a verbal contract to convey land does not of itself show the permission of the owner to erect buildings thereon. Conklin v. Bauer, 62 N. Y. 620.

—improvements required by owner in lease or contract of sale.

Under such a statute it was held in Hackett v. Badeau, 63 N. Y. 476, that a condition in a contract of sale that the vendee shall build upon the premises implies the permission of the owner.

And in Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones, 187 Ill. 203, 58 N. E. 347, where a lease provided for the erection of a building by the lessee, which was to become the property of the lessor upon the termination of the lease, it was held that such a contract amounted to authority or consent from the owner to make the improvements, and, in the absence of some stipulation in the agreement to the contrary, to give a lien upon the interests of the owner for material furnished or labor performed under contracts with the vendee or lessee. The court said: "In fact, it is impossible to see how it can reasonably be said that one who agrees with another that he shall place buildings or other improvements upon certain property does not thereby 'authorize or knowingly permit' the other to improve that property."

So, also, in Crandall v. Sorg, 198 Ill. 48, 64 N. E. 769, second appeal, in 233 Ill. 79, 84 N. E. 181, it was held that where a lease required or authorized the lessee to construct improvements on the demised premises, the estate of the lessor was liable to liens therefor. And to the same general effect were the decisions in Brokaw v. Tylor, 91 Ill. App. 148; Wells v. Sherwin, 92 Ill. App. 282; Hughes v. McCasland, 122 Ill. App. 365.

And in Hart v. Wheeler, 1 Thomp. & C. 403, it was held that when an owner of land agrees to sell to another, and advances him money with which to build upon the premises sold, and after the completion of the houses the builder is to secure the purchase price and the advances by a mortgage, the vendee builds by permission of the owner, and the property is chargeable with the lien. And this decision was cited with approval and followed in Gates v. Whitcomb, 6 Thomp. & C. 341.

The fact that a written contract to convey, with conditions requiring the vendee to build, was never executed, was held in Hobby v. Day, 22 N. Y. S. R. 92, 3 N. Y. Supp. 900, to be no defense to an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien upon the vendor's interests, where the materials were furnished with the vendor's knowledge and consent, and he had had the benefit thereof.

Statute giving liens for improvements made with the written consent of the owner.

A provision in a contract of sale or in a lease, which permits or requires the vendee or lessee at his own expense to make improvements, is not a "written consent" within the meaning of statutes giving liens for improvements made with the written consent of the owner.

Thus, a lease authorizing the lessee to make improvements, which were to be left at the end of the term, was held in McKown v. Harris, 15 Pa. Dist. R. 611, to be insufficient to charge the lessor's interest for improvements under a statute which required that consent given by the owner to the tenant to improve the leased property must appear in writing, signed by the owner, to the effect that such improvement was in fact made for his immediate use and benefit.

And a covenant by a lessor with a lessee that the latter is to make improvements at his own expense, and not at the expense of the lessor, is not a "written consent" to improvements, such as will bind the interests of the lessor. McClintock v. Criswell, 67 Pa. 183. And to the same effect was the decision in Boteler v. Espen, 99 Pa. 313, where the obligation of the lessee to make the repairs at his own expense was not expressly contained in the lease, but was clear and undoubted from all the circumstances of the case.

So, in Currier v. Cummings, 40 N. J. Eq. 145, 3 Atl. 174, it was held that a lease which provided that all improvements made by the lessee should become the property of the lessor at the close of the term, and that the lessor would convey the property to the lessee upon certain conditions at any time during the year, did not amount to the written consent by the owner to the improvements required by the mechanics' lien law to give the lessee the power to subject the lessor's interests to a lien.

And an agreement to convey containing a condition that the vendee will build is not a written consent of the owner, within the meaning of the statute. Jersey Co. v. Davison, 29 N. J. L. 415.

So, in Hervy v. Guy, 42 N. J. L. 168, it was held that an executory contract of sale by which the vendor required the vendee to make certain repairs at his own expense, and permitted him to make certain improvements, also at his own expense, was not a written consent within the terms of the statute. But where the contract shows that the vendor is to pay for the improvements, the vendor's consent will be implied. Young v. Wilson, 44 N. J. L. 157.

In Luigart v. Lexington Turf Club (Ky.) 113 S. W. 814, it was held that knowledge and verbal consent of the lessor to improvements by the lessee do not satisfy the requirements of the statute which gives a mechanics' lien for improvements made "by contract with, or by the written consent of, the owner."

Statutes giving liens where owner, with knowledge of the improvement, fails to give notice of nonliability.

The California statute provides that improvements made upon premises with the knowledge of the owner shall be deemed to be made at his instance, and his interests shall be subject to a lien therefor, unless the owner shall give notice of nonliability, as prescribed by the statute.

Under this statute it has been held that 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a lien attached where improvements were made by a lessee, and the owner, with knowledge of the improvements, failed to give the statutory notice of nonliability. West Coast Lumber Co. v. Newkirk, 80 Cal. 275, 22 Pac. 231; Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. 686; Santa Monica Lumber & Mill Co. v. Hege, 119 Cal. 376, 51 Pac. 555; Birch v. Magic Transit Co. 139 Cal. 496, 73 Pac. 238.

So, too, where the improvements were made by a vendee. Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 619, 22 Am. St. Rep. 272, 25 Pac. 919; Hamilton v. Delhi Min. Co. 118 Cal. 148, 50 Pac. 378.

In Fuquay v. Stickney, 41 Cal. 583, the court said: "If the owner of land . . . knowingly permits buildings and improvements to be erected on it without giving notice that it is done without his consent, it is eminently just that he shall be held to have acquiesced in it."

And where the lease provided that the lessee might, at his own expense, make improvements, which, in certain contingencies, would revert to the lessor, it was held in Evans v. Judson, 120 Cal. 282, 52 Pac. 585, that the lessor would be chargeable with notice of any improvements which the lessee might make. And to the same effect was the decision in Hines v. Miller, 122 Cal. 517, 55 Pac. 401.

So, in Ah Louis v. Harwood, 140 Cal. 500, 74 Pac. 41, it was held that an agreement by the owner with a lessee or conditional purchaser that improvements must be made at his cost, and that the lessor would not be liable for labor or materials, would not protect the land from the lien, where the lessor knew of the proposed work, and failed to post the statutory notice.

And in Stevenson v. Woodward, 3 Cal. App. 754, 86 Pac. 990, it was held that where an improvement is constructed in such a manner as to affix it to the real property, and the laborer has no information that it will be regarded otherwise, he may assume that he is making an improvement upon real property, and the right of lien will attach.

And in Helps v. Maxwell's Creek Gold Min. Co. 49 Cal. 336, it was held that where the president of a corporation visited the premises while the repairs were being made, it was prima facie sufficient to charge the corporation with knowledge, and to subject its interests to a lien for the improvements. But the knowledge of a director who has not the management or control of a corporation's business other than as director is not the knowledge of the corporation. Lothian v. Wood, 55 Cal. 159.

Although repairs to leased premises were made at the instance of a lessee, and not at the instance of the lessor, it was held in Gould v. Wise, 18 Nev. 253, 3 Pac. 30, under a statute similar to the one in California, that the lessor's interest would be subject to a lien therefor if, with full knowledge of the fact that the improvements were being made, the lessor failed to give the statutory notice of nonliability.

Where, among other provisions, the lien law provided that improvements made with the knowledge of the owner should be held to have been made by his authority unless he should, within a certain time, give a specified notice, it was held in John Martin Lumber Co. v. Howard, 49 Minn. 404, 52 N. W. 34, that a lien would attach for improvements made by a vendee, where there was no express agreement that the vendee should build, but only an implied understanding.

So, a mechanics' lien will attach to the interest of a tenant in common where she authorized the vendee to make the improvements, and failed to post the statutory notice of nonliability, as she must thereby be deemed to have had knowledge of the improvements; but the lien will not attach to the interest of a tenant in common who had no knowledge of the improvements. See ly v. Neill, 37 Colo. 198, 86 Pac. 334.

Minnesota statutes.

In Minnesota the statute, although apparently broad enough to give a lien for any improvements, no matter by whom caused, has been construed to provide for liens for such improvements as are made with the consent and authority of the owner. O'Neil v. St. Olaf's School, 26 Minn. 329, 4 N. W. 47; Meyer v. Berlandi, 39 Minn. 438, 1 L.R.A. 777, 12 Am. St. Rep. 663, 40 N. W. 513.

That the work or material was furnished under a contract with a vendee who held nothing but an invalid agreement with his vendor, it having been furnished with the assent and knowledge and at the instance of the vendor, cannot be allowed to affect the laborer's or materialman's right to a lien. Althen v. Tarbox, infra; Little v. Willford, 31 Minn. 173, 17 N. W. 282.

And in Hill v. Gill, 40 Minn. 441, 42 N. W. 294, where, in a contract of sale with an agreement to convey real estate, the vendee was required to erect a dwelling house upon the premises within a specified period of time, and before he would become entitled to receive a deed therefor, it was held that this contract of sale authorized the vendee to enter into a contract for materials with which to build the house, and that the materialmen were entitled to a lien against the premises and against all of the right, title, and interest of the vendor therein upon the day the lien attached, together with an interest subsequently acquired by reason of the vendee's surrender to said vendor of all claim to the property. To the same effect were the decisions in Hickey v. Collom, 47 Minn. 565, 50 N. W. 918, and Althen v. Tarbox, 48 Minn. 18, 31 Am. St. Rep. 616, 50 N. W. 1018.

But in Nolander v. Burns, 48 Minn. 13, 50 N. W. 1016, it was held that, under an amendment to the law, the rule in Hill v. Gill would not apply where there was no evidence of a surrender or forfeiture of the vendee's rights. The court said: "By specially providing for a lien where there has been a forfeiture or surrender, and in such cases declaring that the vendor shall be regarded as the owner of the building, and the vendee his contractor, within the meaning of the lien statute, the lawmakers have declared, by implication, but beyond doubt, that, until there has been a forfeiture or a surrender of the contract, the vendor shall not be held to be the owner of the building which has been placed upon the real property, nor shall the vendee be deemed his contractor under the act. The result of this legislation with respect to executory contracts of sale has been to deprive quite a numerous class of mechanics and materialmen of the benefits of the statute providing for liens for work done and materials furnished, who would have been entitled thereto under the doctrine established in Hill v. Gill."

And in Wheaton v. Berg, 50 Minn. 525, 52 N. W. 926, it was held that the same provision in the statute applied only to contracts of sale in which there was an express requirement for improvements; and a vendee could not subject the vendor's interests to a lien for such improvements where the contract provided only that all improvements should become the property of the vendor. And to the same general effect was the decision in Brown v. Jones, 52 Minn. 484, 55 N. W. 54, which arose out of the same transaction.

And in Congdon v. Cook, 55 Minn. 1, 56 N. W. 253, it was held that the language, "the owner or person having or claiming any interest," found in § 5 of the lien law of 1889, must be held to include lessors of land improved by the lessee; and unless the notice required by the same section is given, or the omission is reasonably accounted for or explained, the estate of the lessor may be bound by liens given by that act, subject to the limitation in respect to "repairs" in the proviso of the same section.

But in Boyd v. Blake, 42 Minn. 1, 43 N. W. 485, it was held that where the affidavit and statement filed to secure the lien did not show that the building was constructed by virtue of any requirement in the contract between the vendor and the vendee, nor show in any way authority in the vendee to charge the vendor's interest in the land, no lien would attach.

Miscellaneous cases.

In Lynam v. King, 9 Ind. 3, where a section of the statute read as follows: "The provisions of this article shall only extend to work done or materials furnished on new building, or to a contract entered into with the owner of any building for repairs, and not to any contract made with the tenant,"—it was held that a new building erected by a tenant would subject the interests of the landlord to a lien therefor.

And under a similar statute it was held in Wilkerson v. Rust, 57 Ind. 172, that a mechanics' lien would not attach to the interests of the landlord by a contract with the tenant for repairs to the building, and the fact that the repairs were made with the knowledge and consent of the landlord did not affect the question. And to the same effect was the decision in Baylies v. Sinex, 21 Ind. 45.

A tenant at will, without a lease, cannot subject the owner's interests to a lien, under a statute which provides for liens for labor or material furnished to lessees who have recorded their leases. Squires v. Fithian, 27 Mo. 134.

And a lessee cannot subject the owner's interests to a lien for buildings which are not removable by the lessee. Hammond v. Martin, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 570, 40 S. W. 347.

The fact that it was agreed that the vendee should erect a building upon the lot, and that the vendor agreed to advance him a specific sum of money for the construction of such building, was held in Faber v. Muir, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 27, 64 S. W. 938, not to be sufficient to subject the vendor's interests to a lien.

In Graham v. Williams, 9 Ont. Rep. 458, the owner in fee of certain property made a lease of the property for one year, with the privilege to the lessee to purchase at a fixed price, paying a certain sum down. Thereafter a new verbal contract was entered into between the lessor and the lessee, whereby the latter was to erect certain buildings, and the lessor was to advance, as the work proceeded, a certain proportion of the cost, and was to have a mortgage upon the property for whatever was advanced. The verbal contract was made before the expiration of the lease, and the buildings were not completed, nor was the purchase contemplated in the lease made. In an action to subject the owner's interest to a lien for the labor and materials furnished for the building, it was held that while it was difficult to understand the exact position of the parties, no lien could attach for the labor and materials furnished, as they were not furnished with the privity and consent of the owner. The court said that something more than mere knowledge of the work being done was required to bind the owner. The court proceeded upon the theory that the owner must be considered as the landlord, and that the privity and assent required by the statute must be in pursuance of an agreement.

But in Blight v. Ray, 23 Ont. Rep. 415, it was held that the decision in the Graham Case was not to be extended beyond the particular facts arising in that case; and, as a general rule, the vendor's interests will be subjected to a lien for improvements which he contracted that the vendee should erect.

In Garing v. Hunt, 27 Ont. Rep. 149, it was held that a clause in a lease providing that the lessee should make certain repairs, and deduct the cost thereof from the rent, would not subject the owner's interest to a lien for such repairs.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

v.

SPRINGFIELD AMUSEMENT PARK COMPANY et al., Appts.

(236 Ill. 452, 86 N. E. 248.)

Mechanics' lien — knowingly permitting.

1. A property owner who gives his consent to the lessee's placing improvements on the property which are to become his at the expiration of the lease knowingly permits them to be made, within the meaning of a statute giving a mechanics' lien against the property of one who knowingly permits improvements to be made thereon, and, if he does not limit the character or cost of the improvements, he will not be heard to complain that their cost is excessive or their character undesirable.

Same — apparatus — fixtures.

2. A provision in a mechanics' lien law that the lien shall not be defeated by lack of proof that the material, after delivery thereof, actually enters into the construction of the building, does not apply to fixtures, apparatus, or machinery, for which another section of the statute gives a lien, but it is necessary to show that such things are actually attached to the realty in such a manner as to enhance its value.

Same — meals — car fares.

3. No mechanics' lien for meals and street car tickets can be charged against a property owner under his agreement to permit his lessee to place improvements on the property.

Same — returns.

4. No mechanics' lien can be established against property for the price of carboys which, according to the contract under which they are delivered, are to be returned.

Same — payments — credits.

5. A credit on a bill for the items of which a mechanics' lien is claimed, for the price of material returned, will not be regarded as a general payment, which a court of equity will credit on nonlienable items so as to uphold a lien for the contract price of those which are lienable, which does not exceed in amount the sum unpaid on the contract.

Appeal — transactions subsequent to judgment.

6. Payment on account, made after the entry of a decree establishing a mechanics' lien, cannot be considered by the appellate court in determining the correctness of the decree.

Reference — exceptions — alteration of findings.

7. The court cannot add interest to an amount allowed by a master in chancery upon account, where no exceptions are filed to his findings.

Appeal — constitutional questions — first objection.

8. An objection to the constitutionality of a provision in a mechanics' lien law allowing attorneys' fees to the lienor's solicitor cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

Same — waiver — constitutional questions.

9. A constitutional question is waived by appealing to the appellate court rather than to the supreme court.

(October 26, 1908.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for Sangamon County, establishing a mechanics' lien. Reversed in part.

Statement by Vickers, J.:

This is a bill in chancery filed by the R. Haas Electric & Manufacturing Company (which will hereinafter be designated as the electric company) against the Springfield Amusement Park Company (which, for convenience, is hereinafter called the park company), the Peter Vredenburg Lumber Company (hereinafter called the lumber company), Thomas D. Hogan, F. Reisch & Brothers, and certain other parties, defendants, to enforce a mechanics' lien.

It appears from the bill that on the 2d day of March, 1906, the electric company entered into a contract with the park company by which the electric company contracted to furnish all labor and material for electric wiring, motors, accessories, plumbing, piping, etc., to be used in the Springfield Amusement Park Company's White City Park of Springfield, Illinois, to be located at the east end of Capitol avenue, now known as Reisch's park; that said materials and labor were to be furnished at the regular retail prices; that in consideration of this contract the electric company agreed to subscribe for $1,000 of the capital stock of the park company, to be paid for in material and labor, provided that such subscription did not exceed 40 per cent of the total amount of the materials and labor furnished by the electric company. The bill avers that, in pursuance of such contract, the electric company furnished all labor and materials for electric wiring, motors, accessories, plumbing, piping, etc., used in the said park company's White City Park, and complied in all respects with the said contract, and that such material and work had been accepted and used by the park company. The bill alleges that there is due the electric company $4,297.36, together with interest from July 5, 1906, at 5 per cent. To said bill the electric company attached a schedule, marked "Exhibit A," and made the same a part of the bill, which purports to be an itemized bill, the aggregate of which is the amount above stated. The several corporations and individuals that are made defendants to the bill are alleged to have or claim some interest in the premises, the precise nature of which is alleged to be unknown to the electric company. It is charged that the interest or claim of the several defendants, if any, is subject to the lien of the electric company, and that all of said parties defendant knowingly permitted the park company to contract for and receive and obtain the materials, labor, and improvements furnished by the electric company.

The lumber company answered the bill, neither admitting nor denying any of the facts upon which the electric company predicated its right to a lien, and prayed that strict proof might be required as to all such facts. The lumber company by its answer set up a claim for lien in its behalf for lumber and building materials furnished by said lumber company to the park company under a verbal agreement of April 30, 1906. The lumber company also agreed to subscribe for $1,000 of the capital stock of the park company, to be paid for in building material. To its answer the lumber company attached an itemized bill showing a balance due it of $5,926.19, for which sum the lumber company also claims a lien upon the premises described in the bill. The park company also answered the bill, in which it denied all of the material averments in the bill. F. Reisch & Brothers answered the bill, and disclaimed all knowledge of the alleged contract or the material furnished or work done thereunder, and demanded strict proof of the same. They set up in their answer that they have an interest in said premises as sublessors to the park company. Thomas D. Hogan filed an answer to the bill, in which he claims to be the owner in fee simple of the real estate described in the bill. He denies all the averments in the bill in so far as the same affect his interest. Replications to these several answers were filed, and the cause was referred to a master in chancery to take the proofs and report his findings.

In behalf of the electric company, Rudolph Haas, the president of the company, testified that under the contract offered in evidence the electric company furnished all motors, electric lights, wiring, and accessories, which were properly installed by labor furnished and paid for by the electric company, at the White City grounds at the end of East Capitol avenue; that the materials were furnished and work done in various buildings, such as the theater, roller coaster, and other buildings; that more or less work was done on all the buildings in the park. This witness states that the electric company complied with the contract and paid all workmen, subcontractors, and materialmen who did work for it under said contract, and that the park company owed the electric company $4,297.36, besides the interest, less the amount of stock subscribed for by the electric company.

Herman Armbruster, who superintended the electrical construction for the electric company, also testified on behalf of the complainant. This witness testifies that the work was done during June and July, 1906. In reference to the character of work done, this witness says: "We worked there on the entrance building—entrance gate—and put on the electrical sign 'White City.' That was put right in front of the entrance, on the woodwork there. We put the sign on two buildings, refreshment stands, pagodas, sign on the main stand, dancing pavilion, bridge, theater (interior and exterior), porch around the old building, additional lights in the kitchen and rear porch on the rear building, penny arcade, shooting gallery, bowling alley and pool, rough house, house of trouble, fun factory, cave of the winds, roller coaster, photograph gallery, Japanese bowling alley, three ice-cream-cone stands, throwing-the-ring stand, knock-the-baby-down stand, the outhouses, wiring for fourteen arcs in and around the park, putting up buffet sign on porch around old building, theater sign on theater, signs on the penny arcades, shooting gallery, bowling alley, house of trouble, fun factory, etc. We also decorated an actual tree, called the 'Christmas tree.' We wired that complete. We furnished three-light clusters at the entrance to the theater, and one five-light cluster at the band stand. The itemized statement attached to complainant's bill is complete. They were all delivered. I delivered most of them myself." This witness testifies also that during the time that this work was being installed, Thomas D. Hogan, the owner of the land, was frequently out there and witnessed the work going on, but that the witness had no conversation with him.

In addition to the testimony of these two witnesses, the electric company introduced a lease dated October 29, 1903, between Thomas D. Hogan and F. Reisch & Brothers for the 38.44 acres described in the bill, which lease is for five years from November 1, 1903, with the privilege of renewing for five years additional. The lease provides that the premises are to be occupied for saloon and park purposes, and for no other purposes whatever. The lease provides that the lessees are to keep the premises in good condition and repair and pay a rental of $75 per month. The lease provides that the lessee should not assign or sublet without the written consent of the lessor. Under date of April 1, 1906, there is a written consent, signed by Thomas D. Hogan, to the subletting of said premises to the said park company. The written consent to the subletting recites that the park company should have the right to make improvements on said premises, provided that all improvements, alterations, and additions made by the said company should remain on the premises at the expiration of the lease, for the benefit of the lessor. This was all the evidence offered by the electric company in support of its bill, except that proof of a solicitors' fee was made, and such fee allowed in the sum of $160.

On behalf of the lumber company evidence was offered proving that the lumber company furnished the material for which it claims a lien. There is no serious dispute about the lumber company's claim. There is some question in regard to the interest allowed the lumber company. Evidence was also submitted in regard to the amount of a reasonable solicitors' fee for the lumber company, and $125 was allowed as such fee.

Upon this evidence the master in chancery found that the electric company was entitled to a lien for $4,297.36, and that the lumber company was entitled to a lien for $4,111.73, after allowing credits, about which there is no dispute. Numerous objections were filed before the master by Hogan, F. Reisch & Brothers, and other defendants, all of which were overruled and allowed to stand, by agreement, as exceptions. The decree of the court sustained the master's report in all respects, and established a lien in favor of the electric company and the lumber company for the amounts, respectively, found due them by the master. The court, in its decree, allowed interest on the amount found to be due the lumber company, which was added by the court to the amount found due by the master, making the decree in favor of the lumber company $206.10 more than the amount found due by the master. To reverse this decree the park company, Thomas D. Hogan, and others sued out a writ of error from the appellate court for the third district, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed in all respects, except the appellate court modified the decree in regard to the interest allowed on the sum found due the lumber company by the master in chancery. The Springfield Amusement Park Company and others have appealed from the judgment of the appellate court to this court.

Mr. Albert Salzenstein and Messrs. Graham & Graham for appellants.

Mr. Alonzo Hoff and Messrs. Barber & Barber for appellees.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

First. Appellants' first and most serious contention is that the court erred in decreeing a lien against the interests of F. Reisch & Brothers and Thomas D. Hogan, appellants' contention being that only the interest of the park company should be subjected to a lien for these improvements.

Section 1 of the mechanics' lien law, as amended in 1903 (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1905, chap. 82, p. 1317, § 15), provides: "That any person who shall, by any contract or contracts, expressed or implied, or partly expressed and partly implied, with the owner of a lot or tract of land, or with one whom such owner has authorized or knowingly permitted to contract for the improvement of, or to improve the same, furnish materials, fixtures, apparatus, or machinery for the purpose of, or in the building, altering, repairing, or ornamenting any house or other building, . . . shall be known under this act as a contractor, and shall have a lien upon the whole of such lot or tract of land and upon the adjoining or adjacent lots or tracts of land of such owner constituting the same premises and occupied or used in connection with such lot or tract of land as a place of residence or business."

It will be noted that under the language of this statute the owner of a lot or tract of land may subject it to a lien by either making a contract himself or authorizing another to make such contract for him, or by knowingly permitting another to contract for the improvements upon his land. By reference to the evidence set out in the statement preceding this opinion, it will be seen that Thomas D. Hogan, as owner, expressly consented that the park company should have the right to make improvements on the described premises on condition that all improvements, alterations, and additions made by the company should remain on the premises at the expiration of the lease, for the benefit of the lessor. It is true that the particular contracts relied on as the basis of the liens in this proceeding are not referred to in the consent agreement of April 1, 1906. Indeed, there is nothing said in the consent agreement about contracts that might be made by the park company in connection with any improvements, alterations, or additions that such company might undertake to make. The writing signed by the owner authorized the park company to "make improvements on said described premises," which necessarily carries with it a permission to the park company to make such contracts for labor and materials as were reasonably necessary in the making of the authorized improvements. The authority given by the owner to the sublessee to make improvements is not limited, either as to the extent or character, by any language found in the writing. The owner, no doubt, might have specified the character of improvements to be placed on his land, and have limited the cost thereof, but in the case at bar the owner did not see proper to place any limitations whatever upon the power of the park company in this regard, and he will therefore not be heard to complain that the cost is excessive or the character of the improvements undesirable. The first section of the mechanics' lien law of 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 226) made the interest of the owner of the land subject to a lien for improvements "knowingly permitted."

In the case of Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones, 187 Ill. 203, 58 N. E. 347, this court held that a lessor who stipulates in the lease for the erection by the lessee of a building upon the demised premises, which is to become the property of the lessor upon the termination of the lease, by expiration or otherwise, subjects his title to mechanics' liens arising from the erection of the building, notwithstanding the lease provides, under a penalty of forfeiture, that the lessee shall permit no mechanics' liens to attach to the premises. In that case this court reviewed a number of decisions of this and other states, and the conclusion was there reached that one who agrees with another that he shall place buildings or other improvements upon certain property thereby authorizes or knowingly permits such other to improve the property, within the meaning of these terms as used in the mechanics' lien law then in force. It was also held in that case that the clause that the lessee "shall permit no mechanics' liens to attach to the premises" was merely a covenant on the part of the lessee that he would discharge such liens, and that such clause did not prevent the lien from attaching as between the owner and the party entitled thereto. This case has been reaffirmed in Crandall v. Sorg, 198 Ill. 48, 64 N. E. 769, and also in Sorg v. Crandall, 233 Ill. 79, 84 N. E. 181.

Under the rule laid down in the foregoing authorities, we are of the opinion that there was no error in holding that these improvements had been knowingly permitted by the owner of the fee.

Second. Appellants contend, under their second point, that many of the items in the respective bills were not for matters for must be determined in a court of review upon the record made in the trial court, and we cannot take into consideration facts dehors the record, that are only brought to our attention by the statement of counsel in their briefs; (2) the state of the record is such that it is impossible to separate the lienable from the nonlienable items, and until such items are separated we cannot tell what the amount of either is. There are no grounds here for the contention that the error of the trial court is cured by the application of payments to the items erroneously included in the decree.

Third. The master in chancery found the amount due the lumber company to be $4,111.73. The lumber company filed no objections to this finding. The circuit court found the amount due the lumber company to be $4,317.83, and rendered a decree for that amount. The court obtained the larger amount by the addition of $206.10 interest. The appellate court struck out the item of interest, and affirmed the decree in favor of the lumber company for $4,111.73. In this we think the appellate court is clearly right. The finding of the master in chancery is conclusive upon the parties as to all questions wherein the finding is not excepted to. Glos v. Hoban, 212 Ill. 222, 72 N. E. 1.

Upon evidence heard, an attorney fee of $125 was allowed the lumber company's solicitors. Since this case was heard in the appellate court, this court, in the case of Manowsky v. Stephan, 233 Ill. 409, 84 N. E. 365, has held that portion of the mechanics' lien act allowing attorney fees for the lienor's solicitors unconstitutional. No objection or exception to the allowance of attorney fees was made before the master or in the court below, nor was the constitutional question raised until the case reached this court. We are of the opinion that appellants have waived their right to raise this question by failing to raise it in the court below; and if it had been so raised, it would have been waived by taking the case to the appellate court instead of bringing it directly to this court.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed in all respects in so far as the same relates to the decree in favor of the lumber company, and in so far as it relates to the electric company, the decree of the Circuit Court and the judgment of the Appellate Court are reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Petition for rehearing denied December 4, 1908.

Lottery — distribution of lots.

The distribution by chance among the purchasers of lots of unequal value, which were purchased at a uniform price by citizens of a town, in consideration that the owner of the tract would erect a hotel building which would be of public benefit, is within the statute against lotteries and unenforceable against the purchasers, although such distribution was not part of the original scheme, and the vendor did not direct or make himself a party to the unlawful distribution, if the contracts of sale were with the individual purchasers, and were not to be complied with until the lots were selected, so that the method of selecting the lots was necessarily a part of the contract.

Case Note. — Distribution of parcels of land by chance as a lottery.

Where parcels of land of unequal value are to be distributed by lot among ticket holders or purchasers, they not being tenants in common, the transaction constitutes a lottery, notwithstanding each pays an equal price. Paulk v. Jasper Land Co. 116 Ala. 178, 22 So. 495; Elder v. Chapman, 176 Ill. 142, 52 N. E. 10, reversing 70 Ill. App. 288; Guenther v. Dewein, 11 Iowa, 133; Den ex dem. Wooden v. Shotwell, 24 N. J. The statute of 12 Geo. II., chap. 28, § 4, prohibited the sale of houses and lands by lottery. Fisher v. Bridges, 3 El. & Bl. 642.

Where a parcel of land is to be subdivided into lots which are to constitute prizes in a scheme of chance or a "gift enterprise," it constitutes a lottery. Hooker v. De Paolos, 28 Ohio St. 251.

So, where such portion of land is to be conveyed to one of sixty-six persons as shall fall to him by lot, it constitutes a lottery. Allebach v. Godshalk, 116 Pa. 329, 9 Atl. 444; Allebach v. Hunsicker, 132 Pa. 349, 19 Atl. 139.

And where weekly payments are made and weekly drawings by lot held for the distribution of city lots, by which the lucky member of the lot club gets his land for less than another member, it constitutes a lottery. Branham v. Stallings, 21 Colo. 211, 52 Am. St. Rep. 213, 40 Pac. 396.

So, where parcels of land are disposed of

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Benton County dismissing the complaints in consolidated suits to recover the purchase price of several lots and to foreclose alleged liens thereon. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Dick Rice for appellant.

Messrs. McGill & Lindsey, for appellees:

The scheme by which the lots were distributed was a lottery.

25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1637; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d. ed. p. 591; Lynch v. Rosenthal, 144 Ind. 86, 31 L.R.A. 835, 55 Am. St. Rep. 168, 42 N. E. 1103; Emshwiler v. Tyner, 21 Ind. App. 347, 69 Am. St. Rep. 360, 52 N. E. 459.

McCulloch, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At a mass meeting of citizens of Bentonville, Arkansas, the plaintiff, W. A. Burks, proposed, on condition that the citizens of Bentonville should, within fifteen days from that date, purchase from him, at the price of $50 per lot, 200 lots 50 by 150 feet in size each, to be surveyed and platted out of a certain tract of land adjoining said city of Ben-tonville, to erect near Spring Park, on a tract of land known as "Spring park addition," a hotel building of certain dimensions and capacity, and to make certain other improvements on the premises so as to make the place an attractive resort. The lots were to be selected after the plat should be made, and the same were to be paid for as follows: One half when the walls and roof of the hotel should be completed, and the balance when the whole improvements were completed. A committee was appointed by the assembled citizens to solicit purchasers in order to accept the plaintiff's proposition. The committee secured a large number of subscribers or purchasers, each agreeing to purchase a certain number of lots at the price named, and out of these the plaintiff selected 200, and they each executed to him an obligation in writing, which, after reciting the plaintiff's undertaking with respect to erecting the hotel building, etc., is as follows:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of the above agreement and the benefits arising to the undersigned and the citizens of Bentonville, and the further agreement that the said W. A. Burks is to execute and deliver, by a drawing, each ticket holder paying a designated sum therefor, the persons holding the first two tickets drawn paying nothing more for their lots, while the others are required to pay a greater sum, it constitutes a lottery. Marshall v. Platt, 8 U. C. C. P. 189.

A sale of lots to be drawn by purchasers, the advantages of location, character, size, or condition, as between lots of the same class, as arranged by prices marked, to be determined wholly by lot, with one prize lot to be given to some one of the purchasers as the result of chance, constitutes a lottery. Lynch v. Rosenthal, 144 Ind. 86, 31 L.R.A. 835, 55 Am. St. Rep. 168, 42 N. E. 1103.

In Emshwiler v. Tyner, 21 Ind. App. 347, 69 Am. St. Rep. 360, 52 N. E. 459, where several persons entered into a written contract to purchase town lots at a certain price each, which were to be distributed among the several purchasers in such a manner as might be agreed upon between them, and, after the lots were platted, the several purchasers and the vendor met together, and, under the direction of the vendor, a distribution was made by lot, it was held that, although the contract was valid in its inception, it was rendered unenforceable by reason of the manner of distribution, to which the vendor was a party, and it thereby became tainted with the vice of lottery.

But it was held in Lauder v. Peoria Agri. & Trotting Soc. 71 Ill. App. 475, that where parcels of land of equal value are apportioned to the purchasers by a designated committee, it does not constitute a lottery.

which were contracted for by promoters of a corporation were subscribed for under an agreement to take the number set opposite the name of each of the subscribers, to be apportioned among them in such manner as they should decide at a meeting held for the purpose of dividing the lots by a method to be decided upon by a vote of the subscribers, the plan of one of the promoters that the names were to be drawn out of one box and the numbers of the lots to correspond drawn out of another being adopted, it was held that the apportionment of the lots, which were worth more than the price paid, was by the subscribers alone, and did not constitute a lottery.

So, Washington Glass Co. v. Mosbaugh, 19 Ind. App. 105, 49 N. E. 178, where several persons had agreed to purchase town lots at a certain fixed value per lot, which were to be afterward laid out and platted by the vendor, and divided among the several purchasers in such manner as they might agree, and by mutual agreement they met and by lot apportioned the land among themselves without the vendor participating therein, it was held that the transaction did not constitute a lottery. The court said that it knew of no good reason why these purchasers did not have the right to divide their property, or that contracted for, according to their own notions and agreement.

And in McCleary v. Chipman, 32 Ind. App. 489, 68 N. E. 320, where a subscription to a manufacturing enterprise provided that the subscribers should each pay a certain amount and receive a city lot in a certain plat of land, the method of distribution to be determined upon and carried out by or cause to be executed and delivered, a warranty deed conveying to J. W. Harriss one lot, the particular location to be hereafter determined, each lot to be 50x150 feet, situate on the following described tract of land situate in Benton county, Arkansas, to wit: The S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 19, and the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 30, township 20, range 30, we, the undersigned, promise to pay the said W. A. Burks the sum of \$50 at the Fidelity Savings Bank & Loan Company, in the city of Bentonville, upon the following terms: One half of said sum when the walls of the said hotel building and roof thereon shall be completed, the remaining half to become due and payable when the said hotel, the dam and the six cottages, shall have been completed according to contract, and that this note shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent per annum from date when said payment shall fall due until paid."

The plaintiff then caused the tract of land in question to be surveyed and platted into 330 lots, out of which number the committee selected 200, to be conveyed to the purchasers as soon as it should be determined what particular lot or lots each purchaser should receive. These lots were of unequal value, some worth practically nothing, and some worth double the price named.

The committee decided to distribute or apportion the lots to the respective purchasers by a chance, each purchaser to take the lot drawn by him, and this plan was accepted and carried out. The plaintiff did not propose this plan, but he acquiesced in it and was present at the drawing. It was proposed and carried out by the committee who represented the citizens and purchasers. The plaintiff erected the proposed building and other improvements, and demanded payment from the purchasers of their respective obligations. He also executed and tendered to them deeds conveying the several lots apportioned to them in the drawing. Defendants Harriss, Armstrong, Crowell, Duckworth, Bates, Stevenson, Porter, Maxwell, Hildebranth, and Graham each declined to accept the lots so apportioned to them and refused to pay the price. The plaintiff instituted separate suits in equity against them to recover the several amounts due and to foreclose his alleged lien on the lots apportioned to them. These suits were consolidated and tried together, and a decree was rendered dismissing the complaint for want of equity, and the plaintiff appealed.

The defense asserted by each of the defendants was, among other things, that the scheme for the sale and distribution was a lottery, in violation of the law. "A lottery is a species of gaming, which may be defined as a scheme for the distribution of prizes by chance among persons who have paid, or agreed to pay, a valuable consideration for the chance to obtain a prize." 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1633.

The Constitution and statutes of this state make it unlawful to conduct a lottery, or to sell or otherwise dispose of lottery tickets, gift concert tickets, or the like. Const. 1874, art. 19, § 14; Kirby's Dig. §§ 1862, 1863. Contracts for the sale of tracts of land of unequal value, to be apportioned the subscribers, which was done by withdrawing an envelop containing a number of a lot from one box, and an envelop containing the name of a subscriber from another, it was held that the subscription was not illegal, as being in violation of the statute against lotteries.

So, it was said in Elder v. Chapman, supra, there is a broad distinction, however, between a division of property by lot and a lottery. A partition of property into parts as nearly equal as possible, where owned by joint owners, may be made, and determination had by lot as to which part shall go to each joint owner, severally, without coming within the prohibition of the lottery statute; as, the joint owners being seised of the whole estate before partition, and the object of the lot being to assign to each his particular portion, the whole having been previously divided into parts as nearly of equal value as possible, such partition would not constitute a lottery.

In Den ex dem. Wooden v. Shotwell, supra, the court apparently recognizes the validity of a distribution of land by lot among those who hold it as tenants in common.

Where a corporation was organized for the purpose of providing homes for its subscribers, its methods of operation being to acquire land and divide it among its subscribers by lot, only a small portion of them, however, being entitled to obtain the present possession of a house or land, so that in five years only 227 out of 70,000 subscribers would obtain anything, Baron Parke, although refraining from deciding the point, said that he could not bring himself to the opinion that such a scheme was illegal, as constituting a lottery. O'Connor v. Bradshaw, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 26.

As to a guessing contest as a lottery, see the case note to Waite v. Press Pub. Asso. 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 609.

As to the distribution of suits by a tailor among members of a club as a lottery, see the case note to Grant v. State, 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 876.

As to scheme for accumulating money by payments of members, and distributing it in order of number of certificate, as a lottery, see the case note to Fitzsimmons v. United States, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1095.

tioned among the purchasers by lot, are held in many cases to be within the statute against lotteries; and it is immaterial that every purchaser is to receive some return. Paulk v. Jasper Land Co. 116 Ala. 178, 22 So. 495; Elder v. Chapman, 176 Ill. 142, 52 N. E. 10; Lynch v. Rosenthal, 144 Ind. 86, 31 L.R.A. 835, 55 Am. St. Rep. 168, 42 N. E. 1103; Den ex dem. Wooden v. Shotwell, 24 N. J. L. 789; Seidenbender v. Charles, 4 Serg. & R. 151, 8 Am. Dec. 682.

It is insisted, however, that where it is no part of the original contract of sale that the lots shall be divided by chance, and the vendor does not direct or make himself a party to the unlawful distribution, the contract is not vitiated, and that a recovery may be had thereon. The principle thus stated in the contention is undoubtedly sound, for where a number of parties join together and purchase lands, even with the intention of dividing it in an unlawful method, the vendor is not a party to the scheme, and is entitled to recover the agreed price. In that case, the unlawful scheme for the division by lot is not a part of the original contract of sale.

In Martin v. Hodge, 47 Ark. 378, 58 Am. Rep. 763, 1 S. W. 694, which involved to some extent the same principles which must control here, the court said: "The test to determine whether a plaintiff is entitled to recover in an action like this or not is his ability to establish his case without any aid from an illegal transaction. If his claim or right to recover depends on a transaction which is malum in se or prohibited by legislative enactment, and that transaction must necessarily be proved to make out his case, there can be no recovery."

Now, in applying that test to the present action, it becomes necessary to inquire particularly as to what the contract was between the parties. It will readily be observed that it was not a joint contract on the part of the subscribers or purchasers to purchase together a quantity of land, to be subsequently distributed or apportioned among themselves according to a method of their own selection. If such were the case, each purchaser would be bound by the purchase, and would be obligated to accept and pay for his undivided part of the lands so purchased, and the vendor would not be concerned in the method of its apportionment or allotment between the several purchasers. The contract in this case is in writing and speaks for itself. Each subscriber or purchaser agreed to become the purchaser of a lot, to be thereafter selected, of given dimensions and for a certain stipulated price. There were 200 of these subscribers, and they separately agreed in these contracts to purchase lots of the same dimensions and at the same price, but of unequal value. The sale of each purchaser was not complete until the lot was selected, and the method of selecting the lots was necessarily a part of the contract. It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove the distribution of each lot in order to show a completion of the contract and his right to recover thereon, for the purchaser did not agree to pay until the lot should be apportioned and set aside to him. Applying the test laid down by this court in Martin v. Hodge, supra, it was necessary for the plaintiff, in order to make out his case, to prove an illegal transaction whereby the lots were set apart and apportioned to the respective purchasers. While the evidence in this case does not establish the fact that the plaintiff selected the method of apportioning the lots, yet the contract itself necessarily made him a party to whatever method was selected, because, until the apportionment of the lots, the contract was not complete and susceptible of enforcement. The obligation which he accepted from the various purchasers contemplated that the distribution would be entirely by chance, and without reference to the actual value of the lots. It was not susceptible of the interpretation that a lawful method would or could be adopted whereby the lots were to be distributed. It could mean nothing else save that these lots, of unequal value, should be apportioned among the purchasers without regard to values, for each purchaser agreed to take a lot of the stipulated dimensions, no more, no less, and to pay the uniform price named, no more and no less. It was necessarily not in the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made that any regard to value should be had in the distribution of the lots, or that the values should be equalized in distributing them.

There is a decision of the supreme court of Iowa which, at first glance, appears to be in conflict with the views we have herein expressed; but on careful analysis of the facts of that case, we find that it is clearly distinguishable from this. There, certain promoters engaged in an enterprise with a packing company to erect its plant at the city or town named, and entered into a contract with the owners of a tract of land that the same should be platted and sold to subscribers or purchasers at a uniform price, and that the same were to be distributed among the subscribers according to methods to be thereafter selected by the latter. The subscribers were procured, and the lots platted and conveyed to the promoters for distribution among the subscribers, and the latter agreed upon and carried out a plan of distribution by drawing, similar or any two magistrates." Col. Rec. of Conn. 1, 100. Cf. Id., 154. Our Code of 1650 (Col. Rec. 1, 533), under the title of "Innkeepers," recited that "forasmuch as there is a necessary use of howses of common interteining in euey common-wealth, and of such as retaile wine, beare, and victualls, yet because there are so many abuses of that lawfull libberty, both by persons interteining and persons interteined, there is also need of strict lawes and rules to regulate such an employment." Legislation of a similar character appears in subsequent revisions of the statutes, down to the date of the adoption of our Constitution. Stat. 1715, p. 123; Comp. 1808, p. 640, title 158, chap. 1; Public Acts 1810, p. 33, chap. 7. It had been one of the permanent features of that free government, for the enjoyment of which the people expressed in that instrument, in the language quoted, their gratitude to the good providence of God. In the face of this long history of dealing with the use and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, to be drunk at the place where they are purchased, it is idle to claim that the framers of the Constitution understood or intended that anything contained in it should be regarded as prohibiting altogether the licensing of such a business. Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. 162, 175, 22 L. ed. 627, 630. Our Constitution (art. 3, § 1) vests "the legislative power of this state" in the general assembly. That power covers the whole field of legitimate legislation, except so far as limitations are to be found in other provisions of this Constitution or in that of the United States. The latter provides (art. 4, § 4) that the "United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government." Connecticut is therefore impliedly bound forever to maintain such a form of government. She put her legislative power in the hands of the general assembly. She put only, because she could put only, such power of that nature as was consistent with a republican form of government. Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 162; Welch v. Wadsworth, 30 Conn. 149, 155, 79 Am. Dec. 239. In constitutional republics, as was observed by Chief Justice Chase in a case where arguments somewhat resembling those now made at our bar were advanced, "there are, undoubtedly, fundamental principles of morality and justice which no legislature is at liberty to disregard; but it is equally undoubted that no court, except in the clearest cases, can properly impute the disregard of those principles to the legislature." License Tax Cases, 5 Wall. 462, 469, 18 L. ed. 497, 500; Citizens' Sav. & 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

L. Asso. v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455.

The general assembly of Connecticut, under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, can deprive no one of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Any precise and exhaustive definition of the phrase "due process of law" has been sedulously avoided by the Supreme Court of the United States. Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104, 24 L. ed. 616, 619. It has, however, been repeatedly declared to refer not merely to forms of legal proceedings, but to "that law of the land in each state, which derives its authority from the inherent and reserved powers of the state, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions, and the greatest security for which resides in the right of the people to make their own laws, and alter them at their pleasure." Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 527, 535, 28 L. ed. 232, 235, 238, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 120, 292. It therefore embraces such a matter as taxation by a state of personal property having a situs in territory beyond its borders. Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 202, 211, 50 L. ed. 150, 152, 156, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 493. It forbids arbitrary interference with any man's liberty of contract. Adair v. United States, 208 U. S. 161, 174, 175, 52 L. ed. 436, 442, 443, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 764. But, however broad the scope that has been given to the guaranty of due process of law by such decisions as those to which reference has been made, that there is nothing unrepblican, nor beyond the legitimate sphere of legislative power, in the maintenance of such a system as that long established here for governmental licenses to sell intoxicating liquors, is plain from the fact, of which judicial notice must be taken, that most free governments have, at all periods of time, made that business a subject, not of prohibition, but of regulation. Either mode of treatment is equally legitimate. State v. Brennan, 25 Conn. 278, 288; Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 91, 34 L. ed. 620, 623, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13. At common law it was a business lawful and open to any man. Our statutes do not enlarge, but restrict, this right. Sopher v. State, 169 Ind. 177, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 172, 81 N. E. 913.

Finally, it is argued that the statute is essentially a revenue measure, though ostensibly in the interest of public policy. The term "police power" has, at bottom, no other meaning than the general power of governing its people and dominions, belonging to every sovereignty. McKeon v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 75 Conn. 343, 347, 61 L.R.A. 730, 53 Atl. 656. The state may properly restrict a business dangerous, if unregulated, to public morals or security, by the requirement of large license fees. State v. Conlon, 65 Conn. 478, 484, 31 L.R.A. 55, 48 Am. St. Rep. 227, 33 Atl. 519. It is only important to distinguish between licenses issued by way of regulation and licenses issued for purposes of revenue in the case of municipal corporations, acting under legislative authority. The question then is: For what object was the authority given by the legislature? Such an inquiry is irrelevant in testing the validity of a statute of the state.

There is no error.

In this opinion the other Judges concur.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

JOSEPH B. LEGGE, Admr., etc., of Michael Legge, Deceased,
v.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN, & HARTFORD
RAILROAD COMPANY.

(197 Mass. 88, 83 N. E. 367.)

Railroad — highway crossing — traveler.

1. One attempting to cross the tracks of a railroad outside of the limits of the highway cannot recover against the railroad company for injuries caused by collision with a train, on the theory that he was a traveler on a highway crossing.

Same — passenger — trespasser.

2. One who, in going from a railroad car to a street, after passing a certain distance along the walk provided by the railroad company, turns aside and attempts to walk across the tracks of the company, cannot claim the protection from the company which is due to a passenger.

Same — exits — invitation.

3. Knowledge on the part of a railroad company of the use by passengers of a particular route in leaving its cars does not amount to an invitation to use it, where other proper arrangements have been provided.

Same — contributory negligence.

4. One who, after leaving a railroad car, for his own convenience voluntarily leaves the walk provided by the company for access to the street, and steps upon the railroad track, in full view of an approaching train, without taking the slightest precaution for his own safety, cannot hold the company liable for injuries caused by a collision with the train.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County, made during trial of an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate, which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Overruled.

Michael Legge arrived at Sharon station from the south. From the station a plank walk led north about 130 feet to a point where the public highway crossed the railroad tracks at right angles. He proceeded northward along this walk to a point a little short of the boundary of the highway, and then, in full view of a train approaching from the north, he stepped onto the railroad tracks for the purpose of shortening his journey to his destination by walking diagonally across them; he was hit by the southbound train.

The declaration was in three counts. The first alleged that deceased was killed while a traveler on the highway at a crossing of the company; second, that he was killed by the train while a passenger of the com-

Case Note. — Right of passenger using, as approach to station, a way not provided by carrier.

That it is a carrier's duty to provide safe approaches to and from its conveyances is clear. Notes to Skottowe v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. 16 L.R.A. 593, and Johns v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 20 L.R.A. 520.

A carrier, however, has the right to determine the routes by which passengers shall approach and leave its stations. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Harrison, 100 Ill. App. 211; Chase v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 134 Mo. App. 655, 114 S. W. 1141.

And where a carrier has provided a safe approach, and this is sufficiently indicated to the public, it is the legal duty of passengers to go to and from the station in the way provided. Perego v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (Mich.) 122 N. W. 535; Chase v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. supra.

A carrier is not bound to suppose that passengers who do not know the safe way provided by it will neglect the means open to their sight, and go off in the darkness somewhere else. Sturgis v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 72 Mich. 619, 40 N. W. 914.

A passenger choosing to depart from the safe approach to the station provided by the carrier, and taking a dangerous way, against which warning notices are posted, and where the danger is apparent, assumes the risk. Perego v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra.

Only in case of gross negligence will the carrier be held liable for injury to a passenger who has departed from the way provided into one not provided, and where he was prohibited from going. Ibid.

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Harrison, supra, it was held that where one alighting Messrs. M. J. Creed, A. S. Graves, and J. Porter Crosby, for plaintiff:

If the plaintiff's intestate, when killed, was a passenger of the defendant company, and his death resulted from the negligence of the corporation, of the gross negligence of its servants and agents, it is not incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the deceased was in the exercise of due care.

from a train, instead of following the safe and suitable egress provided by the carrier, clambered over a locked gate and got upon a parallel track, he severed his relation as a passenger, and became merely one whom the carrier could not recklessly or wilfully injure, but toward whom the exercise of the highest diligence had ceased to be an obligation.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Oberhoefer, 76 Ill. App. 672, it was held that where the carrier had provided a safe and commodious exit from its train, a passenger who left a train and proceeded along the track instead of following the safe exit provided could not recover for being run over by the train, not wilfully or wantonly, since he became a trespasser, and failed to exercise ordinary care for his own safety by walking along the track.

In Sturgis v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. supra, it was held that a company which had provided all reasonable facilities for ingress and egress from its station house was not liable to a passenger who was injured in a cattle guard while following the railroad track merely because that was a shorter cut from the depot to the village than was furnished by the regular road.

In Parsons v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 85 Hun, 23, 32 N. Y. Supp. 598, it was held proper to nonsuit plaintiff upon its appearing that his intestate was killed while passing from a train along a track to a public street; that there were two safe ways provided by the carrier leading to the street; that deceased was familiar with the station and the passageways; that the carrier's employees had tried to prevent people from using the unsafe exit; and there was no evidence that it in any way invited or approved of its use.

Ct. Rep.

In Perego v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra, it was held that a carrier had performed its entire duty to prevent passengers from using an unsafe way where it had provided a safe way, and had posted warning notices, and frequently advised passengers against the use of the unsafe way.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Criswell (Tex.) 108 S. W. 806, it was held that if the carrier permitted passengers generally to use a way not intended for passengers, it was its duty to exercise ordinary care to keep such way in a safe condition; and if injury resulted from a failure to perform that duty, the carrier was liable to the same extent as if the injury had occurred upon the way provided by it for the use of passengers.

If, with full knowledge of the facts, a carrier permits an unsafe and dangerous way to its station to be provided and used, it is as much liable for an injury to a passenger arising therefrom as if it had itself set up and maintained the dangerous way; and it is no defense that it had provided another and safe way. Collins v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. 80 Mich. 390, 45 N. W. 178; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Trautwein, 52 N. J. L. 169, 7 L.R.A. 435, 19 Am. St. Rep. 442, 19 Atl. 178; Beard v. Connecticut & P. River R. Co. 48 Vt. 101.

And it is no defense that the dangerous way was built by and upon the property of a union depot where the defendant carrier discharged its passengers. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Glenk, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 599, 30 S. W. 278.

In East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Watson, 94 Ala. 634, 10 So. 228, it appeared that two bridges over a creek connected the veranda of a hotel or eating house for passengers with the railroad company's platform; that the bridges were built by the hotel company on the railway right of way; that the railroad company had not used for three years, and had never repaired or taken control of, one of the bridges, on which a passenger was injured by falling into a hole. It was held that the passenger was entitled to act on the appearance of things, and that he might well suppose that he was invited to take either bridge, and the railroad company was liable for his injury, in the absence of contributory negligence.

Even though another route had been provided, if this was the one usually taken, it would be competent for the jury to find that there was an implied invitation to use it.

In Cotant v. Boone Suburban R. Co. 125 Iowa, 46, 69 L.R.A. 982, 99 N. W. 115, it was held that a railway company which expressly or by implication invited its passengers to use a stile over a wire fence in leaving its grounds was bound to exercise at least ordinary care in seeing that it was properly constructed and in good repair, although it was not erected by the company, and the defective part was not on its property, but on the property of another, where it had no right to go to make inspection or repairs.

And in Schlessinger v. Manhattan R. Co. 49 Misc. 504, 98 N. Y. Supp. 840, it was held that an elevated railway which had posted notices advising passengers to use a stairway leading from its elevated platform to the street was bound to exercise a reasonable amount of care and inspection to see that it was kept in a safe condition, although this particular stairway belonged to the city, and the company had no right to make repairs without permission.

In Cazneau v. Fitchburg R. Co. 161 Mass. 355, 37 N. E. 311, it was held that, in the absence of knowledge that only one wrought way had been provided by the railway company for the use of passengers passing between the station and the street, and in the absence of any direction or notice from the defendant to use a particular path, a passenger was at liberty to use any path which appeared to be designed for such use; and, as to such passenger, the railway company was bound to see that all paths which one in his situation would naturally and reasonably be expected to take were reasonably safe for use.

In Cross v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 69 Mich. 363, 13 Am. St. Rep. 399, 37 N. W. 361, and Lemon v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 136 Mich. 647, 100 N. W. 22, it was held that if a railroad company had, without objection, notice, or protest, permitted its passengers to cross its depot grounds on a path not laid out by the company, then it was its duty to keep its grounds along and near such walk in a reasonably safe condition for the coming and going of its passengers; and it made no difference that the company had provided another and safer way by which passengers could have gone.

In Keefe v. Boston & A. R. Co. 142 Mass. 251, 7 N. E. 874, it was held that the mere fact that an arriving passenger intended to leave the station over a way not provided by the carrier, and where she had no right to go, had no effect upon her right to recover for an injury received while walking in that direction upon the station platform where passengers were expressly or impliedly invited to go.

Passengers have a right to assume that a way to and from a train, no matter by whom provided, is in a condition to be safe for ordinary transit. Chance v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 10 Mo. App. 351.

Hammond, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There can be no recovery upon the first count because the plaintiff's intestate was killed before he reached the highway.

There can be no recovery upon the second count because, at the time the plaintiff's intestate was killed, he had ceased to be a passenger. While it is true that a corporation operating a railroad is bound to use proper care to see that a passenger who alights from one of its cars at a station provided for that purpose has a safe way of exit from its grounds, and that the relation of passenger continues until such exit is completed, yet, where proper arrangements have been made for such exit, it is the duty of the passenger to use them; and, if he knowingly fails to do so, and without any invitation, either express or fairly to be implied from the situation and arrangement of the station and grounds, leaves the way marked out by the defendant, and proceeds to make his exit in some other way, he ceases from that moment to be a passenger, and becomes a trespasser, or, at the most, a mere licensee. He has stepped from under the egis by which, up to that moment, the law as to passengers covered him. Nor does it make any difference that he goes where others, with the knowledge of the railroad company, have gone before him, unless there is some invitation, express or implied, upon the part of the company. Knowledge of such use, where proper arrangements have been otherwise provided, does not, of itself, amount to such invitation. Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700; Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 429; Keefe v. Boston & A. R. Co. 142 Mass. 251, 7 N. E. 874; Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co. 161 Mass. 298, 24 L.R.A. 521, 37 N. E. 165; Cazneau v. Fitchburg R. Co. 161 Mass. 355, 37 N. E. 311; Dodge v. Boston & B. S. S. Co. 148 Mass. 207, 2 L.R.A. 83, 12 Am. St. Rep. 541, 19 N. E. 373.

Applying these principles to the facts of this case, it is clear that, at the time of the accident, the deceased had ceased to be a passenger. The defendant had provided a safe and ample plank walk for exit to the highway. The plaintiff's intestate was upon it and had nearly reached the highway. Instead of continuing to walk upon it, he deliberately left it and undertook to reach the highway by crossing the railroad tracks. To do so he stepped down from the platform, which was 12¾ inches above the sleepers, into the space where the sleepers lay uncovered, proceeded 2½ feet over the space between the platform and the nearest rail, and had stepped over that, when he was hit by the outgoing train. There was no plank, nor even any beaten path, where he walked after he left the platform. Not only was there no indication that the place had been fitted up as a way of exit or was intended to be used as such, but, on the contrary, the surrounding platforms, the height of the one from which the deceased stepped, the protruding sleepers, and the entire lack of preparation for the convenience of one walking there,—indeed, everything,—indicated that it was not intended as such a way.

There can be no recovery upon the third count because the plaintiff has failed to show due care on the part of the deceased. For his own convenience he voluntarily left the safe way of exit provided by the defendant, and stepped upon the track upon which a train in full view was approaching, apparently without taking the slightest precaution, by way of looking or otherwise, for his own safety from injury by the train.

Exceptions overruled.

CITY OF CHICAGO, Plff. in Err.

Municipal corporation — structure in street — liability.

1. A municipal corporation which, without authority, permits a fair to be held in one of its streets, with the attendant structures and shows, is liable for injury to a patron who, in attempting to leave a show, passes over an unsafe platform erected in the street to afford access to such show, and is jostled off by the crowd, to his injury.

ERROR to the Branch Appellate Court, First District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Sigmund Zeisler, with Mr. John R. Caverly, for plaintiff in error:

The permit did not authorize the building or maintaining of unguarded stairs as a part of any structure to be erected, and, under such circumstances, the ownership of the ground does not create any liability for the consequences of neglect of a licensee or lessee.

Messrs. Darrow, Masters, & Wilson, for defendant in error:

A city is liable for injuries arising on account of the holding of street fairs when authorized by the city, on account of the misfeasance of the city in authorizing and permitting same, the principle being that the city becomes a participant therein, and liable on the ground of misfeasance, or the doing of a positive act, as distinguished from nonfeasance, or failure to perform a governmental duty or function.

ipal corporations for defects or obstructions in streets," and the question of the liability of municipal corporations for creating or permitting dangerous conditions in their streets is treated in subd. IV. of a note entitled as above, to Elam v. Mt. Sterling, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 512; and the question of "liability of municipal corporations for permitting obstructions to be placed in street" is treated in a note thus entitled to McKim v. Philadelphia, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 506. These notes cover the general principles of municipal liability for obstructions, nuisances, and dangerous conditions in streets; but they have dealt only with physical and inanimate objects which obstruct and hinder passage, as distinguished from personal conduct in and use of streets which might interfere with their use by others; and it is this segment of the main subject that is left for consideration at this place.

II. General rules.

Municipal corporations are not responsible for every unauthorized act that may be done by anyone, resulting in injury, directly or indirectly, to persons traveling in the streets. Joliet v. Seward, 86 Ill. 402, 29 Am. Rep. 35.

They are not civilly responsible for the unlawful acts of individuals passing over a safe and convenient road because such acts may render its passage unsafe and inconvenient to others. Davis v. Bangor, 42 Me. 522; Lafayette v. Timberlake, 88 Ind. 330; Lafayette v. Rose, 88 Ind. 471; Boyland v. New York, 1 Sandf. 27.

Municipalities are not conservators of the public peace, and are not responsible for injuries on their streets occasioned by the acts of others over which they have no control except through the officers whom they may intrust with the duty of seeing that order is preserved and proper conduct maintained. Stevenson v. Phoenixville, 1 Chester Co. Rep. 113; Little v. Madison, 49 Wis. 605, 35 Am. Rep. 793, 6 N. W. 249.

And a power given to a municipal corporation to make all ordinances, rules, and regulations for the good government and safety of the property and persons in the city leaves it to the discretion of the municipal authorities to determine from time to time what ordinances are proper for the ends in view. Hill v. Charlotte, 72 N. C. 55, 21 Am. Rep. 451.

Because a municipal corporation may prohibit a nuisance, it is not in duty bound to pass a prohibitory law and to enforce it or be subjected to all damages which may ensue from such nuisance; the corporation in such case stands upon the same footing with-in its own jurisdiction as the state government does in respect to the state at large. Levy v. New York, 1 Sandf. 405; Tarbutton v. Tennille, 110 Ga. 90, 35 S. E. 282.

And the liability of a town, as for an ob-

82 Pac. 590, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 1042; Cole v. Nashville, 4 Sneed, 162.

The city being a participant in the holding of the street fair, it was liable for an injury which occurred by reason of the negligent construction of any of the structures upon its property or under its control, to a person attending the fair at its solicitation or the solicitation of any of the other participants in the holding thereof.

If, in the exercise of the corporate powers, a municipal corporation creates or permits a nuisance by nonfeasance or misfeasance, it is guilty of tort.

Whoever licenses the placing of a nuisance upon his property or upon property under his control is equally liable with the creator of the nuisance to a person sustaining injuries as a result thereof, and this rule applies as well to municipalities as to individuals.

Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. §§ 31, 703, 747, 748; Murray v. Archer, 1 Silv. Sup. Ct.

struction for misconduct upon the part of persons using a street is not enlarged by the fact that it had notice of such use. Ray v. Manchester, 46 N. H. 59, 88 Am. Dec. 192.

Nor will either the rightful use by individuals of a highway which is itself in a reasonably safe and fit condition, or their mere misconduct upon it, though such misconduct may amount to a public nuisance, of itself constitute an obstruction for an injury from which the city is liable. Ibid.

So, a charter provision of a municipality that the streets and highways shall be kept in repair by the city imports that there shall not be in the streets or highways any defect or imperfection which renders them unsafe or inconvenient for use by the public, nor any obstruction either closing them as ways or hindering the progress of those passing in them, but has no reference to violence or disorderly conduct of individuals in the streets, which may temporarily endanger the security of those who pass in them. The corporate duty of the city to keep its streets in repair is performed when the streets are free from obstructions or structural defects. Campbell v. Montgomery, 53 Ala. 527, 25 Am. Rep. 656.

And an illegal use of a highway by men, animals, vehicles, engines, or any other object while movable and actually being moved by human will and direction, neither fixed to, nor resting on, nor remaining in one position within, the traveled part of the highway, is not a defect or want of repair for which the city or town is liable. Barber v. Roxbury, 11 Allen, 318.

III. Riots and unlawful assemblages.

With respect to the power of municipal corporations to suppress riots and assemblages of disorderly persons, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, the corporation is a mere agency of the state, and not liable for negligence in the performance of such duty. Robinson v. Greenville, 42 Ohio St. 625, 51 Am. Rep. 857.

The duty of a city to enforce ordinances and by-laws which would suppress unlawful assemblages in the streets is governmental, and not ministerial, and if there be negligence in its exercise, no private action will lie to redress injuries resulting therefrom. Campbell v. Montgomery, 53 Ala. 527, 25 Am. Rep. 656; Bryant v. Orangeburg, 70 S. C. 137, 49 S. E. 229.

So, while city officers are in duty bound to be diligent to prevent a show in the streets where it might cause injury to persons traveling thereon, if they fail to perform that duty and an injury results from such omission, the law does not render the city liable for such neglect. Little v. Madi-

366, 5 N. Y. Supp. 326; Hudson County v. Woodcliff Land Improv. Co. 74 N. J. L. 355, 65 Atl. 844; Texas State Fair v. Brittain, 56 C. C. A. 499, 118 Fed. 713; Thornton v. Maine State Agri. And the receipt of a license fee by a city for permission to make an exhibition cannot be considered as affording a consideration for an implied undertaking on the part of a city to be answerable for the neglect of its police officers to perform their official duty and prevent the exhibition in the street or other improper place. Ibid.

There is a distinction, however, between a case in which the officers of a city authorize and license a show in the highway and one in which they are negligent in preventing such show or improper use of the street, since in the former case, the officers of the city become themselves active agents in the commission of the wrong. Ibid.

And where a city changes the character of a street and devotes it to the purposes of a street fair, without authority, and negligently permits structures to be erected therein for the purposes of the fair in an unsafe manner, knowing that the public will attend and go upon such structures, the city is liable for an injury to a person resulting from going upon one of such structures, upon the theory that it has permitted the creation of a dangerous condition. IV. Coasting.

A municipal corporation is not liable, for failing to prevent coasting in its streets, to one who is injured by a collision with a sled used for that purpose. Dudley v. Lansing, supra.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 15, 1903, the city council of the city of Chicago, on the application of the business men of the eighth ward, passed a resolution giving permission to use certain streets for a merchants' carnival and street fair to be held from July 20 to July 26, 1903, with the necessary shows, stands, and attractions. Under that authority the streets named in the resolution were occupied with tents, booths, and other structures, and at the corner of Ninety-second street and Exchange avenue there were three shows in tents erected in the street intersection. One was an animal show, another a Lilliputian, and the third was a show named "Enoch, the Water Man." The streets were festooned and illuminated by electric lights, and the crowds at night were estimated from 40,000 to 50,000 people. The sidewalks and roadways were full of visitors to the street carnival, and teams and street cars went around through other streets. The tent in which the show of "Enoch" was conducted would hold 300 people. In front of it was a platform 6 feet wide, 15 or more feet long, and 4 or 5 feet above the street. A "barker" stood on the platform, attracting the attention of the crowd to the show, and there was a place there for selling tickets. A stairway 5 or 6 feet wide went up to the platform from the street, and a like stairway led down on the other side into the tent. The show lasted about ten or fifteen minutes, and consisted of "Enoch" in a water tank, smoking a pipe. The defendant in error, Anna Van Cleef, went into the show with her husband about 9 o'clock in the evening of July 24, 1903. The performance was attended by 150 to 200 people, and at its conclusion the crowd started to go out on the street. In descending the steps from the platform to the street, Mrs. Van Cleef was pushed by the crowd, and, there being no railing or guard along the edge of the stairway, she fell to the street and suffered serious injuries. She brought her suit in the superior court of Cook county against the plaintiff in error, the city of Chicago, to recover damages for her injuries, and obtained a verdict for $15,000. The court denied motions for a new trial and in arrest

And a complaint in an action against a city, charging that the city did not prevent persons on a bobsleigh from sliding down a hill in a street, is insufficient as a charge of negligence against the city, in the absence of anything to connect the city with the accident, or show that the city authorized an unlawful use of the street. Toomey v. Albany, 38 N. Y. S. R. 91, 14 N. Y. Supp. 572.

Nor is a city liable for injuries suffered by one passing along or over a public street, caused by collision with persons coasting on the street, under a statute imposing liability upon the city for insufficiency or want of repair of streets. Schultz v. Milwaukee, 49 Wis. 254, 35 Am. Rep. 779, 5 N. W. 342; Hutchinson v. Concord, 41 Vt. 271, 98 Am. Dec. 584.

A boy coasting upon a hand sled is not a defect or want of repair in the highway for which the city is liable to a person struck by the moving sled. Pierce v. New Bedford, 129 Mass. 534, 37 Am. Rep. 387; Hutchinson v. Concord, supra.

And a city charter conferring upon the city authority over its streets, and making it its duty to keep them in suitable and sufficient repair, and providing for the raising of money for the performance of this duty, and an ordinance of the city in force, forbidding coasting on any of the streets and highways of the city, do not impose upon the city the duty of preventing the nuisance of coasting on its streets, so that it can be held liable for an injury resulting from a negligent omission of such duty. Weller v. Burlington, 60 Vt. 28, 12 Atl. 215.

This rule is based upon the theory that the duty of public officers to prevent coasting in a city street is one relating to the execution of a state law, and the officers charged therewith, though servants of the municipality, are, to the extent of such duty, public officers for whose neglect to perform the same no municipal liability attaches. Wilmington v. Vandegrift, 1 Marv. (Del.) 5, 25 L.R.A. 538, 65 Am. St. Rep. 256, 29 Atl. 1047.

And that though the use of a public highway for coasting may be a public nuisance, its suppression is a police duty, and not a duty in which the corporation as such has a particular interest, or from which it derives any special benefit in its corporate capacity, and for the nonperformance of such duty by its officers and agents the corporation is not liable. Schultz v. Milwaukee and Wilmington v. Vandegrift, supra.

Nor does the action of a city in designating a particular street for coasting make it liable for an injury inflicted by coasters upon a person passing in that street. Burford v. Grand Rapids, 53 Mich. 98, 51 Am. Rep. 105, 18 N. W. 571.

And the liability of a city for an injury of judgment, and entered judgment on the verdict. The branch appellate court for the first district affirmed the judgment, and the city sued out a writ of error from this court to bring the judgment of the appellate court in review.

The brief and argument of counsel for the city is almost wholly devoted to the general proposition that, under the facts of the case, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and the city was not liable for her injury; and is not directed to any ruling of the trial court or any error assigned; and an argument of that kind might very properly be disregarded. On the oral argument, however, the counsel stated that the argument then made and the printed brief and argument were designed to demonstrate that the court erred in refusing to direct a verdict of not guilty, and refusing to arrest the judgment after verdict; and we are disposed to consider them as applying to the errors assigned on such rulings.

The controverted questions of fact have been settled against the city by the judgment of the appellate court, and there is and can be no dispute of the propositions: That the city had no power to authorize the use of the street for the carnival and street fair; that the occupancy of the street for that purpose was unlawful and the tent and platform a nuisance per se; that the city, having, by an affirmative act, authorized the creation of the public nuisance, became a participant in creating and maintaining it, and was not entitled to any notice of its existence or character; and that, although it did not itself put up the structure, it became liable for all injurious consequences to anyone who might be in a position to complain of the breach of duty by the creation of the nuisance. It is admitted that the structure in the street was a public nuisance, and the city would be liable for any resulting injuries to persons using the street for street purposes; but it is contended that to those using the structure it was a private nuisance on account of its improper construction, and that the city was not a participant in creating and maintaining the private nuisance in its aspect as a structure unsafe to those using it. Counsel, repeating the argument in different form, says that the invitation to enter the show was extended by parties in control of it; and, while the city would be liable for an injury to anyone using the street for the legitimate purposes of a street, the plaintiff was hurt solely by reason of entering upon the insufficient stairway; and the fact that the street had been made unsafe for use as a street had no connection with her injury. Counsel therefore conclude that the wrong by the city was not the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff.

It is, of course, true that the injury must be the legitimate consequence of the wrong; and, considering the question of proximate cause in the relation of cause and effect, it resulting from coasting on the streets of the city is not affected by the fact that a majority of the citizens and taxpayers approved of the practice of coasting. Weller v. Burlington, supra.

And a city is not rendered liable to a traveler on one of its streets, who was injured by persons coasting on the street, for the injury, by the fact that the coasting was carried on by a large crowd, in the presence of the mayor, marshal, and police officers, and there was an ordinance prohibiting on the streets all sports tending to produce bodily injury. Faulkner v. Aurora, 85 Ind. 130, 44 Am. Rep. 1.

It has been held, however, that where a street was covered with snow and ice, and crowds of men, boys, and girls, with sleds, to the number of fifty or sixty, congregated and coasted thereon, and many of the sleds were composed of two ordinary sleds joined with a plank, and were from 15 to 20 feet long, and occupied by six or eight persons, and the sleds were run down the street at a rapid and dangerous rate of speed, this constituted a nuisance of a serious character, which it was the duty of the city to abate and prevent if it could be done by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, and this duty was not discharged by merely passing ordinances prohibiting coasting; a vigorous effort should have been made to enforce them in order to relieve the city from liability. Taylor v. Cumberland, 64 Md. 68, 54 Am. Rep. 759, 20 Atl. 1027.

V. Racing.

The enactment by municipal corporations of ordinances against horse racing on their streets is the exercise of a governmental power, and a corporation is not liable either for a failure to enact such ordinances, or for a failure to enforce them after they are enacted. Marth v. Kingfisher (Okla.) 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1238, 98 Pac. 436.

And a municipal corporation is not liable, under a statute requiring municipal corporations to keep their streets in a condition reasonably safe and fit for travel, for personal injuries caused by permitting horse racing on a street which was in proper condition and safe for travel. McCarthy v. Munising, 136 Mich. 622, 99 N. W. 865.

Nor is a horse race upon a street in a city a defect or want of repair in the highway of the city, or a dangerous condition of such highway, for which the city is liable to a traveler upon such street, who is struck by one of the horses in the race. Marth v. Kingfisher, supra.

VI. Bicycling in violation of road laws.

A municipal corporation is not liable for injury to a person who is struck by a bicycle is clear that the injury was a natural result of the wrongful act of the city. When the city authorized showmen to fill its streets with tents and structures of the temporary character usual in carnivals and street fairs, it was reasonably to be apprehended that unless considerable care was exercised injury might result. It was not necessary that the city should have contemplated or been able to anticipate the injurious consequences to the plaintiff or the precise form of her injury, but it is sufficient that the city might have foreseen that some injury might result from its wrongful act, and, when the injury did result, it could be seen that it was the natural consequence of the occupation of the street by structures of the nature of this platform, under the permission given by the city. The negligence of the one who constructed the platform would not exempt the city if the permission was also a proximate cause. The city was guilty of a serious wrong and violation of duty by permitting the occupation of the streets for show purposes and creating a nuisance in them; and the expectation was that large numbers of people would go into the shows by whatever means might be provided. The city negligently permitted the structure authorized by it to be erected in an unsafe manner, and the wrong and resulting damage were connected according to the ordinary course of events. This proposition is practically conceded on the part of the city in the admission expressly made, that, if the plaintiff had gone on the platform voluntarily, for the purpose of passing over it to reach some other place, and precisely the same injury had resulted from the same cause, the city would be liable. The relation of cause and effect would not exist in that case any more than in this.

The principal ground upon which counsel insist that the wrong was not the proximate cause of the injury is that the city owed no duty to the plaintiff when she went over the platform to see the show and while she was returning from it, and as to her the street was not unsafe, as a street, while she was in that situation. It is admitted that the plaintiff did not lose her character as a legitimate user of the street until the moment she stepped upon the stairway to enter the show; and up to that moment, even though she had merely loitered around the street or mingled with the throng that filled the sidewalks and roadway, the duty of the city existed, and also a liability for any injury resulting from the wrongful use of the street; but it is insisted that when she started up the stairway the duty ceased, and would not come into being again until she was again on the street. The liability of the city is, of course, not confined to travelers, but extends to a person stopping on the street to converse with another, or stopping to see a procession pass, or using the street for convenience or pleasure, and there ridden by an other person on a sidewalk, by reason of its failure to enact or enforce an ordinance prohibiting the riding of bicycles on sidewalks. Jones v. Williamsburg, 97 Va. 722, 47 L.R.A. 294, 34 S. E. 883; Tarbutton v. Tennille, 110 Ga. 90, 35 S. E. 282; Custer v. New Philadelphia, 20 Ohio C. C. 177; Rogers v. Binghamton, 101 App. Div. 352, 92 N. Y. Supp. 179, affirmed in 186 N. Y. 595, 79 N. E. 1115; Howard v. Brooklyn, 30 App. Div. 217, 51 N. Y. Supp. 1058; Bryant v. Orangeburg, 70 S. C. 137, 49 S. E. 229.

The act of a city in permitting bicycles to be operated and run at a high and dangerous rate of speed on its sidewalks does not constitute maintaining a public nuisance, within the meaning of statutory provisions requiring cities to keep their streets open and in repair and free from nuisances. Custer v. New Philadelphia, supra.

And a statutory provision that any person who shall receive bodily injury or damage in his person or property through a defect in any street, or by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation within the limits of the municipality, may recover in an action against the same the damages sustained by reason thereof, does not give a right of action against a city to a person run over by a bicycle ridden rapidly along the sidewalk. Bryant v. Orangeburg, supra.

Nor is the riding of a bicycle upon a sidewalk an unlawful act at common law; and charter power to regulate the use of sidewalks authorizes an ordinance permitting the riding of bicycles on them where such act will not amount to a nuisance. Lee v. Port Huron, 128 Mich. 533, 55 L.R.A. 303, 87 N. W. 637.

It has been held, however, that failure of a municipality to attempt to enforce its ordinance limiting the speed at which bicycles may be ridden on its streets renders it liable for injuries to a pedestrian knocked down by a bicycle ridden at an immoderate rate of speed. Hagerstown v. Klotz, 93 Md. 437, 54 L.R.A. 940, 86 Am. St. Rep. 437, 49 Atl. 836. This case is decided upon the theory apparently adopted in Maryland, that municipal corporations having powers to protect the public in the use of the streets are bound to exercise them for the public good.

VII. Animals running at large.

A power given a city by charter or statute to restrain the running at large of cattle, swine, sheep, etc., and to abate nuisances, does not impose upon it an absolute duty, which is purely ministerial, to pass such a restraining ordinance, so as to render it liable for damages done by a domestic animal running at large in the streets. It may act or not, as it shall deem expedient. Kelley v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 83.

are liabilities to abutting owners and to children playing upon the street. Chicago v. Keefe, 114 Ill. 222, 55 Am. Rep. 860, 2 N. E. 267. The position of counsel for the city is illustrated by the case of Cohen v. New York, 113 N. Y. 532, 4 L.R.A. 406, 10 Am. St. Rep. 506, 21 N. E. 700. In that case the city granted permission to a grocer to keep his wagon on the street in front of his store, and he negligently tied up the thills, which fell and struck Cohen, who was passing. It is said that if Cohen had climbed on the wagon the city would not have been liable, which is doubtless true. It is also true that, in the case of Little v. Madison, 42 Wis. 643, 24 Am. Rep. 435, if the plaintiff had mounted one of the bears in the bear show licensed in the street, and had been injured, the city would not have been liable. But the argument overlooks the clear and broad distinction between those cases and this in the fact that, when the nuisance was authorized, it was expected that the public would attend the shows and go upon the structures placed in the street. Undoubtedly, under ordinary circumstances it is the duty of a city to see that its streets are reasonably safe for the uses for which streets are intended; but, when a city changes the character of a street, and devotes it to the purposes of a street fair, we do not think it can escape liability on the ground that the street was intended for different uses. If this carnival and street fair had been licensed upon common public ground or in a park under the control of the city, we do not think there could be any question as to liability; and we are unable to state any valid ground of distinction when the city perverted its streets to like uses for a show ground. In Forget v. Montreal, Montreal L. Rep. 4 S. C. 77, the city was held liable for injuries arising from the use of a public place for an exhibition without taking the necessary measures to protect the public against dangers that might result. Manifestly, public policy would not dictate or approve refined distinctions for the purpose of relieving the city from the natural and probable consequences of its wrongful act. Justice would rather require such distinctions to be made in favor of a party injured, and, if that were done, we might say that when the plaintiff left the tent she was using the street, as such, to reach some other place. We do not regard that as necessary; but, as the city had changed the ordinary conditions governing the highway, and had actively participated in creating a carnival and street fair in public streets, we think it assumed the obligation to use reasonable care to see that the structures were reasonably safe.

It is insisted that, because a private individual owning premises and leasing them for the purpose of a show, or permitting shows on them, would not be liable for the negligent construction of a platform, the city should not be held liable; but the cases are not alike, since the individual owner has no

And hogs running at large in the streets of a city are not per se nuisances which the city must abate or be liable for injury done by them, but are subject only to such regulation as the municipal authorities may determine. Ibid.

And a city having the requisite power, which enacted an ordinance prohibiting swine from running at large in the streets, with a suitable penalty, and providing for impounding the delinquent animals, is not liable to a person who was attacked and injured by a hog straying in the street. Levy v. New York, 1 Sandf. 465.

So, the adoption of an ordinance by a city in reference to allowing cattle to run at large in the city streets is a legislative function, and therefore discretionary; and a city is not liable in damages to a person who was gored by a cow which was running at large in the streets, for neglecting and omitting or refusing to notice the subject, or, having noticed it, and adopted an ordinance concerning it, for having then repealed or suspended it indefinitely. Rivers v. Augusta, 65 Ga. 376, 38 Am. Rep. 787.

But a city may be liable for injuries to a person on a street, inflicted by a cow running at large, which it could have prevented by ordinary care and diligence, where it had permitted the running at large of such cattle without any attempt to stop it, and it had become a common nuisance and source of danger. Cochrane v. Frostburg, 81 Md. 54, 27 L.R.A. 728, 48 Am. St. Rep. 479, 31 Atl. 703.

Though a city is not liable for injuries committed by a cow running at large upon the street without any fault of the owner. Ibid.

VIII. Use of fireworks and other explosives.

Permitting an assemblage of people engaging in the unlawful practice of firing explosives in the streets of a city, though temporarily the assemblage may have blocked the streets from passage, does not create such a defect in, or obstruction of, the streets as will render the city liable for a death caused by an explosion. Campbell v. Montgomery, 53 Ala. 527, 25 Am. Rep. 656.

And a municipal corporation which permits the firing of a cannon in a public street, or which takes no measures to prevent such firing, is not liable to a person injured thereby. Robinson v. Greenville, 42 Ohio St. 625, 51 Am. Rep. 857.

While a crowd of citizens engaged in firing a cannon in the streets of a city, without authority, and not at any public or authorized celebration, is a nuisance, it is one that a municipal corporation cannot abate by the use of ordinary appliances, such as suffice for the removal of natural or ma-duty to the public, and is not guilty of any wrong in leasing his premises or permitting the shows, while a city is guilty of violation of duty and a serious wrong in doing the same thing.

In our opinion the court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict, or in denying the motion in arrest of judgment.

Complaint is made of the action of the court in giving, refusing, and modifying instructions, and the reply is made that the assignment of errors is not sufficient to raise any question concerning the instructions. In the appellate court, the assignment of errors included all the matters complained of, and the errors assigned in this court are that the appellate court erred in not reversing the judgment, erred in affirming the judgment, and erred in rendering judgment for costs against the city. The judgment under review in this court is the judgment of the appellate court, and the only error the appellate court could commit would be in affirming the judgment. The appellate court did not give, refuse, or modify instructions, or make any other ruling which was excepted to, and it was not necessary in this court to reassign errors of the trial court. When a plaintiff in error assigns for error in this court that the appellate court erred in affirming the judgment, every question reviewable in this court under the errors assigned in the appellate court is properly raised.

Instruction No. 7, which was given at the request of the plaintiff, directed the jury that, if the plaintiff was suffering from an affection or disease of the bones, the jury had a right to consider whether her existing condition was due to the affection or to the fall, and, if they found it was due to the fall, even though the condition may have been aggravated by the condition of the bones at the time of the fall, they might proceed to assess the plaintiff's damages, if they found she had sustained any damages under the evidence in the case. The instruction, standing alone, was wrong in lacking the qualification that the jury must first find that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The omission, however, was cured by other instructions. In fact, if the number "7" was stricken out, and the instruction should be read with No. 6, which preceded it, it would be free from any objection. Instruction No. 6 told the jury that if they found, from the evidence and under the instructions, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover as alleged in her declaration, then, in estimating the damages, they might take into consideration different elements mentioned in the instruction; and that instruction was followed by this one, which was faulty in omitting the condition mentioned. The instructions are to be read as a series, and the jury could not have misunderstood them when so read, or have supposed that damages might be assessed regardless of the merits of the case.

The sixteenth instruction, as tendered by terial obstructions in or near a highway, and resort, therefore, must be had to the police, for the doings or misdoings of which the municipality is not liable. Norristown v. Fitzpatrick, 94 Pa. 121, 39 Am. Rep. 771.

And the word "nuisance" in a statutory provision that the council of a municipality shall have the care, supervision, and control of all public highways and shall keep them free from nuisance, does not include an assemblage of persons engaged in the unlawful act of firing a cannon in a public street, but refers to something which is, in a sense, fixed or permanent, as a defect in the street. Robinson v. Greenville, supra.

So, negligence of police or peace officers in failing to stop the firing of a cannon, known to be dangerous, upon the streets of a city, does not render the city liable for an injury resulting from such negligence. Arms v. Knoxville, 32 Ill. App. 604.

And a municipal corporation is not liable for an injury inflicted by the acts of men or boys, on their own account, in firing a cannon in a public park of the city on a day when the citizens held a public meeting for the consideration of certain national affairs. Boylard v. New York, 1 Sandf. 27.

And the fact that a cannon was placed in one of the public streets of a city, and there fired, in violation of an ordinance, whereby a person was injured, does not make the city liable for such injury, although it was known to the officers of the city that the cannon was to be fired, and they took no steps to prevent it. O'Rourke v. Sioux Falls, 4 S. D. 47, 19 L.R.A. 789, 46 Am. St. Rep. 760, 54 N. W. 1044.

Nor is a city any more liable for the consequences of the violation of an ordinance prohibiting the exploding of fireworks in the streets by its mayor or council as individuals than it would be if the illegal act were done by a private citizen. Ball v. Woodbine, 61 Iowa, 83, 47 Am. Rep. 805, 15 N. W. 846.

And where fireworks were discharged within the limits of an incorporated town in violation of its ordinances, and a person was injured thereby, though the officers of the town and a majority of the citizens actively participated in the discharge of the fireworks, and the town, by its officers, made no attempt to stop the unlawful proceeding, yet the town is not liable for the injury, there being nothing but a mere violation of a town ordinance. Ibid.

So, a city which, by ordinance, prohibits from firing guns or pistols or exploding firecrackers within the limits of the city, and afterwards passes an ordinance suspending such ordinance for a period, cannot be held liable for an injury caused by the negligent firing of squibs and firecrackers during the period of suspension. Hill v. Charlotte, 72 N. C. 55, 21 Am. Rep. 451.

And where blasting of stone is done in a the defendant, required the plaintiff to use due care and caution for her safety, commensurate with the knowledge which she had or which, by the exercise of reasonable care, she would have had, and the court modified it by confining her obligation in respect to care to defective conditions of which she had knowledge. She had a right to assume that the place was reasonably safe, in the absence of knowledge to the contrary; but, if the instruction was too limited in that respect, the defect was supplied by the fifteenth instruction, in which the court told the jury that the plaintiff was required to use such degree of care and caution for her safety as reasonably prudent persons would use under all the circumstances shown by the evidence.

The modification of instruction 17 did not change its substantial meaning.

Instruction 22, which was refused, represented the theory of the city that it was not liable, and that its duty was limited to the necessities of ordinary modes of travel or passing along the street. What has already been said shows that we do not regard that to be the law.

And instruction 24 was not applicable to the case and was not the law. It directed the jury to regard the authority as a license to provide, maintain, and conduct the exhibition in a proper and reasonably safe manner, and the resolution contained no qualification of that kind.

The judgment is affirmed.

city, but not by the city, but under a contract with a private citizen, and such blasting is done in direct violation of express directions given by city officers, or done without their knowledge, the city is not responsible for an injury caused by it. Joliet v. Seward, 86 Ill. 402, 29 Am. Rep. 35.

Where an exhibition of fireworks takes place in the public streets of a city, under authority or permission of the city, however, the city is liable, if the exhibition is under such circumstances as would permit a jury to find it a public nuisance, for damage caused to those injured by a premature explosion of the fireworks. Landau v. New York, 180 N. Y. 48, 105 Am. St. Rep. 709, 72 N. E. 631; Speir v. Brooklyn, 139 N. Y. 6, 21 L.R.A. 641, 36 Am. St. Rep. 664, 34 N. E. 727, affirming 46 N. Y. S. R. 561, 19 N. Y. Supp. 665.

And a discharge of fireworks including powerful explosives, in a large city, at the junction of narrow streets, completely built up, when it is managed by private persons under no official responsibility, is unreasonable and unlawful, and constitutes a public nuisance for which the city is liable. Speir v. Brooklyn, supra.

So, while a municipal corporation is not liable for failure to pass ordinances prohibiting the discharge of fireworks in the public streets, it is bound to exercise due care to keep its streets in a safe condition, and is 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

CITY OF CHERRYVALE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

MINERVA HAWMAN.

SAME, Plff. in Err.,

v.

FRANK HAWMAN.

(— Kan. —, 101 Pac. 994.)

Municipal corporation — liability — mob — personal injuries — instruction.

1. In an action upon the statute making cities liable for injuries done by mobs, an instruction that "a 'mob' is an unorganized assemblage of many persons intent on unlawful violence, either to persons or property," is not erroneous because it makes no reference to a determination on the part of those composing the assemblage to resist opposition.

Same — charivari — "unlawful violence."

2. Where the members of a charivari party forcibly place a bride and groom in a wagon against their will, and draw them up and down the streets, they are engaged in an act of unlawful violence within the meaning of such definition. The fact that they are good natured and intend no serious harm to anyone does not absolve the corporation from liability.

liable for permitting dangerous obstructions or nuisances therein, and its duty cannot be avoided by passing ordinances or failing to pass them; and fireworks exhibited on an extensive scaffold, on a great thoroughfare, in the midst of a large city, where a vast multitude of people is assembled, if not a nuisance as a matter of law may properly be found such as matter of fact. Landau v. New York, supra.

And, as against one injured by fireworks discharged in a public street under a permit from the mayor of the city, acting under an ordinance, the city is bound by the mayor's construction of the ordinance in respect to his power to grant the permit; especially where such construction was a plausible one, and had been acted upon for years. Speir v. Brooklyn, supra.

And a resolution of the aldermen of a city, providing for the suspension of ordinances relating to the discharge of fireworks, so far as they apply to parades of political parties during a campaign, subject to such restrictions as the police department may deem necessary, is not a repeal of the ordinances relating to the discharge of fireworks, and prohibiting such explosion, either in form or substance, but constitutes a permission to display fireworks in the public streets by a limited number of persons for a limited period of time, so as to render the city liable where the display of fireworks

ERROR to the District Court for Montgomery County to review judgments in favor of each plaintiff in consolidated actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. P. Brooks, for plaintiff in error:

A mob consists of an assemblage of many people acting in a violent manner, defying the law, and committing or threatening to commit depredations upon property or violence to persons.

Marshall v. Buffalo, 50 App. Div. 152, 64 N. Y. Supp. 411.

The party pulling the wagon did not constitute a mob, as there was no evidence showing that the party was intent on unlawful violence.

Anderson v. Wellington, 40 Kan. 173, 2 L.R.A. 110, 10 Am. St. Rep. 175, 19 Pac. 719.

Mr. A. B. Clark for defendants in error.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Shortly after a marriage had taken place in the city of Cherryvale, a number of men gathered at the house where the bride and groom were staying, placed them in a wagon, and drew them by hand up and down the streets, making proclamation of their nuptials, and introducing them to passers-by in burlesque speeches, attracting a large crowd and occasioning some disorder and tumult. Frank Hawman, nine years of age, was run over by the wagon; his leg being thereby broken. He and his mother each sued the city under the statute making municipalities liable for all damages accruing in consequence of the action of mobs within their corporate limits. Gen. Stat. 1901, § 2501. The cases were tried together, the plaintiff recovering in each. The defendant prosecutes error.

The most serious question presented is whether the evidence justified a finding that the gathering constituted a mob within the meaning of the statute. The court instructed the jury that "a 'mob' is an unorganized assemblage of many persons intent on unlawful violence, either to persons or property." This definition, which appears to have originated in Abbott's Law Dictionary, is substantially that usually given by the courts and text writers. 27 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 812; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 835; 5 Words & Phrases, p. 4548. Its substance was incorporated without objection in the charge in Atchison v. Twine, 9 Kan. 350. It differs but little from the one asked by the defendant, which read: "A mob consists of an assemblage of many people acting in a violent manner, defying the law, and committing, or threatening to commit, depredation upon property, or violence to persons." Perhaps, however, this requested instruction suggests an element held in New York to be essential; namely, a determination on the part of the persons composing the assemblage to carry out their purpose notwithstanding any resistance encountered. The statute of that state makes municipalities liable for injuries done by "a mob or riot," and the court of last resort, holding that the two words indicate the same kind of disturbance, excepting as to the numbers taking part, has definitely adopted this definition of the latter: "A tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more assembling of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist one another against anyone who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually executing the same in a violent and turbulent manner; to the terror of the people, whether the act intended were of itself lawful or unlawful." Adamson v. New York, 188 N. Y. 255, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 925, 117 Am. St. Rep. 863, 80 N. E. 937, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 83. The word "riot" has often been defined, however, without referring either to a purpose to resist opposition or to the inspiring of terror. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 971; 7 Words & Phrases, p. 6240. And the statutory definition in New York omits both these elements, reading thus: "Whenever three or more persons, having assembled for any purpose, disturb the public peace by using force or violence to any person or to property, or threaten or attempt to commit such disturbance, or to do an unlawful act by the use of force or violence, accompanied amounts to a nuisance. Landau v. New York, supra.

IX. Conclusion.

Generally speaking the prevention of improper use of the streets of a municipal corporation involves the exercise of legislative or discretionary functions on the part of its officers, as distinguished from mandatory or ministerial ones, and therefore failure to act or negligent action imposes no liability; and this has usually been held to be the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

case though the municipality itself or its officers participated in the wrongdoing.

The position has been taken, however, that a municipal corporation having powers for the protection of the traveling public is bound to use them for the public good. And the rule is well supported by authority as well as reason that the duty of a municipal corporation to use due care to keep its streets in a safe condition renders it liable for failure to prevent any use of a street which amounts to a dangerous nuisance.

with the power of immediate execution of such threat or attempt, they are guilty of riot." In Marshall v. Buffalo, 50 App. Div. 149, 64 N. Y. Supp. 411, it is said: "This statute [making the city liable for injuries done by a mob or riot] is now substantially the same . . . as the original enactment of 1855. . . . At that time riot was not a statutory crime, and it may therefore be presumed that the legislature had the common-law definition in mind." In Kansas there is and was when the law here invoked against the city was enacted, a statute in effect defining a riot, for it provides (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 2269) that, "if three or more persons shall assemble together with intent to do any unlawful act with force and violence against the person or property of another, or to do any unlawful act against the peace . . . the person so offending, on conviction thereof, shall be fined in the sum not exceeding $200." The next section makes it the duty of any peace officer, when such an unlawful assembly takes place, "to make proclamation in the hearing of such offenders, commanding them, in the name of the state of Kansas, to disperse and to depart to their several homes or lawful employments," and, if such command is not obeyed, to summon aid and enforce it. The Kansas legislature, in passing an act the obvious purpose of which is to make municipal officers more vigilant in suppressing unlawful assemblies, must be deemed to have had in mind the language of its own statute in that regard, rather than any one of the several definitions recognized by the common law. We think the instruction given by the court was sufficient for the purpose of the case.

The question therefore narrows down to this: Was there any evidence of a purpose on the part of those engaged in the demonstration which occasioned the injury to employ force in an unlawful undertaking? There was testimony that several of the ring-leaders entered the room where the bride was, and, taking hold of her, made her go with them; that she, seeing that they were going to use force, said that rather than submit to this she would accompany them, and did so. This was some evidence of the use of unlawful violence. If the purpose of the visitors had been to inflict punishment in revenge for some real or fancied wrong, no one would doubt the illegal character of their act. The fact that nothing worse was intended than to subject the victim to embarrassment, annoyance, and humiliation in order to provide amusement for the spectators does not change its aspect in the eye of the law. True, the testimony of the bride showed that she cherished no resentment against the perpetrators of the prank, but 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

whether she consented to it at the time was a fair matter, under all the evidence, for the determination of the jury, and they must be deemed to have found that she did not. They also made a special finding, which was not wholly without support in the evidence, answering in the affirmative the question whether those who caused the injury disturbed the peace of anyone on the streets or along the streets over which the wagon was drawn.

There was clearly some evidence that the persons responsible for the injury to the boy constituted a mob, unless they can escape that designation by the plea that they were acting with perfect good nature and intended no real harm to anyone. It is hardly necessary to combat that plea with authorities, and yet cases in point are not wanting. In Bankus v. State, 4 Ind. 114, it proved unavailing in a prosecution for a riot, the court saying: "It is said the rioters were in good humor. Very likely, as they were permitted to carry on their operations without interruption; but with what motive were they performing these good-humored acts? Not, certainly, for the gratification of Wise and his family. They were giving them what is called a charivari, which Webster defines and explains as follows: 'A mock serenade of discordant music, kettles, tin pans, etc., designed to annoy and insult.'" In Gilmore v. Fuller, 198 Ill. 130, 60 L.R.A. 268, 65 N. E. 84, one member of a "charivari" party was accidentally shot by another. He sought to recover damages, but was denied relief on grounds thus stated: "The enterprise in which they were both engaged at the time of the injury was an unlawful one. The fact that it is called a 'charivari' does not make it any the less unlawful. The assemblage around the house of Daniel Hirsch in the nighttime, there engaged in disturbing a family in which a wedding had occurred, was an unlawful and illegal assemblage, and not only so, but a gathering of illegal trespassers. They were all, including both plaintiff in error and defendant in error, engaged in the same unlawful enterprise." In Higgins v. Minaghan, 78 Wis. 602, 11 L.R.A. 138, 23 Am. St. Rep. 428, 47 N. W. 941, damages were sought against the subject of the charivari for having shot one of its perpetrators. The plaintiff's counsel was permitted, in the examination of jurymen as to their qualifications, to ask whether they had any prejudice against that form of amusement. In expressing its view that such question should not have been allowed, the court said: "Every good, law-abiding citizen must and does condemn such unlawful and riotous assemblies. They are wholly indefensible in law and morals, and are reprobated by every well-disposed person. With the same propriety a juror called upon to try a man charged with a criminal act might be asked if he had or entertained any bias or prejudice for or against crime or criminals." In State v. Adams, 78 Iowa, 292, 43 N. W. 194, in reversing a conviction of manslaughter, the court used this language: "The party assembled in the night when the tragic affair took place is called a 'charivari.' Its object is about as barbarous as the pronunciation of its name. Whatever toleration it once had has long since passed away. Even when in vogue it was often attended with violence and bloodshed. If it ever was allowable to direct a jury that such an assemblage, with all its tumult and confusion, was not a great provocation to those annoyed and insulted by it, that time has passed away."

Complaint is made of the denial of a motion directed against a defective summons; but, as a sufficient summons was afterwards issued and served, the ruling became immaterial. Testimony that the mother of the injured boy was a widow was competent in her own case, and therefore the objection made to it is unfounded. The court struck out a portion of each of several interrogatories to the jury prepared by the defendant; but no material error was thereby committed, for this reason, among others, that the questions as they stood were compound. An instruction refused with regard to the extent of the injury was sufficiently covered in the general charge.

No error is discovered in the rulings complained of, and the judgment is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

WILLIAM W. HILL.

(— Ala. —, 50 So. 248.)

Conflict of laws—delayed telegram.

1. In case of breach of an undertaking to transmit a telegram from one state to another, where it is to be promptly delivered to one of its citizens, by failure promptly to deliver it after it has reached the latter state, its laws will govern in an action for the breach, brought either in contract or tort, in its courts, in determining whether or not damages can be allowed for mental suffering caused by the delay, where no negligence is alleged or shown to have occurred in the former state.

Same—foreign contract—express law.

2. In determining whether or not damages 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

can be allowed for mental anguish caused by failure promptly to deliver a telegram, the courts of the forum are not bound by the decisions of the courts where the contract was made, where the laws of that state do not contain any express declaration upon the subject.

Pleading—demurrer—damages.

3. The question of measure of damages alone cannot be raised by demurrer.

Evidence—delayed telegram—possession of telephone.

4. In an action for damages for failure promptly to deliver a telegram, the addressee may show that he had a telephone in his house and that there was also one in the office of the telegraph company.

Trial—affirmative charge—evidence.

5. The general affirmative charge cannot be given for defendant as to any count in the declaration which there is evidence to support.

Telegram—tender before office hours—effect.

6. The general affirmative charge cannot be given in favor of a telegraph company in an action for damages for failure promptly to deliver a message because the evidence shows that it was delivered for transmission before office hours of the office of destination, where the evidence also tends to show that no objection was made to receiving it at that time, and it was actually transmitted and received at such office prior to its opening time.

Jury—quotient verdict—agreement—effect.

7. A verdict is not vitiated by the fact that the jurors agreed among themselves to render a quotient verdict, if they do not in fact arrive at their verdict in that manner.

Appeal—damages—mental suffering—excess.

8. Eleven hundred dollars is not such an excessive allowance to a father for mental suffering in being deprived of the opportunity to assist in preparing the body of his child for burial, through the neglect of a telegraph company in failing promptly to deliver a message to him, that the appellate court can set the verdict aside as arbitrary or intended as punishment.

Case Note.—Law governing liability of telegraph company.

This subject is covered in notes to Hughes v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 63 L.R.A. 532, and Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lacer, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 751, and those notes will be supplemented by the present note.

Introductory.

The foregoing opinion evinces some uncertainty in the mind of the court as to the exact ground of its decision. There is a suggestion of four different grounds: (1) That the law of Alabama should govern be-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Montgomery in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages alleged to have been caused by defendant's failure promptly to deliver a telegram. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George H. Fearons and Rush-ton & Coleman, for appellant:

The lex loci contractus, and not the lex fori, governs the measure of damages.

Blount v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 126 Ala. 105, 27 So. 779; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Krichbaum, 132 Ala. 535, 31 So. 607; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rowell, 153 Ala. 295, 45 So. 73; Ligon v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 46 Tex. Civ. App. 408, 102 S. W. 430; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waller, 96 Tex.

W. 354; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Garrett, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 430, 102 S. W. 456; Reed v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 135 Mo. 661, 34 L.R.A. 492, 58 Am. St. Rep. 609, 37 S. W.

cause the breach of duty, whether regarded as growing out of a contract or imposed by law, occurred within that state; (2) that the law of Alabama should govern because that was the place of performance of the contract; (3) that, on grounds of public policy, a court of Alabama, especially as the telegram was to be delivered in that state and the fault occurred there, should refuse to abide by the rule of damages prescribed by the law of the state in which the contract was made, even assuming that in general that law should govern; (4) that, in any event, the court of Alabama should, by analogy to the practice of the Federal courts, follow its own judicial precedents as to the right to recover for mental anguish, irrespective of the precedents established by the courts of the state in which the contract was made, even conceding that, as a matter of substantive law, the rule of damages prescribed by the law of the latter state, correctly interpreted, should govern.

No one of these grounds seems to be sustained by the weight of authority, at least, of cases in which, as in WESTERN U. TELEG. CO. v. HILL, the action was ex contractu, and not ex delicto.

As is apparent from the earlier notes as well as the present note, the first ground has some support from cases where the action was ex delicto and under a statute permitting recovery for mental anguish in telegraph cases.

The second suggested ground is supported by Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lacer, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 751, and, as intimated in the note to that case, and shown more fully in the note to Southern Exp. Co. v. Gibbs, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 874, by a small minority of cases, including an Alabama case, involving carriers' contracts. It is, however, clearly opposed by the weight of authority of cases in which the action was ex contractu.

It is doubtful if there is any support to be found in the cases for the third ground as an independent ground. The courts, of course, very frequently refuse, on the ground of public policy of the forum, to enforce a contract or part of a contract that is valid by its proper law, and this exception is applied in a number of cases coming within the scope of this note, in respect of stipulations as to unrepeatable messages. In general, however, though it is possible that some authority to the contrary may be found, the exception based on the public policy of the forum is only applied negatively, by refusing to enforce a particular rule of law of another state, or declining to uphold the validity of a particular stipulation of the contract which is, in general, governed by the law of that state; and the courts very rarely, if ever, upon the grounds of public policy, subject a contract properly governed by the law of another state to a positive and affirmative substantive rule of the forum as such.

The fourth ground is also against the clear weight of authority if Federal cases are disregarded; and, as pointed out in the note to Root v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 212, the practice of the Federal courts in this respect furnishes no valid precedent for a similar practice by the state courts.

There would seem to be some authority, though not found in telegraph cases, for still another ground for the application of the law of Alabama permitting recovery for mental anguish; viz., that the measure of damages relates to the remedy rather than to the substantive rights of the parties, and is, therefore, governed by the lex fori as such. This, however, as a distinct ground, would clearly be against the weight of authority, since, as shown in the note to Gray v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 56 L.R.A. 301, the measure of damages, whether for breach of a contract or for a tort, is, by the great weight of authority, regarded as a matter pertaining to the substantive rights of the parties, rather than the remedy, and therefore not governed by the lex fori as such. This rule, however, does not prevent a court of the forum from refusing to enforce a rule of damages prescribed by the proper law, if it be deemed contrary to the public policy of the forum to do so.

Any principle of private international law which, in its application to a particular case, would subject the contract or cause of Postal Tele. & Cable Co.* 79 Miss. 670, 56 L.R.A. 486, 89 Am. St. Rep. 666, 31 So. 222; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1352.

Where a telegraph company has fixed certain hours within which all business transactions shall be consummated, it is under no obligation to receive for transmission any message outside of such office hours; but if it should receive a message at a time when the office at the other end of the line is closed, it may transmit the message within a reasonable time after the opening of the latter office.

action to the law of a state other than that of the forum, of course, presupposes that the law of the other state has been properly proven or conceded. As to the proper course to be pursued when the proper law is not proven or conceded, see note to Cherry v. Sprague, 67 L.R.A. 33.

The questions relating to the governing law of contracts for the transmission of telegrams are quite analogous to those in relation to the governing law of carriers' contracts generally. On the latter subject, see notes to Hughes v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 63 L.R.A. 513, and Southern Exp. Co. v. Gibbs, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874.

Law governing right to recover for mental anguish.

As shown in the earlier notes as well as in the present note, the majority of the courts, certainly in cases where the action is ex contractu, and not ex delicto, hold that the substantive rights of the party, including the right to recover damages for mental anguish from breach of the contract, are governed by the law of the state in which the contract is made and from which the telegram is sent, irrespective of the place where the fault or negligence occurs.

To the same effect are Western U. Tele. Co. v. Griffin (Ark.) 122 S. W. 489, infra (telegram sent from point in Arkansas to point in Mississippi; action by addressee; fault occurred in Mississippi; law of Arkansas permitting recovery for mental anguish applied); Hall v. Western U. Tele. Co. 139 N. C. 369, 52 S. E. 50 (telegram sent from point in Virginia to a point in North Carolina; action by sender; negligence and delay occurring in North Carolina; clearly implies that law of Virginia would govern as to right to recover for mental anguish); *Johnson v. The latter case was cited in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Hanley, 85 Ark. 263, 107 S. W. 1168, holding that there might be recovery for mental anguish although there was no negligence or delay in Arkansas so as to bring the case within the operation of the Arkansas statute, the telegram having been sent from a point in Tennessee to a point in Kentucky. It appeared, however, that a recovery of such damages was permitted both by the law of Tennessee and of Kentucky, so that the court was not obliged to choose between the two.

And a mere attempt to make immediate delivery, or the fact that the agent took it upon himself to transmit the message before office hours, did not make it the duty of the telegraph company to deliver the message before the office hours began.

As shown in the earlier notes, however, there are some cases that apply the law of the state in which the telegram was to be delivered and in which the fault or negligence occurred, where the action was ex delicto, or was brought under a statute providing for the recovery of damages for mental anguish in such cases. To the same effect is Gentle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 82 Ark. 96, 100 S. W. 742, where, in an action under the Arkansas statute, recovery for mental anguish was allowed, although the telegram was sent from a point in Missouri, the law of which does not permit recovery for mental anguish, to a point in Arkansas, the delay having occurred in the latter state.

So, in Balderston v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 79 S. C. 160, 60 S. E. 435,—an action by the addressee to recover for mental anguish suffered in consequence of wilful and wanton failure to deliver a telegram sent from a point in Pennsylvania to a point in South Carolina,—the action was regarded as ex delicto, and the statute of South Carolina permitting a recovery for mental anguish was held applicable, upon the theory that, as the place of delivery was in that state, the breach of duty necessarily occurred there, irrespective of the place where the failure or delay of transmission actually occurred. The court remarked that the decisions based on contracts were inapplicable. It may be remarked that the reasoning upon which the situs of the tort is here located in the state in which the telegram was to be delivered is quite similar to that upon which the court in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lacer, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 751, reached the conclusion that the place of delivery is the sole place of performance of a contract.

A similar conclusion, on the same ground, was reached in Hughes v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 72 S. C. 516, 52 S. E. 107, in an action by an addressee for mental anguish in consequence of the failure to deliver promptly a message sent from a point in Florida to a point in South Carolina.

Messrs. Campbell & Walker also for appellant.

Mr. S. H. Dent, Jr., for appellee:

The theory of the Balderston Case as to the situs of the breach of duty upon which the action ex delicto is based, if logically adhered to, would seem to deny the right to recover damages for mental anguish in an action ex delicto based on the South Carolina statute if the telegram was sent from a point in South Carolina to a point in another state, even though the actual negligence or delay occurred in South Carolina. This result, however, would be opposed to the actual decisions in Arkansas, which may, therefore, perhaps, be regarded as opposed to this theory of the Balderston Case, although agreeing with it on the general proposition that, in an action ex delicto, recovery may be had for mental anguish if the breach of duty occurred within the state having a statute permitting such a recovery, although the contract may have been made and the telegram sent from another state in which recovery for mental anguish is not allowed.

In Walker v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 75 S. C. 512, 56 S. E. 38, the court seems to have proceeded upon the assumption that, if the mistake in a telegram sent from a point in South Carolina to a point in Louisiana occurred in the former state, the tort of the defendant was committed within that state, and would come within the South Carolina statute permitting a recovery for mental anguish; though some parts of the opinion might seem to indicate that the decision was referred to the law of South Carolina under the general rule stated therein and sustained by citation of authorities, to the effect that a contract made in one state for the transmission of a telegram from a point in that state to a point in another is governed by the law of the former. If the first is the true ground, the case, while in harmony with the Arkansas cases, would seem to be in conflict with the logical implication of the Balderston Case as to the situs of the tort.

But whether, as in the Balderston Case, the tort is deemed to have its situs in the

That the plaintiff had a phone in his house and that there was a phone in the office of the defendant, in connection with the further fact that there had been a uniform custom between plaintiff and defendant to deliver messages to the plaintiff over the phone at his house, was competent to go to the jury for the purpose of determining whether or not the defendant had a reasonable time in which to deliver the telegram to the plaintiff.

Even though the telegraph company had the right to establish reasonable office hours, yet the receipt of a telegram outside of those hours, for the purpose of delivery, especially one of the nature that this was, is binding on the company, and the undertaking promptly to deliver the same, in disregard of the regulations as to the office hours, is binding upon the company.

state in which the telegram is to be delivered, irrespective of the place where the actual fault or negligence occurs, or whether, as apparently assumed in the Arkansas cases and in the Walker Case, the tort is deemed to have its situs in the state where the actual delay or negligence occurs, even though not the state in which the telegram is to be delivered, it is apparent that the statute of the state from which a telegram is sent, permitting a recovery for mental anguish, would not support an action ex delicto based on a violation of the statute, at least, unless the negligence or delay actually occurred in that state. Still, it does not necessarily follow that there could be no recovery in an action ex contractu in such a case (i. e., a case where a telegram is sent from a point in a state which, by statute, permits a recovery for mental anguish, to a state in which such recovery is allowed neither by statute nor the common law), since such an action might be regarded as falling within the general rule referred to at the beginning of the note, that, in an action ex contractu, the law of the state in which the contract is made and from which the telegram is sent governs.

And this position is taken in the recent case of Western U. Tele. Co. v. Griffin (Ark.) 122 S. W. 489, holding that recovery for mental anguish might be had by the addressee of a telegram sent from a point in Arkansas to a point in Mississippi, notwithstanding that the negligence in failing to deliver the telegram occurred in the latter state, by the law of which mental anguish

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by appellee against appellant to recover damages for failure to deliver within a reasonable time a telegram, and that, by reason of such failure on the part of the telegraph company, the plaintiff did not receive the message in time to reach Gainesville, in the state of Georgia, so as to be present with his wife and in time to prepare the body of their child for removal and interment, and claims as actual damages 40 cents paid to the defendant company for sending the message, and for mental pain and anguish suffered by the plaintiff in consequence thereof. To this complaint the defendant filed pleas, one setting up the general issue, and special plea No. 2, which was in words and figures as follows: "(2) For further answer to said complaint, this defendant says: That the contract for transmission and delivery of the telegram, for the breach of which this action was brought, was not made in the state of Alabama, but was entered into between the plaintiff's agent and the defendant in the state of Georgia, and was to be partly performed in the state of Georgia; that said contract is to be construed and governed according to the laws is not recoverable. In the opinion on the rehearing, this result was reconciled with the decision in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Ford, 77 Ark. 531, 92 S. W. 528 (cited in the earlier note), by withdrawing the statement in the opinion in that case, to the effect that no contract relation exists between the addressee of the message and the company, and referring the case to the general rule as laid down in Parmele's Wharton on Conflict of Laws, § 471f, to the effect that a contract made in one state or country for the transmission of a telegram from a point in that state or country to a point in another is governed by the law of the former. The decision in the Ford Case being referred to the exception stated in the same section, to the effect that the rule just stated does not operate to relieve a contract from the effect of a statute which is remedial rather than substantive, of the state in which the telegram is to be delivered, if the action is brought in that state.

It so happened that the Texas court of civil appeals in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Parsley (Tex. Civ. App.) 121 S. W. 226, prior to the decision in the Griffin Case had occasion to determine what rule the Arkansas courts would apply to just such a situation; the action in that case having been brought in Texas by the addressee, and the telegram having been sent from a point in Arkansas to a point in Oklahoma, and the negligence or delay having occurred in the latter state. The Texas court, after a somewhat extended discussion of the question, came to the same conclusion as that of the state of Georgia; that under the laws of the state of Georgia, as construed by its highest court, plaintiff cannot recover the special damages for mental pain and anguish claimed in each count of the complaint." To which special plea the plaintiff demurred, and the court sustained the demurrer. The trial was had upon the general issue, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $1,100.40. The defendant subsequently made a motion to set aside the verdict, because it was contrary to the evidence, because the verdict was excessive, and because it was a quotient verdict. On hearing this motion, upon the affidavit made in connection therewith, the court overruled the motion, and the defendant then and there duly excepted.

The facts as shown by the record are substantially as follows: The wife of plaintiff and his oldest child, three and one half years old, and the one who died, who was about twenty-one or twenty-two months old, were at Gainesville, Ga., during the summer of 1906. That the plaintiff was there a while and left about a week before the death of the child, and instructed his wife that, if any change took place in the condition of the child, to wire or phone him at once, in order that he might come back.

subsequently reached by the Arkansas court in the Griffin Case, upon reasoning substantially like that employed by the latter court. As a matter of fact, however, the Texas court was of the opinion, both on the original hearing and on the rehearing, that the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover for mental anguish, as permitted by the law of Texas (lex fori), even if it had been conceded that the law of Oklahoma should govern, it not being proved that the law of the latter state differed from the law of Texas on the point.

Law governing stipulation as to unrepeat- ed messages.

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pratt, 18 Okla. 274, 89 Pac. 237, an action for damages for a mistake in a telegram sent to plaintiff by his agent from a point in Indian territory to a point in Oklahoma, involving the validity of a stipulation requiring the repetition of a message as a condition of liability for damages, it was held that the law of Indian territory governed; though the law as laid down by the Federal courts as to the validity of such stipulations was held inapplicable, for the reason that the pleadings, tested by the law of Oklahoma, lex fori, did not show that the message was written on the blank of the company, as required by the Federal rule as a condition of the validity of such a stipulation.

The general rule that the contract is governed by the law of the state in which the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

At about 6:30 o'clock Sunday morning, on July 15, 1906, the landlady, Mrs. Bell, with whom Mrs. Hill was stopping, telephoned to the defendant company's office at Gainesville, asking the agent to take over the telephone, for transmission, a telegram reading as follows:

Gainesville, Ga., 7-15-1906.

W. W. Hill,

643 South Lawrence street, Montgomery.

Come on first train. Baby dying.

[Signed] Mrs. W. W. Hill.

That the operator got up, dressed, and went to the office of the telegraph company and sent the message at 6:43 A. M., Eastern time, to Atlanta, Georgia. That the amount paid for the message was 40 cents. That between 6 and 7 A. M., Central time, the same morning, another agent of the defendant company was on duty at the defendant's office at Montgomery for the purpose of testing wires and to send out linemen, etc. That at 6:15 A. M. Central he got a call from the chief clerk at Atlanta. That the chief clerk at Atlanta said to him, "Take this rush message." That he then took the message over the wire, wrote it out, and contract is made and from which the telegram is sent was recognized in Williamson v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. (N. C.) 65 S. E. 974, an action by the addressee of a telegram sent from a point in New York to a point in North Carolina, but the court refused, on the ground of public policy, to give effect to a stipulation in the contract as to unrepeat- ed messages, even assuming that that stipulation was valid according to the law of New York. This, of course, is a mere application of the exception, inherent in all general rules for ascertaining the governing law, that a court of one state will not enforce a contract otherwise governed by the law of another state, if to do so would be contrary to the distinctive policy of the forum.

The implication in Fox v. Postal Teleg. Cable Co. 24 L.R.A. (N.S.)—, would seem to be that, in an action ex contractu, the rights of the parties to a telegram would depend upon the law of the state in which the contract was made and from which the telegram was sent, and not upon the law of the state in which the telegram was to be delivered; but that, in an action ex delicto, the rights of the parties would be governed by the law of the latter state if the negligence or delay occurred in that state. The decision, however, is upon the ground that it would be contrary to the public policy of the forum to enforce the stipulation of a contract as to unrepeat- ed messages, even if valid by the law that would otherwise govern.

hung it on the file where the telegrams always hung and where the delivery clerk got them. That there was no one in the office at the time but him, and no messenger boys. That the office hours of defendant in Montgomery on week days were 7 o'clock in the morning, and on Sundays 8 o'clock. That the business was conducted at Montgomery as follows: The operators took the message over the wires, and that check boys came around and checked up the messages and carried them to the messenger clerk, and that he fixed them up and sent them out by the messenger boys. That the office was not open for business on Sunday mornings until 8 o'clock. That the agent in the office who received this message had only been in Montgomery about ten days, and did not know plaintiff's residence. That it also appeared that there was a telephone in the office of the Western Union Telegraph office, and that Mr. Hill also had a telephone at his residence. Plaintiff, Mr. Hill, got a message over the long distance telephone from Selma about 8 o'clock, informing him of the dangerous condition of his child, and that he left his house at about 8:20 and drove to the depot. That a messenger boy was started with this message at about 8:20. The boy, not finding him at home, followed him to the depot and delivered the message at 8:50. That a through train left Montgomery at 6:55 A. M., which went through Atlanta and by Gainesville, reaching Gainesville at 2 o'clock. That a local train left Montgomery for Atlanta at 9:15. Mr. Hill went on this train to Atlanta, wiring his wife to come to Atlanta. He met his wife in Atlanta with the corpse of the child. The train he went on made no connection at Atlanta. He reached Atlanta about 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon. That plaintiff telephoned from Atlanta to Gainesville about making arrangements for bringing the child home. That there was no relative of his wife at Gainesville at the time. That his wife reached Atlanta about 6 o'clock in the afternoon. That he was in Atlanta by himself from 2 o'clock until 6 o'clock. The child died about 8 o'clock in the morning of the 15th of July.

Various errors are assigned: First, to the sustaining of the demurrers to defendant's special plea No. 2 and the exclusion of the decision of the supreme court of Georgia in the case of Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 88 Ga. 763, 17 L.R.A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, 15 S. E. 901, and to the exclusion of certain sections of the Georgia Code, and to other rulings as to the evidence, and to the giving and refusing of certain charges, and to the refusal of the court to set aside 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) the verdict for the reason assigned in the motion.

Probably the most serious question involved by this appeal, and the assignment insisted upon most strenuously by counsel for appellant, is that, under the laws of Georgia, damages are not recoverable for mental anguish in cases for failure to deliver or delay in delivering telegrams, like the one in question, and that the contract, the basis of this action, being made in Georgia, the laws of Georgia govern as to the damages recoverable for the delay or failure to deliver the telegram in question. It is insisted by counsel for appellant that the lex loci contractus, and not the lex fori, governs the measure of damages in this case. The complaint contained two counts, and both are treated as counts ex contractu. It must be conceded that there is much conflict of authorities on the question as to what law governs the recovery in telegraph cases where a telegram is sent from one state to another; some holding that the law of the state in which the telegram originated governs, and others holding that the law of the state where it is delivered, or where the negligent act complained of or where the breach of the contract occurred, governs as to the measure of damages. It is conceded that the law of the forum will govern in matters pertaining to remedy; but it is insisted by appellant that by "remedy" here is meant such matters as pertain to the character and form of action, evidence, procedure, mode of redress, limitations, executions, etc., and that the damages to be allowed, if fixed or limited by law, pertain to the right, and not to the remedy. So far as we know, this question has not been before passed upon by this court with regard to telegraph cases, though there are a number of cases which may be analogous. As this court has said: "A contract is [usually] governed as to its nature, obligation, validity, and interpretation by the law of the place where it is made, unless . . . it is to be wholly performed in some other place, in which case the law of the place of performance, or the law which both parties had in view, must govern." [Southern R. Co. v. Harrison, 119 Ala. 539, 43 L.R.A. 385, 72 Am. St. Rep. 936, 24 So. 552.] 2 Mayfield's Digest, p. 668, subject, "Conflict of Laws."

It should be remembered that in this case, as in most cases for failure to deliver or delay in delivering telegraph messages, while a contract is spoken of and the actions are often brought as for a breach of a contract, in fact, there is no express contract or any express agreement. Whatever contract or agreement that exists is an implied one, and is usually, though not always, a breach of duty imposed by law, rather than a breach of an express contract; but it may be said that it is often, as in this case, a breach of an implied contract.

A "telegraph" is defined as an apparatus or machine used to transmit intelligence to a distant point by means of electricity. A "telegram" is a message or despatch transmitted by the telegraph. A telegraph is such a public use as to justify the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and to authorize the sovereign to regulate the business by a proper law. Telegraph companies are in many respects analogous to common carriers. Like common carriers, they are bound to serve the public without discrimination, and cannot evade liability for the consequences of their negligence by any contract. Unlike common carriers, they are not insurers. A telegraph company is therefore an important public agency and an instrument of commerce. Consequently the duties and obligations of a telegraph company do not arise entirely out of contract, being a quasi public institution. This duty and liability is not measured by the standard of private individuals. The contracts for sending and delivering messages such as the one in question give force and effect to these public duties which the law imposes. Some of these duties are to accept for transmission all proper messages tendered by persons who comply, or offer to comply, with the reasonable rules and regulations of the company; but the mere fact that the message offered did not comply with the rules of the company by being on its regular blanks, but is simply telephoned to the operator, does not affect its liability, where the negligence complained of is failure to deliver after transmission.

Upon the receipt of the message, it is the duty of the telegraph company to transmit it without delay; and if from any cause it is impossible to transmit the message, or if delay will be necessary, the company should inform the sender; certainly so if the message shows on its face the importance of hasty transmission and delivery. The message, when transmitted, must be delivered to the addressee or his authorized agent. Delivery should be made as soon after transmission as is reasonably practicable. The duty of early delivery is as necessary as the prompt transmission. What constitutes due diligence as to prompt delivery is usually a question for the jury, and usually depends upon the facts of each particular case. Telegraph companies have a right to provide reasonable regulations as to hours during which it will do business, and the reasonableness of the regulation will depend largely upon the character of business done, the locality of the office, and is often a mixed question of law and fact; but a telegraph company may waive its rules as to office hours, and it cannot receive or transmit a message out of its office hours, especially when that fact is not brought home to the patron, and then set up that regulation as a defense to an action for a breach of its contract, or for its negligence in failing to deliver. These rules, like any other rules of other companies, are designed for the benefit and protection of the company itself, and may be waived expressly or by implication. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, 93 Ala. 32, 30 Am. St. Rep. 23, 9 So. 414.

The rule as to the measure of damages against telegraph companies for failure to deliver or to deliver promptly, or for negligence in the transmission and delivery, unfortunately is not well settled, and the decisions of the various courts of the United States are far from being uniform, and many decisions of the same court of many states are conflicting. Actions against telegraph companies, like the one in question, are not necessarily ex contractu. They may be ex delicto for the breach of a duty; the right of action somewhat depending upon the implied contract of sending as to make the general rule relating to damages for breach of a contract applicable. Injury, in such cases, is more often the result of a breach of duty imposed by law, or a breach of duty growing out of the contract, than a mere breach of the contract. The contract usually serves merely to show the relation of the parties and the existence of a duty breached, which duty is more often imposed by law than by contract. There is rarely any express contract between the parties. Whatever exists is usually implied. Of course, parties can make contracts with regard to sending and delivery; but we are speaking now of the usual contracts.

Likewise, the authorities are far from uniform as to whether or not damages for mental anguish are recoverable in actions for failure or delay in delivering or transmitting telegrams; some courts holding that they are recoverable in certain actions, and not in others; some courts holding that they are recoverable under certain conditions, and not under others; and some holding that they are not recoverable in any action or under any condition. These various rulings and conflicting decisions involve various perplexing questions, as to all of which very few agree. One is: Whether the sendee as well as the sender can recover; whether the action is in contract or in tort; whether the mere violation of a contract as to injured feelings and mental anguish, disconnected and disassociated from physical injury or injury to estate, is an element of damages; to what extent the message must show on its face the relationship of the parties; and whether damages for mental anguish are in their nature punitive or compensatory. However, the rule has been settled in this state, and probably cannot be better or more succinctly expressed, than was done by Chief Justice McClellan in the case of Blount v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 126 Ala. 107, 27 So. 779, as follows: "The complaint in this case claims damages only for mental suffering. Such damages are not recoverable in actions for the nondelivery or negligent delivery of telegrams, except in case where there is a right of recovery aside from such injuries. There can be no recovery of actual substantive damages for physical injuries or injuries in estate here, for no such damages are claimed. There can be no recovery here of nominal damages as for a breach of contract,—to which we have held that damages for mental suffering may be superadded,—because the complaint is not upon contract, but purely in tort. No recovery apart from damages for mental suffering, in other words, can be had on this complaint, and therefore no recovery for mental suffering can be had." Or by Chief Justice Tyson in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Westmoreland, 151 Ala. 319, 44 So. 383, to this effect: "Such damages, notwithstanding their elusive character, are actual; but they are ordinarily not the natural result of a breach, and thus not within the contemplation of the parties. In cases where they are not clearly contemplated, it would be dangerous and unfair in the extreme to allow them. When the message is between persons of a close degree of relationship, and relates to exceptional events, such as sickness or death of such relations, in which a failure to deliver obviously comprehends mental distress and anguish, we have allowed such anguish as an item of damages; but to extend as a natural result the allowance on other occasions would, in our judgment, tend to promote and encourage a species of litigation more or less speculative in its nature, and unjust and oppressive in its results." Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crocker, 135 Ala. 492, 59 L.R.A. 398, 33 So. 45; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ayers, 131 Ala. 391, 90 Am. St. Rep. 92, 31 So. 78; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waters, 139 Ala. 653, 36 So. 773; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Crumpton, 138 Ala. 632, 36 So. 517; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, 18 Am. St. Rep. 148, 7 So. 419; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Krichbaum, 132 Ala. 535, 31 So. 607; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cunningham, 99 Ala. 314, 14 So. 579; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wilson, 93 Ala. 32, 30 Am. St. Rep. 23, 9 So. 414; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McNair, 120 Ala. 99, 23 So. 801. As was said by 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Chief Justice Tyson in Westmoreland's Case, above: "It is often a question of difficulty to determine, whether an action, from its mere nature or in its form, is in case or assumpsit. . . . Manifestly, the measure of damages in such cases cannot be altered in any substantial respect by the mere adoption of one form of action rather than another for the redress of the same grievance."

As to the main questions involved in this appeal, as to whether the laws of Georgia or of Alabama should control in determining whether or not damages for mental anguish were recoverable in this action, we are met again with the condition that there is more conflict in the decisions, if possible, than of the law of the two states, as to which of the two laws, if different, should control. The question has been treated fully in a note to the case of Gray v. Western U. Teleg. Co. as reported in 91 Am. St. Rep. 706, in which the annotator concedes the conflict, but probably is constrained to the view that the lex loci contractus controls in such cases. The question has also been reviewed by annotators in the Lawyers Reports Annotated. See note to case of Hughes v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 63 L.R.A. 532. This annotator also concedes the conflict and reviews many of the conflicting decisions. There are various other conflicting decisions than those reviewed by the annotators. The writer of the text in the American and English Encyclopædia of Law (2d ed. vol. 27, p. 1079) states the law applicable to this case as follows: "The fact that damages for mental anguish alone are not recoverable under the laws of the state from which the message was sent will not preclude a recovery of such damages in the state to which the message was directed, where the laws of the latter state permit such recovery. Likewise, a recovery for such damages may be had in the state whence the message was sent, although they may not be recoverable under the laws of the state where the message was to be delivered. But when the law of the place whence the message was sent and that of the place of delivery both refuse to recognize such damages, they cannot be recovered, although the action may have been brought in a jurisdiction which recognizes the right to recover them."

After a careful examination of all these authorities, we deem the sounder rule to be, in cases like the one at bar, though we do not decide that the same rule would apply in all cases, that the laws of Alabama should govern in this case, for the reason that the complaint, as well as the undisputed evidence, shows that whether the injury was the result of a breach of a contract, or whether it was the result of a breach of a duty growing out of a contract, or imposed by law, it occurred solely within the state of Alabama, and that the parties to the contract and the contract itself, if any existed, provided for or allowed the contract to be performed partly, at least, in Alabama. No breach of the contract occurred in the state of Georgia, either as alleged in the complaint or as shown by the evidence. No negligent act was alleged to have occurred in that state, or was shown by the evidence to have occurred there. The wrong complained of, and if shown to exist by the evidence, occurred in Alabama. The plaintiff resided in Alabama. He had a right to bring his action in the courts of Alabama, either for a breach of the contract or for a breach of duty imposed by law and the contract together. If the action had been in tort, rather than in contract, then we think it certain that the laws of Alabama, would control, and we can see no reason, though there is authority to the contrary, that the laws of Georgia should control. The general rule seems to be that, where the right of action is independent of a contract, the locus of the contract is immaterial and cannot affect the question of measure of damages recoverable. We also think that the great weight of authority supports the proposition that, where a tort is committed in one state and sued on in another, the lex loci delicti controls. So, if the action at bar could be construed as one of tort, disconnected from the contract, then, if the action were brought in Georgia, the laws of Alabama would control.

Chief Justice Stone, in Falls v. United States Sav. Loan, & Bldg. Co. 97 Ala. 433, 24 L.R.A. 174, 38 Am. St. Rep. 194, 13 So. 31, quoting from Chancellor Kent, says that "if a contract be made under one government, and is to be performed under another, and the parties had in view the laws of such other country in reference to the execution of the contract, the general rule is that the contract, in respect to its construction and force, is to be governed by the law of the country or state in which it is to be executed." [2 Com. 459.] And in quoting from Mr. Story, he says: "Where the contract is either expressly or tacitly to be performed in any other place, then the general rule is, in conformity to the presumed intention of the parties, that the contract, as to its validity, nature, obligation, and interpretation, is to be governed by the law of the place of performance." [Conf. L. § 280.] He also quotes from the Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, as follows: "As a general rule, the validity of a contract is to be determined by the law of the place where it is made, unless it appears on its face that it was to be performed or was made in reference to the laws of some other place, in which case it will be governed by the laws of the place of the performance." [Vol. 3, pp. 543, 544.] This language was quoted by the learned chief justice, which evidently met his sanction, though it was made in a dissenting opinion, in which he held that the contract in question was governed by the laws of Minnesota, rather than of Alabama; the majority of the court holding that it was governed by the laws of Alabama.

It is true, as said by the same learned chief justice in the same case, that, in entering into contracts, if nothing appear to the contrary, the law of the place silently becomes a part of the contract, and determines the measure of the rights it secures, but adds: "This right of comity, however, has limitations. No state will enforce contracts or redress grievances entered into or suffered in another state . . . if the enforcement involve a breach of legal or moral right as maintained in the law of the forum." It is likewise a fundamental principle that the laws of the state can have no binding force proprio vigore outside of the territorial limits and jurisdiction of the state enacting them. Consequently, any provision found in the law of another state, authorizing the making of a contract, which is obnoxious to the laws of Alabama, as to such obnoxious provisions the contract will not be enforced in Alabama; but it will be enforced in Alabama only to the extent that it is lawful in Alabama; while there are respectable authorities holding that, where a contract is entered into in one state, to be performed partly in that state and partly in another, the laws of the state in which the contract was made will control as to the measure of damages; but, in a case like this, where the contract, of necessity, so far as the breach complained of was concerned, must be performed wholly within the state of Alabama, then this rule would not apply; that is to say, the breach complained of was delay in delivering a telegram. The parties intended that the telegram should be delivered in Alabama, and it was not contemplated that it could or would be delivered in Georgia. While a part of the transmitting would probably be performed in Georgia, that part for the breach of which this action is brought was to be performed wholly within the state of Alabama; and, as the breach occurred here, and a part of the injury, at least, was suffered here, we think the laws of Alabama, and not the laws of Georgia, should control as to the measure of damages. If the breach had occurred in Georgia, rather than in Alabama, then, for the same reason, the law of Georgia should control, rather than that of Alabama.

There is another strong reason, if not a conclusive one, why the laws of Alabama should govern in this case. It will be observed that the laws of Georgia did not deny that the plaintiff in a case like this suffers damage for mental anguish; but the court merely declares that they are of such nature that they are not recoverable in courts and under the laws of Georgia. We do not think that the courts of Alabama are bound in this respect by the courts of Georgia; but, as to whether or not such damages, if suffered, are recoverable in an action like this when brought in the courts of Alabama, is properly decided by the court of Alabama untrammelled by the decisions of any other court. This is the rule that seems to be adopted by the Federal court with regard to the recovery of damages for mental anguish, no matter what may be the laws of the state in which the contract was made, or in which the breach occurred, or in which the action is brought. The Federal court holds to the rule that such damages are not recoverable in the Federal court, and that the question is one with respect to which such court will exercise an independent judgment, and will not be bound by the holding of the courts of the states in which the cases arise. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Sklar, 61 C. C. A. 281, 126 Fed. 295; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wood, 21 L.R.A. 706, 3 C. C. A. 432, 13 U. S. App. 317, 57 Fed. 471.

It therefore follows that there was no error in the court sustaining demurrer to plea No. 2, nor in excluding the evidence offered by the defendant as to the laws of Georgia. The demurrer to the plea could have been properly sustained for the reason that it was intended as a plea in bar, and only went to the measure of damages, not denying the right of recovery as to nominal damages. Such questions should be raised by objections to the evidence, motions to strike, or instructions by the court.

We likewise see no error in the court allowing plaintiff to prove that he had a telephone in his house, and that there was one in the defendant company's office at Montgomery, and that he had frequently received messages from the defendant company over the telephone.

We find no error in the refusal to give any of the charges requested by the defendant. There was certainly evidence tending to support all the material averments of the complaint, and consequently the general affirmative charge for the defendant could not have been given as to any one of the counts. What we have said as to the right to recover damages for mental suffering disposes of the charge which sought to limit the recovery to other damages than for mental suffering.

Nor do we think there was any error in that part of the oral charge excepted to by the defendant, to the effect that, notwithstanding the defendant company may have adopted office hours, if it undertook to transmit and deliver a telegram, the jury had a right to look to that circumstance, the nature of the telegram, and everything else in the case, in saying whether or not the defendant was negligent in failing to deliver the telegram sooner than it did deliver it. As stated in the opinion above, a telegraph company has a right to adopt rules as to office hours and have reasonable rules for its own protection; but it also has a right to waive them, and does waive them as to office hours when it accepts a message for transmission and delivery without the office hours without informing the sender of such rules, or without explaining to him that it would not be transmitted or delivered until the time. Of course, if the telegraph agent so receiving had no knowledge of the office hours at other offices, and was not chargeable with notice or knowledge thereof, so receiving the message would not be a waiver. However, we hold that in this case there was sufficient evidence to authorize the submission to the jury of the question of waiver of the rules, and to prevent the giving of the general affirmative charge to the jury on this question.

There was likewise no error in the court's overruling defendant's motion for a new trial. The evidence affirmatively showed that it was not void because it was a quotient verdict. The fact that the jurors agreed among themselves to render a quotient verdict, and afterwards declined to do so, and in fact did not arrive at their verdict in that manner, does not make the verdict a quotient one, and is no reason for setting the verdict aside. Whether or not the verdict was excessive no one can tell. There is no standard or rule of computation by which the amount can be determined in this or similar cases. There may be cases where it would be so great that the court might say that it was arbitrary or intended as punishment when no such punitive damages could be allowed, and in such case it might be set aside; but this is not such a case.

Finding no error in the record, the case must be affirmed.

Dowdell, Ch. J., and Simpson and Denson, JJ., concur in the conclusion reached in this case without committing themselves to all that is said in the opinion.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

D. G. BEAUCHAMP, Appt.,

v.

ADOLPH BERTIG et al.

(90 Ark. 351, 119 S. W. 75.)

Judgment — faith and credit — removing disability.

1. The requirement of the Federal Constitution that the judgments of one state shall be given full faith and credit in another does not render a judgment of one state removing an infant's disability to convey land effective for that purpose in another state.

Same — conflicting policy.

2. The execution by infants in a state which has removed their disability, of a deed conveying title to land in another state, will not, under the rule of comity, render the deed an irrevocable conveyance in the latter state, where its policy is to regard such deeds as revocable upon the infant's attaining full age.

Conflict of laws — infant's deeds — revocability.

3. The binding effect under the lex loci contractus of covenants for title in an infant's deed to land situated in another state will not be given effect by the courts of the latter state in contravention to the public policy of that state, which permits infants to disaffirm such covenants upon attaining majority.

Same — covenant for title.

4. The obligation of covenants for title in a deed is governed by the law of the place where the land is situated, and not by the lex loci contractus.

Infants — deed — disaffirmance.

5. A deed by which persons, on reaching their majority, "grant, bargain, sell, and convey" to a stranger property which they had during infancy deeded to another, for the purpose of disaffirming their former deed, and with knowledge that the later grantee is to institute suit for possession of the property, is a sufficient disaffirmance of the former deed, where the statute permits a conveyance of land held adversely.

Same — fraud — right to raise question.

6. Purchasers of land from an infant cannot defeat a recovery of the property by one to whom the infant deeded it on reaching his majority, on the ground that the later deed was obtained by fraud.

Same — joint deed — disaffirmance — dower.

7. The disaffirmance by infants, upon reaching their majority, of a deed which they executed jointly with their mother, of property in which she had a dower interest, destroys the merger of such interest, and leaves in the grantee the equitable title to her dower right.

Same — duty of second grantee.

8. One who purchases from infants, upon their reaching their majority, land which another had purchased from them during their minority, must restore to the former purchaser the consideration paid by him, including claims against the property which had been satisfied by him as part of the consideration for the conveyance.

Same — agent's commissions.

9. One who purchases from infants, upon their reaching majority, land which they had deeded to another during infancy, is not bound to reimburse to the latter money he had paid his own agent for conducting the negotiations leading to his purchase.

Same — contract — performance — possession.

10. One who purchases from infants, upon their reaching their majority, land which they had conveyed to another during minority, under a contract to repay the latter what he had paid the infants, must comply with his contract before he can secure possession of the property.

Same — tenancy — removal of buildings.

11. A tenant having the right to remove buildings at the end of his lease, who purchases the realty from the infant owners during their minority, is restored to his rights under the lease upon their disaffirmance of their sale by conveying the property to another after reaching majority.

Same — lease — authority of court.

12. A lease, under authority of court, of minor's property, which is to extend beyond their minority, is valid, where the state has given the court plenary power over such estates.

Same — purchaser's rights — rents.

13. One who, after the majority of infants who during minority joined with their mother in a deed of real estate belonging to their father's estate, to one having a lease of the property which has not expired, purchased the property from them during the mother's lifetime, is entitled to rents from the date of his deed upon the property, less those represented by the widow's dower interest.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Greene County dismissing a complaint filed to recover possession of certain land and quieting title in defendants in accordance with the relief demanded in their cross complaint. Reversed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

In 1885 H. H. Sitterding, Sr., died, owning and occupying a certain lot in the town of Paragould, Greene county, Arkansas. He left a widow and two minor sons, George and Herman. The widow intermarried with one Note. — As to law governing covenant in deed or mortgage of real property, see case note to Clement v. Willett, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1094.

Thomas, and soon afterward moved to Oklahoma, taking her son George with her. Herman was sent to live with relatives in Indiana. On the 23d of January, 1892, the present guardian and curator of George and Herman, under orders of the probate court, leased the lot in controversy to appellees for a period of eleven years, for the sum of $300 per year. Under the terms of the lease, all the improvements made on the lot by appellees would remain personal property, and when the lease expired appellees were given the privilege of removing same. The appellees took possession under the lease and erected on the leased lot and on another lot adjoining, which they owned, a two-story brick business house, at an expense of between $9,000 and $10,000.

On the 28th day of August, 1899, under the orders of the probate court, the guardian and curator executed another lease on the lot mentioned to appellees for a period of ten years, upon substantially the same terms as the former lease. Under the last lease, appellees were given six months from the expiration of the lease to sell or remove the improvements made thereon, and during such time they were to pay rent at the rate of $25 per month.

On the 3d day of May, 1904, the district court of the territory of Oklahoma rendered a judgment removing the disabilities of non-age of George and Herman Sitterding, specifically authorizing them to sell the lot mentioned above, which is described in the judgment. On the 5th day of May, 1904, a deed was executed by Emma Thomas (formerly Sitterding), George Sitterding, and Herman Sitterding, in which, for the consideration of $3,000, they did "grant, bargain, sell, and convey" unto Bertig Bros. (appellees) the lot, describing it, and covenanted with them to forever warrant and defend the title against all lawful claims. The deed was duly recorded in Greene county on June 6, 1904.

George Sitterding came of age July 30, 1905. Herman reached his majority March 15, 1907. On the 6th day of April, 1907, George and Herman Sitterding, for the consideration of $3,000, duly executed to appellant, D. G. Beauchamp, a deed in which they did "grant, bargain, sell, and convey" unto Beauchamp, and unto his heirs and assigns forever, "all their right, title, and interest in and to" the lot mentioned above. The deed contained no specific covenants to warrant and defend the title.

On the 8th of June, 1907, appellant brought suit in the circuit court of Greene county against appellees for the lot in controversy, claiming the title and right to possession of same under his deed from George and Herman Sitterding, which he made an exhibit. The complaint, after describing the lot and deraigning the title thereto, alleged that the appellees were in possession of said property under and by virtue of the deed of conveyance executed by George Sitterding and H. H. Sitterding, Jr., on May 5, 1904, while the parties were minors; and it charged that they avoided and repudiated the same afterwards by executing a deed to appellant. It was alleged that appellant had tendered to appellees the sum of $1,720, the amount paid by them to the Sitterdings, which the appellees refused to accept; that appellees were liable to him for rentals on the lot in controversy for a period of three years and one month at the rate of $100 per month. Appellant prayed judgment for possession, and for damages in the sum of $2,500, and for all proper relief.

The answer and cross complaint of appellees set up title to the lot sued for, under the deed from Emma Thomas and George and Herman Sitterding of May 5, 1904, denied that either of said heirs was under any disability when they executed the deed, and denied that appellees only paid $1,720 for the lot, but alleged that they paid $4,100,—that is, $3,000 to the grantors themselves, and discharged their obligations for $1,100 more. The proceedings of the district court of Oklahoma were set forth in extenso, and the duly authenticated copy of that judgment was properly pleaded; and it was alleged that under that judgment George and Herman Sitterding had the power to make the deed under which appellees claimed the same as if they had been of full age, and that under the Constitution and the Revised Statutes of the United States full faith and credit must be given to that judgment here. The terms of the lease were set forth, and the possession of appellees thereunder and the improvements made by them, and it was alleged that the appellant had notice of appellees' rights under the lease. The lease was pleaded in bar of appellant's right to recover possession of the premises. The cross complaint contained the further allegation "that on April 6, 1907, the plaintiff, well knowing the contract aforesaid and of the payment by defendants of the purchase money for said premises, for a consideration of $250, acquired from said George W. Sitterding and H. H. Sitterding a deed of conveyance to said premises, which has been recorded in the office of said recorder of Greene county;" and they charged that whatever title he may have so acquired he held in trust for the defendants.

It was further averred that no dower had ever been assigned to said widow, Emma Thomas, and that by said conveyance she had assigned to them all of her dower rights in the said premises, and that they were the owners thereof. And they further averred that the premises consisted of a lot 50x100 feet, entirely covered by the two-story brick business house erected by defendants under said lease, and that it was indivisible, so as to carve out said dower interest without prejudice.

There was a further allegation that the plaintiff procured George W. Sitterding to join in the deed to plaintiff for the premises in controversy by representing to him that the plaintiff represented defendants and wanted said deed from him (the said Sitterding) in order to affirm and make valid the deed which he, Sitterding, had previously made to defendants, and that said Sitterding agreed, for the sum of $100 paid by plaintiff to him, to make a new deed affirming and ratifying his previous conveyance, and that he executed said deed to the plaintiff, with the intention and for the purpose of thereby confirming and ratifying the title previously conveyed to defendants.

They prayed that the deed from George Sitterding to plaintiff be taken as a confirmation and ratification of the previous conveyance made to defendants; also, that whatever title was acquired by plaintiff be decreed to belong to them and be divested out of him and vested in them, or, failing in this, that the said dower interest be adjudged to them, and that a lien be imposed upon said premises for the value of such improvements, or that the right to remove the improvements be otherwise protected; and for other relief.

The answer of appellant to the cross complaint of appellees contained allegations of fact to show that the district court of Oklahoma had no jurisdiction to render the judgment removing the disabilities of George and Herman Sitterding, and such jurisdiction was denied. Appellant denied that more than $1,720 was paid to the Sitterdings by appellees, denied that he held the title in trust for appellees, denied that the lease to appellees was of any value, or that appellees had the right to remove the building from the lot in controversy. He denied that appellant had procured the deed from George Sitterding by representing himself to be representing appellees for the purpose of procuring a deed affirming or making valid the deed previously made to appellees, denied that the deed was made by George Sitterding to appellant for the purpose of ratifying the deed made by George Sitterding to appellees, but alleged that George made the deed to appellant for the consideration of $125 paid him by appellant, and that he knew when he executed the deed that it was not to confirm any previous deed. The appellant further denied "that he procured an execution of said deed for a consideration of $250, but says 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that the actual consideration for said execution was the money that the said George W. Sitterding and Herman H. Sitterding had received from the defendants herein, together with the further sum of all the indebtedness that was probated against the estate of Herman H. Sitterding, Sr., and the further sum of $500."

The cause, on motion of appellees, was transferred to the chancery court and heard there upon the pleadings, exhibits, and depositions. The court dismissed the appellant's complaint and quieted the title in appellees. Appellant prosecutes this appeal. Further facts will be stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hawthorne & Hawthorne for appellant.

Messrs. J. D. Block, Huddleston & Taylor, Morris M. Cohn, and F. H. Sullivan for appellees.

Wood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The Constitution of the United States declares that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state." And § 905 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 677, provides a mode for the authentication of such records, and declares that the "records and judicial proceedings so authenticated shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which they are taken."

Hancock Nat. Bank v. Farnum, 176 U. S. 640, 44 L. ed. 619, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 506, was a suit in Rhode Island on a judgment recovered in Kansas. Judge Brewer, in passing upon the duly authenticated record of the Kansas court, after setting out the provisions of the Constitution and the acts of Congress, said (quoting earlier decisions): "It is held that the same effect is to be given to the record in the courts of the state where produced as in the courts of the state from which it is taken." Our own court, in many decisions in suits in this state based on foreign judgments, has announced the same rule; and, indeed, no other rule in such cases could be announced. Hensley v. Force, 12 Ark. 756; Buford v. Kirkpatrick, 13 Ark. 33; Peel v. January, 35 Ark. 331, 37 Am. Rep. 27; Lockhart v. Locke, 42 Ark. 17; Glass v. Blackwell, 48 Ark. 50, 2 S. W. 257; Williams v. Renwick, 52 Ark. 160, 20 Am. St. Rep. 158, 12 S. W. 331; Hallum v. Dickinson, 54 Ark. 311, 15 S. W. 775.

Appellees rely upon these cases as authority for their contention that the duly authenticated record of the judgment of the district court of Oklahoma should have the same effect as if it had been a judgment rendered here removing the disabilities of nonage of the Sitterdings. But this is not a suit based on a judgment rendered in Oklahoma. Moreover, these decisions are not in conflict with, but, on the contrary, only declare and uphold, the view that the provisions of the Constitution and Revised Statutes above were only intended to and did establish a rule of evidence. The Supreme Court of the United States in Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, at page 112, 33 L. ed. 538, 541, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269, 270, says: "The Constitution did not mean to confer any new power on the states, but simply to regulate the effect of their acknowledged jurisdiction over persons and things within their territory. It did not make the judgments of the states domestic judgments to all intents and purposes, but only gave a general validity, faith, and credit to them as evidence. No execution can be issued upon such judgments without a new suit in the tribunals of other states, and they enjoy not the right of priority or privilege or lien which they have in the state where they are pronounced, but that only which the lex fori gives to them by its own laws, in their character of foreign judgments."

In Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, at pages 291 and 292, 32 L. ed. 239, 243, 244, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370, 1375, it is said: "Those provisions establish a rule of evidence, rather than of jurisdiction. While they make the record of a judgment rendered after due notice in one state conclusive evidence in the courts of another state or of the United States of the matter adjudged, they do not affect the jurisdiction, either of the court in which the judgment is rendered or of the court in which it is offered in evidence. Judgments recovered in one state of the Union, when proved in the courts of another government, whether state or national, within the United States, differ from judgments recovered in a foreign country in no other respect than in not being re-examinable on their merits nor impeachable for fraud in obtaining them, if rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties."

The supreme court of Georgia says: "This clause ['full faith and credit'] is not to be received in the fullest import of the terms. It is referable to such records, etc., as pleadings and evidence. Any other construction, which would give the same effect to a foreign judgment as to our own, would indeed be to give the laws of one state complete operation in another—would be to make a judgment in one state bind property in another." Joice v. Scales, 18 Ga. 725; 23 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1545, 1546, 1556, 1557, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) and cases cited in notes; M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. 312, 10 L. ed. 177; Brengle v. McClellan, 7 Gill & J. 434-438; Shelton v. Johnson, 4 Sneed, 672-682; 70 Am. Dec. 265.

Conceding, then, the validity of this foreign judgment, we have given it the full faith and credit that it must receive when we consider it conclusive evidence that the district court of Oklahoma has adjudged a majority status for the Sitterdings before they were twenty-one years of age. Bowen v. Johnson, 5 R. I. 112, 73 Am. Dec. 49; Olney v. Angell, 5 R. I. 198, 73 Am. Dec. 62. But that is not the equivalent of a judgment here fixing such status for the minors. Far from it. Under our statute an infant does not attain his majority until he is twenty-one years old. Kirby's Dig. § 3756.

2. The proof is that the deed of the Sitterdings to appellees, conveying the lot in controversy, was executed in Oklahoma, and appellees contend that the effect of the judgment was to make the deed an irrevocable conveyance. The judgment of a court under a statute authorizing the removal of disabilities of nonage could not be of any higher authority or possess greater sanctity than a direct enactment declaring majority at an age of twenty-one years. Proctor v. Hebert, 36 La. Ann. 250. That enlightened sentiment of international comity, based upon the principles of right and justice as well as good policy, generally causes the courts of one state to enforce, as far as practicable, the laws of another as to contracts and other transactions therein between private individuals. Minor, Conf. L. §§ 3 and 4. But this rule of private international law or comity cannot be invoked "where the enforcement of the foreign law would contravene some established and important policy of the state of the forum," nor where the question relates to the transfer of the title to real property. Minor, Conf. L. § 5; Smead v. Chandler, 71 Ark. 505, 65 L.R.A. 353, 76 S. W. 1066. Says Mr. Minor: "Since immovable property is fixed forever in the state where it lies, and since no other state can have any jurisdiction over it, it follows necessarily that no right, title, or interest can be finally acquired therein, unless assented to by the courts of that state, in accordance with its laws." Minor, Conf. L. § 11; Oakey v. Bennett, 11 How. 33, 13 L. ed. 593; 1 Wharton, Conf. L. § 276b, p. 617. This general principle has been often recognized by this court. McDaniel v. Grace, 15 Ark. 465; Clopton v. Booker, 27 Ark. 482; Williams v. Nichol, 47 Ark. 254, 1 S. W. 243.

It has long been the rule in this state that an infant's deed conveys title to his real estate subject to his right to disaffirm when he becomes of age. Bagley v. Fletcher, 44 Ark. 153; Harrod v. Myers, 21 Ark. 502, 76 Am. Dec. 409. See also Stull v. Harris, 51 Ark. 294, 2 L.R.A. 741, 11 S. W. 104; Watson v. Billings, 38 Ark. 278, 42 Am. Rep. 1; Fox v. Drewry, 62 Ark. 316, 35 S. W. 533; Tobin v. Spann, 85 Ark. 556, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 672, 100 S. W. 534.

It is deemed a wise policy of our law for the protection of the landed estate of infants to give them the untrammelled right to avoid their deeds on attaining their majority. The right is often their only shield against fraud, and their only remedy against improvident contracts. It has been held of such transcendent importance that an infant will not be estopped to assert it even by his own fraudulent representations as to his age after he appears to be full grown. Tobin v. Spann, supra. If the consideration for the deed has passed out of his hands, he may rescind without returning it. 22 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 537; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Higgins, 44 Ark. 293. See also Stull v. Harris, supra.

No rule of comity would justify ignoring this settled policy upon which property rights have been grounded, to meet the demands of any case, be it ever so meritorious and exceptional in its facts. 2 Wharton, Conf. L. § 428a. So, if we consider the deed and its covenants as one instrument and as an executed contract transferring the title to land, then, as we have seen, the lex rei sitæ prevails. Minor, Conf. L. § 11, note 5, §§ 12 and 174; 1 Wharton, Conf. L. §§ 276a, 276b; Sneed v. Ewing, 5 J. J. Marsh. 460, 22 Am. Dec. 41; Thomson v. Kyle, 39 Fla. 582, 63 Am. St. Rep. 193, 23 So. 12.

But appellees argue that the covenants for title are separate contracts, creating personal obligations, and therefore governed by the lex loci contractus. In Bagley v. Fletcher, supra, it is said that "the covenants in a deed constitute no part of the conveyance, but are separate contracts." In the same case it was said that the infant "was not bound by the covenants contained in her deed," and that these covenants were void. Hence, by the authority of this case, even if the covenants be considered as independent contracts, they are void, or, rather, voidable, just as is the deed, and fall with it when it is disaffirmed. If an infant has the right to disaffirm his deed on reaching majority, as we have so often held, it would be incompatible with such holding to say that he could enter into covenants in the same deed or otherwise that would defeat such right. See Connor v. McMurray, 2 Allen, 202, at page 204. Therefore, even if these covenants create obligations that would, generally speaking, be governed by the lex loci contractus, still that law would 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) have to give way to the local policy as declared by this court.

The covenants under consideration, however, are not personal in the sense that the obligations incurred under them are governed by the law concerning movables. There are many contracts relating to real estate that are so governed; for example, covenants of seisin, of right to convey, and against encumbrances, and executory contracts for deeds or other instruments containing covenants that do not run with the land. All these contracts, in the absence of statutory law or an expressed intention to the contrary, are usually governed by the law of the place where such contracts are made. Such is not the case, however, with contracts containing covenants that run with the land, as, for instance, covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment; or covenants that can only be performed where the land lies, as, for instance, to defend title, to pay taxes, to repair, etc. These are governed by the law of the place where the land is situated. Minor, Conf. L. § 185.

This court early recognized the distinction between personal covenants (using the word "personal" with reference to situs) and covenants that run with the land and therefore savor of the realty. In Logan v. Moulder, 1 Ark. 313, 33 Am. Dec. 338, we held that covenants of warranty belong to the latter class. See also Ross v. Turner, 7 Ark. 132, 44 Am. Dec. 531. We believe the authorities with practical unanimity hold to this rule, observing the distinction announced by this court between personal covenants and those that run with the land. Rawle, Covenants, §§ 202 and 213; 1 Wharton, Conf. L. § 276d, pp. 630, 631.

A careful analysis and differentiation of the cases cited by the learned counsel for appellees will discover, we think, that when this distinction is kept in mind they are not in conflict with the doctrine we have expressed. As Mr. Wharton says: "The distinction, as affecting the governing law, between questions that relate to the title to the property and those that relate merely to the personal rights and obligations of the parties, has been expressly recognized in a number of cases." 1 Wharton, Conf. L. § 276d, p. 626. He cites, as supporting this view, the leading case of Polson v. Stewart, 167 Mass. 211, 36 L.R.A. 771, 57 Am. St. Rep. 452, 45 N. E. 737.

We cannot review all the cases, but the above case of Polson v. Stewart is especially relied on, and may be taken as an example of them all. It was a suit for specific performance, to enforce a covenant made by a husband with his wife in North Carolina, by which he contracted to surrender all of his marital rights in certain lands of hers in

There is another strong reason, if not a conclusive one, why the laws of Alabama should govern in this case. It will be observed that the laws of Georgia did not deny that the plaintiff in a case like this suffers damage for mental anguish; but the court merely declares that they are of such nature that they are not recoverable in courts and under the laws of Georgia. We do not think that the courts of Alabama are bound in this respect by the courts of Georgia; but, as to whether or not such damages, if suffered, are recoverable in an action like this when brought in the courts of Alabama, is properly decided by the court of Alabama untrammelled by the decisions of any other court. This is the rule that seems to be adopted by the Federal court with regard to the recovery of damages for mental anguish, no matter what may be the laws of the state in which the contract was made, or in which the breach occurred, or in which the action is brought. The Federal court holds to the rule that such damages are not recoverable in the Federal court, and that the question is one with respect to which such court will exercise an independent judgment, and will not be bound by the holding of the courts of the states in which the cases arise. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Sklar, 61 C. C. A. 281, 126 Fed. 295; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wood, 21 L.R.A. 706, 3 C. C. A. 432, 13 U. S. App. 317, 57 Fed. 471.

It therefore follows that there was no error in the court sustaining demurrer to plea No. 2, nor in excluding the evidence offered by the defendant as to the laws of Georgia. The demurrer to the plea could have been properly sustained for the reason that it was intended as a plea in bar, and only went to the measure of damages, not denying the right of recovery as to nominal damages. Such questions should be raised by objections to the evidence, motions to strike, or instructions by the court.

We likewise see no error in the court allowing plaintiff to prove that he had a telephone in his house, and that there was one in the defendant company's office at Montgomery, and that he had frequently received messages from the defendant company over the telephone.

We find no error in the refusal to give any of the charges requested by the defendant. There was certainly evidence tending to support all the material averments of the complaint, and consequently the general affirmative charge for the defendant could not have been given as to any one of the counts. What we have said as to the right to recover damages for mental suffering disposes of the charge which sought to limit the recovery to other damages than for mental suffering.

Nor do we think there was any error in that part of the oral charge excepted to by the defendant, to the effect that, notwithstanding the defendant company may have adopted office hours, if it undertook to transmit and deliver a telegram, the jury had a right to look to that circumstance, the nature of the telegram, and everything else in the case, in saying whether or not the defendant was negligent in failing to deliver the telegram sooner than it did deliver it. As stated in the opinion above, a telegraph company has a right to adopt rules as to office hours and have reasonable rules for its own protection; but it also has a right to waive them, and does waive them as to office hours when it accepts a message for transmission and delivery without the office hours without informing the sender of such rules, or without explaining to him that it would not be transmitted or delivered until the time. Of course, if the telegraph agent so receiving had no knowledge of the office hours at other offices, and was not chargeable with notice or knowledge thereof, so receiving the message would not be a waiver. However, we hold that in this case there was sufficient evidence to authorize the submission to the jury of the question of waiver of the rules, and to prevent the giving of the general affirmative charge to the jury on this question.

There was likewise no error in the court's overruling defendant's motion for a new trial. The evidence affirmatively showed that it was not void because it was a quotient verdict. The fact that the jurors agreed among themselves to render a quotient verdict, and afterwards declined to do so, and in fact did not arrive at their verdict in that manner, does not make the verdict a quotient one, and is no reason for setting the verdict aside. Whether or not the verdict was excessive no one can tell. There is no standard or rule of computation by which the amount can be determined in this or similar cases. There may be cases where it would be so great that the court might say that it was arbitrary or intended as punishment when no such punitive damages could be allowed, and in such case it might be set aside; but this is not such a case.

Finding no error in the record, the case must be affirmed.

Dowdell, Ch. J., and Simpson and Denison, JJ., concur in the conclusion reached in this case without committing themselves to all that is said in the opinion.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

D. G. BEAUCHAMP, Appt.,

v.

ADOLPH BERTIG et al.

Judgment — faith and credit — removing disability.

1. The requirement of the Federal Constitution that the judgments of one state shall be given full faith and credit in another does not render a judgment of one state removing an infant's disability to convey land effective for that purpose in another state.

Same — conflicting policy.

2. The execution by infants in a state which has removed their disability, of a deed conveying title to land in another state, will not, under the rule of comity, render the deed an irrevocable conveyance in the latter state, where its policy is to regard such deeds as revocable upon the infant's attaining full age.

Conflict of laws — infant's deeds — revocability.

3. The binding effect under the lex loci contractus of covenants for title in an infant's deed to land situated in another state will not be given effect by the courts of the latter state in contravention to the public policy of that state, which permits infants to disaffirm such covenants upon attaining majority.

Same — covenant for title.

4. The obligation of covenants for title in a deed is governed by the law of the place where the land is situated, and not by the lex loci contractus.

Infants — deed — disaffirmance.

5. A deed by which persons, on reaching their majority, "grant, bargain, sell, and convey" to a stranger property which they had during infancy deeded to another, for the purpose of disaffirming their former deed, and with knowledge that the later grantee is to institute suit for possession of the property, is a sufficient disaffirmance of the former deed, where the statute permits a conveyance of land held adversely.

Same — fraud — right to raise question.

6. Purchasers of land from an infant cannot defeat a recovery of the property by one to whom the infant deeded it on reaching his majority, on the ground that the later deed was obtained by fraud.

Same — joint deed — disaffirmance — dower.

7. The disaffirmance by infants, upon reaching their majority, of a deed which they executed jointly with their mother, of property in which she had a dower interest, destroys the merger of such interest, and leaves in the grantee the equitable title to her dower right.

Same — duty of second grantee.

8. One who purchases from infants, upon their reaching their majority, land which another had purchased from them during their minority, must restore to the former purchaser the consideration paid by him, including claims against the property which had been satisfied by him as part of the consideration for the conveyance.

Same — agent's commissions.

9. One who purchases from infants, upon their reaching majority, land which they had deeded to another during infancy, is not bound to reimburse to the latter money he had paid his own agent for conducting the negotiations leading to his purchase.

Same — contract — performance — possession.

10. One who purchases from infants, upon their reaching their majority, land which they had conveyed to another during minority, under a contract to repay the latter what he had paid the infants, must comply with his contract before he can secure possession of the property.

Same — tenancy — removal of buildings.

11. A tenant having the right to remove buildings at the end of his lease, who purchases the realty from the infant owners during their minority, is restored to his rights under the lease upon their disaffirmance of their sale by conveying the property to another after reaching majority.

Same — lease — authority of court.

12. A lease, under authority of court, of minor's property, which is to extend beyond their minority, is valid, where the state has given the court plenary power over such estates.

Same — purchaser's rights — rents.

13. One who, after the majority of infants who during minority joined with their mother in a deed of real estate belonging to their father's estate, to one having a lease of the property which has not expired, purchased the property from them during the mother's lifetime, is entitled to rents from the date of his deed upon the property, less those represented by the widow's dower interest.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Chancery Court for Greene County dismissing a complaint filed to recover possession of certain land and quieting title in defendants in accordance with the relief demanded in their cross complaint. Reversed.

Statement by Wood, J.:

In 1885 H. H. Sitterding, Sr., died, owning and occupying a certain lot in the town of Paragould, Greene county, Arkansas. He left a widow and two minor sons, George and Herman. The widow intermarried with one Simpson v. Robinson, 37 Ark. 132; Bemis v. First Nat. Bank, 63 Ark. 625; 40 S. W. 127. See also Neff v. Elder, 84 Ark. 277, 120 Am. St. Rep. 67, 105 S. W. 280.

If there was a merger of the dower, it was when the dower and fee united in appellees by their purchase from Mrs. Thomas and the Sitterdings; but the two estates never united in the Sitterdings. They never had a dower interest, and their deed to appellant could only transfer to him such estate as they had. They never acquired any estate through appellees. The appellant, therefore, never purchased the dower, but appellees did purchase and pay for it. It would be inequitable to take it from them and give it to appellant. The appellant, then, is the owner in fee of the lot in controversy, subject to appellees' unassigned dower right.

5. The only remaining question is, How are the rights of the respective parties to be enforced? The appellees in their cross complaint alleged that they had paid $4,100 for the lot,—“that is, $3,000 to the parties, and by paying off obligations for the grantors in the sum of $1,100.” Appellant in his answer denied that over $1,720 was paid the Sitterdings, but he does not deny that appellees paid obligations for the Sitterdings, or the amount thereof. On the contrary, he alleges that the consideration he was to pay for his deed was “the money George W. and Herman H. Sitterding had received from the defendants, the amount of the claims which had been probated,” etc. The appellees show that the amount of the claims against the estate of the Sitterdings paid by them was $700. While appellant in his testimony says that he was to pay “back the money that Bertig had paid them,” the Sitterdings, he does not say that he was not to pay also the obligations that Bertig had paid for them. He was silent as to this. He does not show that the allegation in his answer, to the effect that he was to pay these obligations, was untrue. As he made the allegation, he should be bound by it.

Furthermore, aside from the contract, equity will compel the appellant, before he can recover possession, to repay the appellees for the debts which they discharged against the Sitterding estate. For this the estate would be liable after the minors reached majority, their homestead rights having expired. Appellees, who held this debt against the estate made it a part of the consideration of their purchase from the Sitterdings, and they, the Sitterdings, thus received the benefit of it. Under the doctrine of Stull v. Harris, 51 Ark. 294, 2 L.R.A. 741, 11 S. W. 104, they or appellant, whi succeeds to their rights, must do equity and repay this amount before a recovery of the property can be had. 22 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 557; Eureka Co. v. Edwards, 71 Ala. 248, 46 Am. Rep. 314.

The evidence shows that $400 was paid by the appellees, not to the Sitterdings, but to their own agent for making the negotiations. This amount, therefore, cannot be considered as a part of the consideration that appellant was to pay. According to appellant's own pleadings and evidence, the money he was to pay appellees, in addition to what he was to pay the Sitterdings in person, was the consideration for the deed by which they disaffirmed. This contract between appellant and the Sitterdings was for the benefit of appellees, and they are entitled to have the money that appellant agreed to pay them refunded before he can recover under his deed. The improvements made by appellees were under their lease contract, and are referable to that, and not to their dower estate, which was acquired after these improvements were made. Under the terms of the lease, which the deed of disaffirmance ipso facto reinstated, the improvements were chattels and belonged to the appellees.

Our statute empowers the probate court, upon being satisfied that it would be for the best interest of the estate of a minor, to make an order authorizing the guardian to rent the lands of such minor publicly or privately, as in his judgment shall be best for the interest of his ward, subject to the approval of the probate court or the judge thereof in vacation. Kirby's Dig. §§ 3789, 3790. It also gives the probate court power to sell or lease for purposes of reinvestment or putting proceeds on interest. Kirby's Dig. § 3801.

At the common law the guardian in socage could make a lease in his own name of the lands belonging to his infant ward, to continue only till the infant was fourteen years of age, unless the latter chose to continue it longer. But “the common law,” says Drake, Justice, “in its ever-watchful care of the interest of minors, has suffered their guardians to make advantageous leases for them continuing at the option of the minor even beyond the age of twenty-one.” Snook ex dem. Coursen v. Sutton, 10 N. J. L. 133, and authorities cited.

Under the common law or statutes simply declaratory thereof, leases made by the guardian to extend beyond the term of the guardianship are voidable. Rodgers, Dom. Rel. 861, note 5; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 68 and 69, note 1; Emerson v. Spicer, 46 N. Y. 594; Ross v. Gill, 1 Wash. (Va.) 87; Ross v. Gill, 4 Call (Va.) 250; Talbot v. Provine, 7 Baxt. 502, at page 510; 1 Bacon, Abr. Leases; 2 Kent, Com. 228; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 307; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 350, note 1; Putnam v. Ritchie, 6 Paige, 390; Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch.

150, 11 Am. Dec. 441; People ex rel. Hanigan v. Ingersoll, 20 Hun, 316.

In England from the time of Lord Hardwicke, the high court of chancery had no power to lease or sell an infant's real estate without the aid of act of Parliament. The course was to give reference to a master to inquire whether it would be for the benefit of the minors that application be made for an act of Parliament. Russel v. Russel, 1 Molloy, 525. But the supreme lawmaking power in our state has, by the above statutes, invested the probate court, with power to sell and lease the lands of infants. The matter is left in the judgment of the probate court, and there are no limitations prescribed for the term of lease, and we are of the opinion, from the above and cognate provisions of chapter 76, Kirby's Dig., that none were intended. The best interest of the estate of the minor is the prime and only consideration, and that seems to be the only limit to his discretion within the statutory provisions. Complying with these, the intention of the lawmakers was to give the probate courts plenary power in the premises. Hence the lease made by order of the court was valid, although it was to continue beyond the minority of the infants.

The improvements are not a part of the freehold, and therefore appellees and appellant, as to these, are not tenants in common. The lease had not expired at the time of the trial, and appellees were then entitled to possession under it, and will be until six months after its expiration, to have the improvements removed from the premises.

Under the case of Tobin v. Spann, 85 Ark. 556, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 672, 109 S. W. 534, appellant was entitled to rents only from the date of the deed of disaffirmance, which was April 6, 1907. From that date he is entitled to two thirds the amount of the rent specified in the lease, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum after maturity. The appellees are entitled, also, from that date, to have the money ($2,700) which the appellant had agreed to pay them under the terms of his contract with the Sitterdings refunded, with interest on the amount at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from that date until it is paid.

It would be premature to make any decree touching the assignment of the dower interest of appellees, until the expiration of the time during which they may hold the property under their lease. The condition of the property at that time will furnish a proper criterion for ascertaining the proper value of the unassigned dower interest and the method to be pursued in its allotment. The suit of appellant for possession was in fact premature. But inasmuch as the court retained the case, and the court and the parties have treated it as a suit to settle and quiet the rights and title in and to the lot in controversy between the respective parties, we have defined and adjudged their rights as indicated above.

The decree quieting the title in appellees will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the Chancery Court to enter a decree adjudging the rights and title of the parties in accordance with this opinion, and for such other and further proceedings as may be necessary, and not inconsistent herewith.

MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS.

REBECCA GREEN, Appt.,

v.

T. A. SHOEMAKER et al.

(— Md. —, 73 Atl. 688.)

Landlord — care taker — tenant.

1. One who is entitled to occupy certain unfurnished rooms in a house in consideration of services to be rendered the owner in caring for children and keeping the remainder of the house in repair, which services are in lieu of rent, is a tenant, and not a mere roomer.

Nuisance — blasting.

2. Blasting of rocks in the vicinity of another's dwelling is a nuisance rendering the one responsible therefor liable for all injuries which result therefrom.

Action — parties — married woman.

3. A married woman whose property is destroyed and whose health is injured by blasting on adjoining property is the proper one to bring the action to recover compensation therefor.

Damages — fright — blasting.

4. Damages may be recovered for actual physical injuries resulting from fright and nervous shock caused by wrongful blasting, although there is no direct physical impact against the body of the person injured.

(June 28, 1909.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Baltimore County in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries and for injuries to plaintiff's property alleged to have been caused by wrongful blasting. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Note. — As to right to recover for physical injury resulting from fright caused by wrongful act, see notes to Huston v. Freemansburg, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 49, and Chittick v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1073.

fright and nervousness caused by the wrongful acts of the defendants?

The evidence is undisputed that the rent for these rooms was always paid by the plaintiff, and not by her husband, and that the agreement of renting was made by Mrs. Melvane with the plaintiff alone. We are of opinion that under the evidence the plaintiff was not a mere lodger, the landlady retaining the legal possession of the whole house; but that she was a tenant, entitled to the exclusive possession and control of the rooms she occupied. Blasting of rocks by the use of gunpowder or other explosives, in the vicinity of another's dwelling house, is a nuisance, and the person doing the act or causing it to be done is liable for all injuries that result therefrom. Wood, Nuisances, 153; 29 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1167; Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159, 51 Am. Dec. 279; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 254. Each count in this declaration charges acts which constitute a public or common nuisance, and also discloses special injuries sustained by the plaintiff, recoverable in a private action. Among the special injuries were that "all persons living in said rooms, including the plaintiff, were kept in continual fear and jeopardy of their lives, rendering a proper attention by the plaintiff to her duties full of fear and danger." This is the same allegation made in the narr. in Scott v. Bay, 3 Md. 431, which was a case of blasting, and in which the court said damages for such injuries were recoverable in case. In Webb's Pollock on Torts, the author says: "The conception of private nuisance was formerly limited to injuries done to a man's freehold by a neighbor's acts, of which stopping or narrowing rights of way and flooding land by the diversion of water courses appear to have been the chief species. In the modern authorities it includes all injuries to an owner or occupier in the enjoyment of the property of which he is in possession, without regard to the quality of the tenure." [p. 491.] The same author, on page 494, says the kind of nuisance "which is most commonly spoken of by the technical name is the continuous doing of something which interferes with another's health or comfort in the occupation of his property, such as carrying on a noisy or offensive trade." The general rule of the common law is that every action must be brought in the name of the party whose legal right has been invaded or infringed. 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 484. For the immediate wrong and damage the person injured is the only one who can maintain the action. Id. p. 578. "The person who sustains an injury is the person to bring an action for the injury against the wrongdoer." Dicey. Parties to Actions, 347. We think this action was properly brought by the plaintiff. Even if no other damage were shown than the breaking of the two dozen jars, which were her personal property, she would be entitled to at least nominal damages which would carry costs. In Hazard Powder Co. v. Volger, 7 C. C. A. 130, 12 U. S. App. 865, 58 Fed. 152, a husband, Schultze Volger, sued the Hazard Powder Company, alleging that it maintained a powder magazine in violation of a city ordinance, and that its explosion wrecked his house and injured his wife. His house was erected on the land of another, under a license. He gave up his position to nurse his wife, and it was held that peaceable possession was evidence of his right to maintain the action, without regard to title. It was also held that he could recover for the loss of his wife's services, and the value of his own services as a nurse; that is, what would have been the reasonable cost for a hired nurse. The wife also brought a separate suit to recover for her own personal injuries, and did recover. It does not appear from the report of the case what was the character of her injuries, and these cases are only cited to show that separate recoveries were there allowed. It follows from what we have said that it was error to grant the defendants' prayer, which absolutely withdrew the case from the jury.

This brings us to the important question involved in the granting of the motion to strike out all the testimony bearing on the nervous shock to the plaintiff and physical injury resulting therefrom. There is a wide divergence of judicial opinion as to whether a cause of action will lie for actual physical injuries resulting from fright and nervous shock caused by the wrongful acts of another, and it may be considered as settled that mere fright, without any physical injury resulting therefrom, cannot form the basis of a cause of action. This is so because mere fright is easily simulated, and because there is no practical standard for measuring the suffering occasioned thereby, or of testing the truth of the claims of the person as to the results of the fright. But when it is shown that a material physical injury has resulted from fright caused by a wrongful act, and especially, as in this case, from a constant repetition of wrongful acts, in their nature calculated to cause constant alarm and terror, it is difficult, if not impossible, to perceive any sound reason for denying a right of action in law for such physical injury. The grounds upon which those courts have proceeded which deny such right are twofold: "(1) That physical injury resulting from fright caused by . . . [a wrongful act] is not the proximate result of the . . . [act]; [and] (2) that, on the ground of mere expediency, recovery must be denied because of the danger of opening the door to fictitious litigation, and the impossibility of estimating the damages." Huston v. Freemansburg, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 50, editor's note. As to the first of these grounds, this court has laid down in clear language the true doctrine upon this question in Baltimore City Pass. R. Co. v. Kemp, 61 Md. 80. In that case the court, speaking through Judge Alvey, said: "It is not simply because the relation of cause and effect may be somewhat involved in obscurity, and therefore difficult to trace, that the principle obtains that only the natural and proximate results of a wrongful act are to be regarded. It is only where there may be a more direct and immediate sufficient cause of the effect complained of that the more remote cause will not be charged with the effect. If a given result can be directly traced to a particular cause as the natural and proximate effect, why should not such effect be regarded by the law, even though such cause may not always, and under all condition of things, produce like results? It is the common observation of all that the effects of personal physical injuries depend much upon the peculiar conditions and tendencies of the persons injured, and what may produce but slight and comparatively uninjurious consequences in one case may produce consequences of the most serious and distressing character in another. . . . Hence the general rule is that in actions of tort like the present the wrongdoer is liable for all the direct injury resulting from his wrongful act, and that, too, although the extent or special nature of the resulting injury could not, with certainty, have been foreseen or contemplated as the probable result of the act done." In the case now before us the evidence does not suggest any other cause of the effect complained of. It is a matter of common knowledge or observation that loud explosions, even if unattended by any immediate special dangers, are very trying to the nerves of those subjected to them. This is especially so when such explosions are constantly repeated, as in blasting, and are accompanied by the hurling about of rocks and stones displaced by the blast, to the danger of property and life. It is equally a matter of common knowledge that as a general rule the nerves of women are more sensitive to injury than those of men, are more easily disturbed, and that, when so disturbed, the injurious consequences are more serious and lasting. Here is a young woman, thirty years of age, in sound health and free from any nervous disorder or tendency. She is subjected to a long-continued series of terrific blastings near her dwelling, shattering the roof, walls, and windows by day and by night, and, in the language of the declaration, "putting her in continual fear and jeopardy of her life." In the absence of any evidence of any other cause, why, then, may not her nervous prostration be traced by the jury, under the principles stated by Judge Alvey, to the one cause shown to exist, viz., the alarm and terror under which she was forced to live? In the case just cited there was a motion for a re-argument based, as the court stated, upon authorities that were not brought to the attention of the court upon the former hearing, but the motion was overruled; the court saying: "Whether the direct causal connection exists is a question in all cases for the jury upon the facts in proof." In Sloane v. Southern California R. Co. 114 Cal. 668, 32 L.R.A. 193, 44 Pac. 320, a case similar to the present in that there was no physical impact, the court said: "The real question presented by the objections and exception of the appellant is whether the subsequent nervous disturbance of the plaintiff was a suffering of the body or of the mind. . . . The nerves and nerve centers of the body are a part of the physical system, and are not only susceptible of lesion from external causes, but are also liable to be weakened and destroyed from causes primarily acting upon the mind. If these nerves or the entire nervous system is thus affected, there is a physical injury thereby produced; and, if the primal cause of this injury is tortious, it is immaterial whether it is direct, as by a blow, or indirect through some action upon the mind." If, in the case before us, the plaintiff had received an actual blow, however slight, either from a rock hurled by the blast, from the falling of a wall or ceiling, or even by a fall of herself caused by the alarm of the concussions no one would question her right to maintain this action, nor the right of the jury to consider the nervous prostration from which she is suffering in ascertaining the damages to be awarded. If, therefore, the jury had believed from the evidence which was stricken out that the nervous prostration of the plaintiff was the natural and proximate consequence of the alarm and terror to which she was subjected by the constant blasting, it would properly have formed an element for their consideration in reaching their verdict. For these reasons we do not think the question of proximate cause in this case justified the striking out of the testimony bearing upon the nervous shock and the resulting physical injury, nor in the withdrawal of the case from the jury.

We now come to the question of expediency. It appears from an examination of the cases in which the right of recovery has been denied where there has been no physical impact, that this doctrine has been the controlling one with the court. This is especially apparent in the Pennsylvania and Massachusetts decisions. In Huston v. Freemanburg, 212 Pa. 548, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 49, 61 Atl. 1022, the court dealt only with that question, and said: "If we opened the door to this new invention, the result would be great danger, if not disaster, to the cause of practical justice." In Homans v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 180 Mass. 456, 57 L.R.A. 291, 91 Am. St. Rep. 324, 62 N. E. 737, Chief Justice Holmes said, referring to the rule established in that court, as has been explained repeatedly, it is an arbitrary exception, based upon a notion of what is practicable, that prevents a recovery for visible illness resulting from nervous shock alone. We must recognize the logic in favor of the plaintiff when a remedy is denied because the only immediate wrong is a shock to the nerves. At the trial below the defendant by various requests tried to press the principle so far as to require the plaintiff to prove that the nervous shock was the immediate consequence of a slight blow received by being thrown forward against a seat, whereas the judge allowed her to recover for the nervous shock ending in paralysis, if it resulted from a jar to her nervous system which accompanied the slight blow to her person. In other words, the court held that it was not necessary to show that the shock was the consequence of the blow; and Judge Holmes said: "We are of opinion the judge was correct, and that further refining would be wrong." This case well illustrates the difficulty felt by the court in denying a recovery upon the ground of expediency, without withholding from the plaintiff a legal right. The argument from mere expediency cannot commend itself to a court of justice, resulting in the denial of a logical legal right and remedy in all cases because in some a fictitious injury may be urged as a real one. The apparent strength of the theory of expediency lies in the fact that nervous disturbances and injuries are sometimes more imaginary than real, and are sometimes feigned, but this reasoning loses sight of the equally obvious fact that a nervous injury arising from actual physical impact is as likely to be imagined as one resulting from fright without physical impact, and that the former is as capable of simulation as the latter. It must be conceded that the numerical weight of authority supports the general rule that there can be no recovery for nervous affections unaccompanied by contemporaneous physical injury, but the sounder view in our opinion is that there are exceptions to this rule, and that where the wrongful act complained of is the proximate cause of the injury, within the principles announced in Kemp's Case, supra, and where the injury ought, in the light of all the circumstances, to have been contemplated as a natural and probable consequence thereof, the case falls within the exception, and should be left to the jury. In England in Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 13 App. Cas. 222, the court held that damages arising from mere terror, unaccompanied at the time by any physical injury, could not be considered as a consequence of the wrongful act there complained of, although the court refused to decide that in no case could recovery be had without proof of actual impact. In Bell v. Great Northern R. Co. Ir. L. R. 26 C. L. 428, the court refused to follow the case just mentioned, saying that where no intervening independent cause of the injury was suggested, and where the jury could find that the bodily injury complained of was a natural consequence of the fright, the chain of reasoning for recovery was complete. These cases are reviewed in 1 Beven on Negligence, 2d ed. pp. 76-83, and the doctrine of the former is criticized with much force and discrimination. In Watkins v. Kaolin Mfg. Co. 131 N. C. 536, 60 L.R.A. 617, 42 S. E. 983, the action was brought to recover damages for injury to the nerves resulting from blasting near the plaintiff's dwelling, though there was no external physical impact. It was held that an allegation that plaintiff became so nervous and frightened from the negligent and reckless blasting by the defendant that she could not sleep at night, and was greatly disturbed in body and mind, stated a good cause of action for physical injury; and it was held that an action will lie for physical injury or disease resulting from fright or nervous shocks caused by negligent acts. In Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller, 49 L.R.A. 77, 41 C. C. A. 22, 100 Fed. 738, the jury was instructed as follows: "If great fright was a reasonable and natural consequence of the circumstances in which the collision aforesaid, with the ensuing wreckage, explosion, and conflagration, placed [said] plaintiff, . . . and that she was actually put in fright by those circumstances, and that injury to her health was a reasonable and natural consequence of such great fright, and was actually and proximately occasioned thereby, said injury is one for which damages are recoverable." The reasoning upon which that conclusion was reached is, in our opinion, sound, and it is in accord with the views expressed in Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. § 861; Addison, Torts, 5; 3 Sutherland Damages, 714, 715. The same view was held in Tuttle v. Atlantic City R. Co. 66

N. J. L. 327, 54 L.R.A. 582, 88 Am. St. Rep. 491, 49 Atl. 450; in Watson v. Dilts, 116 Iowa, 249, 57 L.R.A. 559, 93 Am. St. Rep. 239, 89 N. W. 1068; in Mack v. South Bound R. Co. 52 S. C. 323, 40 L.R.A. 679, 68 Am. St. Rep. 913, 29 S. E. 906; in Purcell v. St. Paul City R. Co. 48 Minn. 134, 16 L.R.A. 203, 50 N. W. 1034; in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Hayter, 93 Tex. 239, 47 L.R.A. 325, 77 Am. St. Rep. 856, 54 S. W. 944; and in Consolidated Traction Co. v. Lambertson, 59 N. J. L. 297, 36 Atl. 100. It may be observed here that there is a class of cases in which courts which generally sustain the contrary rule seem not to require contemporaneous physical injury in order to sustain a recovery for fright and its consequences. In Spade v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 168 Mass. 285, 38 L.R.A. 512, 60 Am. St. Rep. 303, 47 N. E. 88, where a recovery was denied, the court said: "Nor do we include cases of acts done with gross carelessness or recklessness, showing utter indifference to such consequences, when they must have been in the actor's mind." In Nelson v. Crawford, 122 Mich. 460, 80 Am. St. Rep. 577, 81 N. W. 335, it is intimated that the rule does not reach those cases where there is an intention to cause mental distress, and in Wilkinson v. Downton [1897] 2 Q. B. 57, it was expressly so held where a practical joke resulted in fright producing a miscarriage. In the case before us the evidence is that the defendants were notified of the injury to the house, and they made some repairs, but that the blasting continued thereafter and during all the summer, with the same results. This would seem to come fairly within the description of gross recklessness as to consequences, and thus to bring the case within that exception.

In view of all the circumstances of this case, we cannot apply to it the rigid rule applied in some courts, requiring actual contemporaneous physical impact producing physical injury, and we are of opinion that the case should have gone to the jury upon the principles announced in Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Roller, supra. It will be for the court in future cases of this character, as in all other cases where the questions of proximate cause and legally sufficient evidence arise, to permit no recovery except upon the application of the principles just mentioned, while denying none upon the ground of mere expediency, where these principles logically require the submission of the case to the jury.

Judgment reversed, with costs to the appellant above and below, and new trial awarded.

Petition for rehearing denied.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN A. LAGERMAN, Receiver of Germania Bank, Resp't.,
v.

LAWRENCE I. CASSERLY, Appt.

(107 Minn. 491, 120 N. W. 1086.)

Limitation of action — suspension of remedy — effect on statute.

1. The rule that, whenever a person is prevented from exercising his legal remedy by some paramount authority, the time for which he is thus prevented must not be counted against him in determining whether the statute of limitations has barred his right, applies only when such paramount authority is invoked and the restraint induced by the debtor.

Same — suspension of statute — injunction — parties.

2. The statutory provisions suspending the running of the period of limitation during the time the beginning of an action is stayed by an injunction or other statutory prohibition apply only between parties to the suit, and not where the injunction is granted in a suit to which the debtor is not a party.

Case Note. — Effect of injunction against suing on running of statute of limitations.

The earlier cases dealing with the question of effect of injunction against suing on running of statute of limitations are gathered in a case note to Hunter v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1187.

As was pointed out in that note and illustrated by several cases in some jurisdictions, the running of the statute of limitations is suspended by an injunction, although no statutory element appears.

So, in Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Wright, 124 Ga. 596, 53 S. E. 251, it was held that the statute of limitations did not run against the state during the time that the comptroller general was enjoined by the Federal court, in a suit in which the debtor, although he was not complainant, was a party, from issuing any executions for taxes on certain stock.

It will also be noticed from that note that in many of the jurisdictions the statute of limitations has been held to be suspended during the continuance of an injunction against legal proceedings by virtue of a statutory provision to that effect. The decision in LAGERMAN v. CASSERLY that such statutory prohibition applies only between parties to the suit, and not where the injunction is granted in a suit to which the debtor is not a party, is supported by Terrell v. Ingersoll, 10 Lea, 77, sufficiently set out in the earlier note.

Referring again to the earlier note, it was

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Ramsey County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enforce defendant's constitutional liability as a stockholder for debts of the Germania Bank of St. Paul. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. O. E. Holman, for appellant:

The cause is barred by the statute.

Willius v. Albrecht, 100 Minn. 436, 111 N. W. 387, 112 N. W. 862; State ex rel. Pope v. Germania Bank, 106 Minn. 446, 119 N. W. 61.

Statutes providing that, when the commencement of an action is stayed by injunction, the time of the continuance of the stay is not a part of the time limited for the commencement of the action, apply only between parties to the suit, and not where the injunction is granted in a suit to which a debtor is not a party.

Mr. James E. Trask, for respondent:

Under the law of his appointment the receiver had no authority or right to enforce the stockholders' liability unless and until it became necessary to pay the debts of the bank; and, until such necessity was shown to have arisen by some ascertainment, no cause of action accrued to the receiver.

Re People's Live Stock Ins. Co. 56 Minn. 185, 57 N. W. 468; Minneapolis Baseball Co. v. City Bank, 66 Minn. 446, 38 L.R.A. 415, 69 N. W. 331; Richardson v. Merritt, 74 Minn. 362, 74 N. W. 234, 407, 968; Anderson v. Seymour, 70 Minn. 377, 73 N. W. 171.

The right to enforce statutory liability of stockholders for debts of the corporation is generally dependent upon a prior exhausting of the legal remedies against the corporation itself, and until then the statutes do not run in favor of the stockholder.

25 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 121, 1199; Willius v. Mann, 91 Minn. 494, 98 N. W. 341, 867; Minneapolis Paper Co. v. Swinburne Printing Co. 66 Minn. 378, 69 N. W. 144; Scovill v. Thayer, 105 U. S. 143, 26 L. ed.

there said: "But even where neither statutory exception nor recognized principle of law exists to protect a right of action from the running of the statute of limitations during the continuance of an injunction, in courts of equity and courts which allow themselves to be governed by equitable considerations, the injustice of permitting a defendant to take advantage of the statute where the plaintiff has been precluded from asserting his rights by an injunction obtained by the defendant is recognized, and the defendant in effect held equitably estopped from profiting thereby." This statement is amply supported by authority, as well as the further statement that in such case the plaintiff may obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from setting up the statute as a defense.

A case of this nature is Davis v. Hoopes, 33 Miss. 173, where an executor enjoined the enforcement of a judgment by unfounded litigation until it was barred by limitations, and it was held that the creditor could enforce its collection in a suit in chancery, and enjoin the setting up of the statute as a defense by the executor personally and his sureties.

However, in Teigen v. Drake, 13 N. D. 502, 101 N. W. 893, it was held that the procuring of an injunction by a mortgagor under a statute providing in effect that when, in case of foreclosure by advertisement, it appears that the mortgagor has a legal counterclaim or defense, a judge of the district court may enjoin the foreclosure by advertisement, and direct that all further proceedings be had in the district court, such mortgagor is not estopped to plead the statute of limitations in bar of a foreclosure by action. It was argued that to permit the statute of limitations to be pleaded under such circumstances as this would in effect make the statute a bar to foreclosure under the power of sale, because the mortgagor might present groundless defenses in his affidavit for the ex parte injunction under the statute, and, by pleading limitations against the action, prevent any hearing or determination of the illegal defenses. The court, however, said that, if that situation had been brought about by the statute, it was the result of legislation, which they had no power to disturb so long as it violated no provision of the Constitution.

The rule recognized in some jurisdictions that the defendant may nevertheless be estopped to plead the statute of limitations, although an injunction will not of itself suspend the running of the statute, has been held applicable, in some of these courts, only to those who are actors in procuring the allowance of such injunction, and not to affect the rights of a debtor not a party. A case of this nature is Hunter v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. 73 Ohio St. 110, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1187, 112 Am. St. Rep. 699, 76 N. E. 563, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 146. And this was also the effect of the decision in Wilkinson v. First Nat. F. Ins. Co. 72 N. Y. 499, 28 Am. Rep. 166.

State ex rel. Pope v. Germania Bank, 106 Minn. 446, 119 N. W. 63.

The defendant was before the court in the assessment proceedings and upon the appeal in the Mann Case, both through representation by the corporation and personally through his joining in the appeal by contributing to pay the expenses thereof; and he is therefore bound by the decision and order adjudging that the receiver had no right or cause of action against those secondarily liable, and that the receiver be restrained from commencing any such actions until further order of the court.

When a person is prevented by order of the court from enforcing a legal remedy, the period of such restraint is not to be counted against him in ascertaining whether the statute has run.

ELLiott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action to enforce the collection of an assessment levied upon the stock of the Germania Bank. The defendant, Casserly, was a stockholder, and the sole question is whether the statute of limitations had run against the cause of action. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed from this judgment.

The facts with reference to the failure of this bank have been fully stated in previous decisions and need not be repeated. Willius v. Mann, 91 Minn. 494, 98 N. W. 341, 867; Willius v. Albrecht, 100 Minn. 436, 111 N. W. 387, 112 N. W. 862; State ex rel. Pope v. Germania Bank, 106 Minn. 446, 119 N. W. 61. For present purposes it is sufficient to say that the Germania Bank became insolvent on January 4, 1897, and the appellant was then the owner of five shares of its capital stock. The bank was subsequently reorganized, but the appellant did not become a stockholder in the new bank. The reorganized bank also became insolvent in July, 1899, and Gustav Willius was appointed receiver, with power to enforce the constitutional liability of the debts of the stockholders. The appellant was not liable for any of the debts of the new bank, but was liable secondarily for the debts of the old bank, although this secondary liability could not be enforced until the liability of the stockholders of the new bank had been exhausted. Willius v. Mann, supra. The cause of action against all the stockholders of the Germania Bank accrued on July 26, 1899, when the receiver was appointed, and a proceeding to enforce the same could have been commenced at any time within six years thereafter. For this purpose two remedies were available—that provided by chapter 76, Gen. Stat. 1878, and that provided by chapter 272, Gen. Laws 1899. The receiver proceeded under chapter 272, but, through a misunderstanding of the law, neglected to commence proceedings to enforce stockholders' liability within six years after the cause of action arose; and it was held in Willius v. Albrecht, supra, that the statute of limitations had run against the cause of action.

The appellant in this action was liable only secondarily for the debts of the old bank, and after the decision in Willius v. Albrecht an action was commenced against him on the theory that the statute had not run, because the receiver was, during a portion of the time, restrained by the decision in Willius v. Mann and an order supplementary thereto made by the district court. If the time during which the order of the district court was in force is to be deducted, the trial court properly held that the statute had not run against the cause of action against this appellant. The entire proceedings were under chapter 272, Gen. Laws 1899. In an action against certain stockholders, it was held in Willius v. Mann, on the principle which had been established in Harper v. Carroll, 66 Minn. 487, 69 N. W. 610, 1069, that the stockholders of the reorganized bank were liable primarily for the debts of the old and the new bank, and that the stockholders of the old bank were liable secondarily only for its debts, and that the remedies against the stockholders of the new bank should be exhausted before proceeding against the old stockholders. The lower court was directed to proceed in accordance with that decision, rendered February 11, 1904. On May 27, 1904, the district court, on the application of the receiver and without notice to the appellant, made an order restraining the receiver "from collecting from any person secondarily liable for said assessment, made on the 17th day of September, 1903, except where such person has become liable by reason of transfer of stock made subsequent to the 4th day of January, 1897, until he shall have exhausted all remedies against the persons primarily liable for or on account of said assessment, and until said court shall make and enter its further order herein to the effect that all remedies against said persons so primarily liable have been exhausted." The order discharging this restraining order was not made until March 30, 1908.

The decision in Willius v. Mann, and the restraining order of the district court were made in proceedings under chapter 272, and were manifestly intended to be confined to the remedies and proceedings provided for by that statute. It was held in Willius v. Albrecht that during all this time the statute of limitations was running against the cause of action against the stockholders, because the right of action to enforce the same accrued on July 26, 1899. That right of action was not affected by the proceedings under the other statute. Willius v. Mann, like Harper v. Carroll, determined the order in which the liability of several classes of stockholders should be enforced, and the order of the district court merely restrained the receiver from collecting from any person secondarily liable for the assessments made on September 17, 1903, in the proceedings under chapter 272. Some proceeding should have been instituted against all the stockholders within six years after the cause of action arose, and thereafter proceedings to enforce the secondary liability should have been stayed until the liability of those primarily liable had been exhausted. But, regardless of all this, the restraining order of the district court did not affect the appellant, because he was not a party to the proceedings in which the order was made. Willius v. Mann was an action against certain stockholders, of which this appellant was not one. It appears that he did contribute $10 towards a fund which was used to pay the expenses of that appeal; but that fact alone is not sufficient to make him a party, and bind him as such by the decision. For certain purposes the stockholders of the corporation were in court through representation by the corporation, and in so far as the interests and affairs of the corporation are concerned they are bound by the judgment. But they are not bound as respects their individual interests, and, when sued as shareholders, they have the right to assert any defenses personal to themselves. Willius v. Mann, 91 Minn. 494, 98 N. W. 341, 867; Straw & E. Mfg. Co. v. L. D. Kilbourne Boot & Shoe Co. 80 Minn. 136, 83 N. W. 36.

The rule that, whenever a person is prevented from exercising his legal remedy by some paramount authority, the time for which he is thus prevented must not be counted against him in determining whether the statute of limitations has barred his right, applies only when such paramount authority is invoked and the restraint induced by the debtor. A court of equity cannot read an exception into the statute of limitations, although it may under certain circumstances, acting in personam, restrain a debtor from pleading the statute. The statutory provision suspending the running of the period of limitation during the time the beginning of an action is stayed by injunction or other statutory prohibition applies only between parties to the suit, and not where the injunction is granted in a suit to which the debtor is not a party. Sage v. Rudnick, 91 Minn. 325, 98 N. W. 89, 100 N. W. 106; 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1284; Van Wagonen v. Terpenning, 122 N. Y. 222, 25 N. E. 254; Terrell v. Ingersoll, 10 Lea, 77. The restraining order issued by the district court was obtained by the receiver upon his own application, without notice to the stockholders who would be affected thereby; that is, the receiver, for his own benefit, had himself restrained from proceeding against persons who were not parties to the action, who had no notice of the application, upon whom the order was never served, and whose interests were to be adversely affected; and he now claims that the period during which he was under this voluntarily imposed restraint should be deducted from the time during which the statute of limitations would otherwise be running against the stockholders. We think the rule thus invoked applies only when the restraint is imposed at the instance of the other party, or by the court in some proceeding to which the debtor is a party.

The order of the trial court is therefore reversed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

ALFRED WILBY, Appt.,
v.

• STATE OF MISSISSIPPI.

(— Miss. —, 47 So. 465.)

Privilege tax — plumbers.

A journeyman plumber who has no place of business or bureau for obtaining contracts, and employs no helpers, but merely does such work himself as he obtains to do, is not within the terms of a statute imposing a privilege-tax on each individual, firm or corporation doing a plumbing business.

(November 9, 1908.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Forrest County convicting him of conducting a plumbing business without a license. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. S. Hall for appellant.

Mr. George Butler for appellee.

Case Note. — What constitutes a plumbing business within license statutes.

In People ex rel. Nechamcus v. Warden, 144 N. Y. 529, 27 L.R.A. 718, 39 N. E. 686, it was held that the terms "trade, business, or calling," as used in a statute which required a certificate of competency of any person intending to conduct the "trade, business, or calling of a plumber, or of plumbing . . . as employing or master plumber," were synonymous, and had relation to the mechanical employment; and that any person who held himself out to the public as a plumber, undertaking to do the work as such, must, if he employed assistants to perform the work, comply with the law and procure his certificate.

In Felton v. Atlanta, 4 Ga. App. 183, 61 S. E. 27, it was held that an ordinance which prohibited any person, firm, or corporation from working at the business of plumbing, either as master or journeyman plumber, without first procuring a license, was not applicable to mere apprentices or helpers, working under licensed master or journeyman plumbers.

In Davidson v. State, 77 Md. 388, 26 Atl. 415, under a section of an ordinance which prohibited any person from engaging in, or working at, the plumbing business, without complying with six other specified sections, which provided for the examination and registration of persons who desired to work at the business as practical plumbers, and for the payment and disposition of fees for certificates,—it was held that a person who had not been registered could engage in the plumbing business and make contracts for furnishing the material and doing the plumbing work, provided he did not personally do the manual work, but employed therefor only registered plumbers.

Mayes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Section 3854 of the Code of 1906, in the chapter on "Privilege Taxes," provides that "on each individual, firm, or corporation doing a plumbing business in cities or towns of 10,000 or more inhabitants, where they have waterworks and sewerage, $50. Same, in cities and towns of less than 10,000 and more than 5,000, $25. In all cities and towns where they have waterworks, $10." Alfred Wilby, the appellant, is a practical plumber, living in the city of Hattiesburg, and working at his trade for a livelihood. One H. M. Hanna was engaged in the barber business at Hattiesburg, and, desiring to have certain plumbing work done in his shop, employed Mr. Wilby to do the work, agreeing to pay therefor the sum of $240. Wilby did the work for Hanna, procuring the material by getting one Batson and Hanna to secure the purchase price of the materials used in the work. It also appears that Wilby did some work for Mr. Batson. It does not appear from this record that Mr. Wilby was engaged in the business of making plumbing contracts and employing others to do or assist him in doing the work. He had no established place of business in which he kept plumbing supplies for the purpose of furnishing the material to carry out contracts. He was merely a practical plumber, doing such work as he obtained to do himself, performing his own labor, maintaining no bureau for the purpose of obtaining contracts, and employing others to do the work or to assist him in doing it, but was simply engaged in making a living by working at his trade from day to day, taking such contracts and doing such work in this line as he found to do. This constitutes the substantial facts of this case.

While so engaged, the sheriff of Perry county demanded of him a privilege tax under the section of the Code above referred to. The city of Hattiesburg has a population of 20,000; the tax, under these circumstances, being $50. Wilby declined to pay same, and on the 1st day of November, 1907, an indictment was returned by the grand jury, charging Wilby with unlawfully conducting a plumbing business in the city of Hattiesburg, without first paying the privilege tax, etc. At the conclusion of the testimony, the defendant asked a peremptory charge acquitting him; but the court declined to give this instruction, whereupon he was convicted and appeals. Since the case is to be decided upon the refusal of this instruction, it is not necessary to enter into any discussion of the other instructions in the case.

We had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion, from the facts presented here, that § 3854 of the Code of 1906 has no application to this case. It applies only to an individual, firm, or corporation making contracts and completing them by the employment of other plumbers to do the work. It has no application to any individual plumber working by the day, or taking contracts for himself alone. A plumber cannot be said to be "doing a plumbing business," within the meaning of the act, when he merely works at his trade himself, and is not engaged in making plumbing contracts to be farmed out to others, or completed by the employment of other plumbers. We cannot assent to the proposition that it was the intention of the legislature to impose so large an occupation tax upon labor,—on the right which a man has by his brawn and muscle, without any other capital being invested, to earn his daily bread by the sweat of his own brow; but the tax was intended by the legislature to be imposed upon those engaged in the business of taking contracts and making profit by the employment of the labor of others to complete their contracts. Any other construction of this statute would tend to build up a monopoly in this line of business, which is hateful to the law and the public, and force journeymen to become mere employees of such as are able to pay the tax. Such was never the intention of the legislature. Such a law would be unjust and oppressive in its operation on the journeymen, and pernicious in its effect on the general public, as it would force out of competition all but the employers of such labor.

Let it be noted to the credit of this state that legislation of the character under discussion, which cannot be too strongly condemned, made its first appearance in the Acts of 1904. See Acts 1904, chap. 76, p. 72. We find the predicate for § 3854 in that act for the first time, and in the same act we find a companion act, being § 20, and providing that a privilege tax of $60 shall be paid by "each individual, firm, or corporation doing a contracting business in cities of over 10,000 inhabitants, where the cost of any one house or building erected by such individual, firm, or corporation exceeds $3,000." This section in relation to contractors was brought forward in the Code of 1906, becoming § 3793. But, in re-enacting it, another section was also added, providing that where the building contracted for was less than $3,000, but more than $750, a privilege of $20 should be paid. Not content with forcing a builder only contracting to build a house costing $750 to pay a privilege of $20, the inspirers of this law procured another amendment by the legislature of 1908, which is Acts 1908, chap. 73, p. 57, § 4, whereby the amount of the privilege tax to be paid is not determined by the cost of construction of the building contracted for, but by the number of men employed at any one time. Thus, by § 4, the firm or corporation must pay a privilege of $60 when the number of men employed at any one time shall be ten or more, if it be in a city of 10,000 inhabitants or more; and by a succeeding section, if the number of men employed be one or more, and not more than ten, a privilege of $20 should be paid. Thus the evil has grown, and this species of legislation has progressed from 1904 to 1908, until it is now the law, if one makes a contract to build a coal house or a chicken coop, and employ another to help him, he must first pay a privilege of $20. We cite this act in relation to contractors merely to emphasize the tendency of this legislation. The end and aim of the promoters is not for the genuine purpose of creating a revenue for the state, but to drive out of the business the competition of small contractors who are unable to pay the tax. If this were not the purpose of the legislation, the legislature would long ago have received strong protest.

The business of plumbing is an honorable and necessary one. So is that of a contractor. The law looks on both of these occupations with favor, not with disfavor. This being the case, why should a tax of $50 be levied on the plumber for the right to labor, and a tax of $10 on the lawyer, the dentist, or other professional man? The answer is easy. It was done to make it possible to monopolize the business. In our research of the law we have found no state with a law similar to this. Some states have laws regulating the plumbing business, but no such law as the section under discussion. These things have crept into the law under the guise of privilege taxes, but in reality their purpose is very different. While this evil is yet in its infancy, the attention of the legislature should be sharply directed to it and such legislation checked. Laws of this nature approximate an abridgment of the liberty of the citizen, guaranteed to him by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and should receive the strictest construction. Liberty, in its broad sense, must consist in the right to follow any of the ordinary callings of life without being trammelled. In the case of State ex rel. Richey v. Smith, 42 Wash. 237, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 674, 114 Am. St. Rep. 114, 84 Pac. 851, 7 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 577, in discussing the validity of an act passed by the legislature of the state of Washington, entitled, "An Act to Regulate Plumbing in Cities Having a Population of Ten Thousand Inhabitants or Over, Providing for the Licensing of Persons to Carry on the Business and Work of Plumbing, Creating a Board of Plumbing Examiners, . . . Providing a Penalty for the Violation Hereof," etc., the court said, after declaring the act unconstitutional: "The right to follow any of the common occupations of life is an inalienable right. It was formulated as such under the phrase 'pursuit of happiness' in the Declaration of Independence, which commenced with the fundamental proposition that 'all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' This right is a large ingredient in the civil liberty of the citizen." Again the court says: "We are not permitted to inquire into the motive of the legislature, and yet, why should a court blindly declare that the public health is involved, when all the rest of mankind know full well that the control of the plumbing business . . . is the sole end in view."

We merely quote from the above opinion to show that acts of a similar nature are being frowned upon by all courts as tending towards a deprivation of rights, and aimed at creating monopolies. Legislation of this kind is on the increase. It is stealthily stealing its way into the statutes for the ostensible purpose of raising revenue for the state, when in truth and in fact the only purpose of the promoters of such legislation is to control the business to which it is directed, to shut out competition, create a monopoly, and force those unable to pay the tax, and possessing a knowledge of the business, to look to the ones in control of the monopoly for employment. This is not only unjust to the laborer, but it is equally wrong to the public. There is just as much reason to require a $50 privilege tax of a bricklayer, or a carpenter, or a wood chopper, or a painter, or a farm laborer, as there is to require it from a plumber.

Reversed and remanded.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

VALINA R. CROCHERON et al., Appts.,
v.

EDWARD S. SAVAGE et al., Respts.

(— N. J. —, 73 Atl. 33.)

Attorney — purchase from client.

1. An attorney in hac re cannot maintain a purchase from a client of the subject-

Headnotes by DILL, J.

Case Note. — Right of attorney to purchase subject-matter of litigation or of retainer from client, and his duty in relation thereto.

The right of an attorney to purchase from his client the subject-matter of his retainer would have expected to give had the transaction been one between his client and a stranger. The learned vice chancellor who heard the case below sustained the transaction and held the deed valid.

We are obliged to differ with the conclusion of the court below, applying the amplification of Lord Eldon's rule (Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. Jr. 286) as laid down by Justice Kay in Luddy v. Peard (1886) 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 884, to the effect that an attorney cannot maintain a purchase from a client unless he can demonstrate that he made a full communication to his client, not only of all that he knew, but also, what is pertinent to this case, of all that he believed, respecting the property, its character and value; that where the attorney, in the course of his employment, forms an opinion that the property is more valuable than had theretofore been assumed, if he fails to disclose that opinion, and thus give his client all that reasonable advice against himself that he would give against a third person, the transaction cannot be sustained. Inasmuch as the relation of attorney and client is involved, we discuss the facts somewhat in detail.

The complainant was the owner of an undivided half interest in a certain tract of 3 acres of salt meadow land on Staten Island sound and Thorp's creek in Middlesex county, New Jersey. The property in question had, prior to this controversy, been treated, so far as the record of title shows, as a mere adjunct to property on Staten in attorney's favor. Burnham v. Heselton, supra.

Duty of attorney to client upon purchasing.

In order to sustain such a purchase, an attorney must affirmatively establish the utmost good faith and fairness of the transaction, as well as the adequacy of consideration, and also that he fully informed the client of the material facts and gave him the same disinterested advice he would have given had the sale been made to a stranger, and that in fact they dealt at arm's length. Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 33 Pac. 836; Stubinger v. Frey, supra; Day v. Wright, 233 Ill. 218, 84 N. E. 226; Zeigler v. Hughes, 55 Ill. 288; *Roby v. Colehour and Mitchell v. Supp. 834; Miles v. Ervin, 1 Mc Cord, Eq. 524, 16 Am. Dec. 623; Tippett v. Brooks, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 107, 67 S. W. 512; Keenan v. Scott, supra; Vanasse v. Reid, 111 Wis. 303, 87 N. Lamb*, 7 El. & Bl. 84; Kenney v. Brown, 3 Ridgeway, 462.

The purchase by an attorney of his client's property concerning which his advice is sought will always be viewed with suspicion, and the attorney assumes the heavy burden of not only establishing the fact that he did not overreach his client, but also that the latter acted upon the fullest information and advice as to his rights; in other words, the attorney must prove uberrima fides, or the transaction will be set aside by a court of equity. Young v. Murphy, supra. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Where the subject of a purchase by an attorney from his client is the subject of litigation, there will be a strict enforcement of the rule that the burden rests upon the attorney to affirmatively establish that the transaction was fair and just, and that the client acted upon full information as to all the material circumstances, and that no advantage was taken of the latter's complacency, confidence, ignorance, or misconception. Re Demarest, supra.

As it is the duty of an attorney to protect his client's interests the latter is entitled to the full benefit of his best exertions and the attorney cannot bring his own personal interests in any way into conflict with that which his duty requires of him; neither may he make a gain for himself in any manner whatsoever at the expense of the client, with respect of the subject-matter of such relationship. Yeamans v. James, supra.

The court said in Cox v. Delmas, supra, that the relation of attorney and client is a fiduciary one of the very highest character, which binds the attorney to the most conscientious fidelity, uberrima fides, and, if he has on his own account any transaction with his client as to the subject of litigation, he must give the latter "all that reasonable advice against himself that he would have given him against a third person," and show that he acted with entire fairness throughout the transaction, without taking any advantage of his client.

It has been said that the rule is that an attorney in such a case is under the heavy responsibility of proving that his "diligence to do the best for the vendor has been as great as if he was only an attorney dealing for that vendor with a stranger," and that he "must show to demonstration (for that must not be left in doubt) that no industry he is bound to exert would have got a better bargain." Gibson v. Jeyes and Holman v. Loynes, supra.

An attorney who assumes the double position of confidential legal adviser and of purchaser of a portion of the property which is the subject of the relation is bound to observe the utmost good faith toward his client, and to draft all necessary papers with island, and the history of the title was therefore found in deeds to Staten island property, recorded in Richmond county, in New York state. About 1890 the Port Reading Railroad Company acquired title to the other undivided half of the property by a deed from one Louis N. Meyer. In the deed to the railroad company, the scrivener attempted to convey this undivided one-half interest in 3 acres by a description conveying $1\frac{1}{2}$ acres, although the property had never been partitioned or divided. The railroad, however, took possession of the whole 3 acres. The plot in question was so substantially inclosed by other lands belonging to the railroad that the only access to it was by boat, either from Staten Island sound or inland by Thorp's creek. The railroad erected on the immediately adjacent property coal docks, bulkheads, and particularly a wharf, which practically closed Thorp's creek to navigation, and thus tended to cut off the only available access to the locus in quo from the land side. The use made of the land by the complainant and her predecessors in title was to cut salt grass upon the meadow. Because of the situation and character of the property, it had little market value and as little available value, except from its contiguity to the railroad property and from its considerable water front, nearly 300 feet on Staten Island sound and approximately 750 feet on Thorp's creek. It therefore occupied a strategic situation and was of primary importance to the railroad.

sufficient care and professional skill, so as to make them express the real understanding and agreement of the parties. Payne v. Avery, 21 Mich. 524.

In order to sustain a sale from a client to an attorney of the subject of litigation, the burden is upon the latter to show that he has done as much to protect the client's interest as he would have done in case the sale was to a stranger. Rogers v. Marshall, supra.

The courts will watch such a transaction with jealousy, and throw upon the attorney the burden of proving that the bargain is, generally speaking, as good as any that could have been obtained by due diligence from any other purchaser. Ibid.; Keenan v. Scott (W. Va.) 61 S. E. 806.

It must also appear that the attorney gave the same price therefor that he would have advised his client to accept from a third person. Champion v. Rigby, Tamlyn, 421.

The attorney, in order to sustain the purchase, must show that he communicated to his client everything necessary to enable the latter to form a correct judgment as to the actual value of the subject-matter of the purchase, and as to the propriety of selling at the price offered. Howell v. Ransom and Rogers v. Marshall, supra.

The neglect of an attorney to inform himself of the true value of the property he purchases from his client at an inadequate consideration will not exonerate the former or be sufficient to sustain the transaction. Rogers v. Marshall, supra.

In order that such a transaction may be sustained, the attorney must show that all the considerations which should have operated to prevent the sale by the client were presented by him with the earnestness of a man who was anxious only for his client's good, and it must appear that the client is no worse off than he would have been had he consulted an adviser who had no interest and no selfish end in view, and also that the attorney took such measures to inform himself as to the value of the property as are ordinarily taken by persons dealing in such property under like circumstances, and, being himself thus informed, that he communicated all his information upon the subject to his client. Ibid.

The burden rests upon an attorney to show that his client fully understood the nature and effect of the transaction, and that the sale of the property was the voluntary and intelligent act of his client. Marden v. Dorthy, 12 App. Div. 176, 42 N. Y. Supp. 834; Barrett v. Ball, 101 Mo. App. 288, 73 S. W. 865.

In Vanasse v. Reid, 111 Wis. 303, 87 N. W. 192, the court said that, if the attorney satisfactorily lift such burden, the transaction cannot be impeached; but that equity will protect the client from all probable injury, holding the attorney to strict account and placing upon him the burden of proving his innocence, but it will go no further.

In order to sustain the purchase of the subject of litigation by an attorney from his client, it must affirmatively appear that the transaction is fair; but this rule, however, does not exclude the weight which is to be given to presumptions arising from lapse of time, acquiescence, and the death of the parties and witnesses, and these considerations are entitled to great weight in a case where such a purchase is not challenged until eighteen years afterward, and no excuse for the delay is shown, neither absence, ignorance, or inability, and both client and attorney are dead. Wills v. Wood, 28 Kan. 400.

So, such a purchase will be upheld where the attorney pays full value and acts in best of faith, and the court may decline to act when the parties cannot be placed in statu quo. Handlin v. Davis, 81 Ky. 34.

Where an attorney purchased land which was the subject of the relationship of attorney and client from the latter through an agent who did not disclose his principal it will be sustained fifteen years later, if such agent acted bona fide, and the attorney fully informed the client of his legal rights to such property and took no advantage of him by virtue of his relation as attorney, and the client received a just and fair price therefor. Yeamans v. James, 27 Kan. 195.

The purchase by the attorney of the plaintiff from the defendant of the land which . In 1903 the complainant, who was a widow some seventy-five years of age, without apparent influence or means, employed the defendant, a lawyer of special experience in dealing with properties in this neighborhood, a real estate expert in local values, and the owner of similar adjacent property, to represent her as attorney and counsel, and either to sell the property to, or force some settlement with, the railroad. The defendant, under his professional retainer, entered into negotiations, but the railroad, sustained as it was by a record title which its attorney had advised was sufficient, seemed to rely upon possession as nine points of the law. From 1903 to November 1, 1905, the defendant had various communications with the railroad, asserting his client's ownership of the property, threatening suit, and demanding $7,500 for her interest; but he evidently desired to avoid a lawsuit, hoping to convince the railroad that the claimant had title and thus settle the matter. In October, 1905, he again threatened suit, stating (October 18, 1905): That he had promised his client that he would file the papers within a week unless the matter was arranged, but would hold the papers until the 23d of October, 1905; that, if not settled by that time, he would go to Philadelphia and make a demand on the railroad, preliminary to commencing the action. But the railroad constantly refused to recognize the complainants' title, although it offered the nominal sum of $100 as peace money for

was the subject of litigation will be upheld where purchased with the client's knowledge and approbation, after being informed of all the circumstances and material facts except the purchase price, which it was understood he was not to know, which was insisted upon by the defendant and was necessary in order to obtain a settlement, and the consideration received by the client was the fair value of the property, and he received disinterested advice upon the facts. Vanasse v. Reid, supra.

Where, upon the urgent solicitation of a client, his attorney purchases his interest in the subject of litigation, which is not worth much more than the amount due the attorney for his services, and the latter fully informed his client, who resided in a distant state, of every fact that had come to his knowledge regarding the litigation, the transaction will not be set aside after six months, where the client has retained the money paid him by the attorney, and has deliberately ratified the sale in writing. Lewis v. Broun, 36 W. Va. 1, 14 S. E. 444.

However, such transaction would have been set aside had the client moved within a reasonable time, as the rule recognized by the court is that an attorney cannot, during the existence of the relation of attorney and client, make a valid purchase of the subject-matter of the retainer, which will not be voidable at the option of his client. Ibid.

Where an attorney, after the repeated importunities of his client, purchases his interest in the subject-matter of a pending litigation at his client's own figure, the transaction will be sustained where it does not appear that the attorney took any advantage of his client or profited by the confidence between them. Myers v. Luzerne County, 124 Fed. 436.

It was held in Coaks v. Boswell, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 232, reversing 33 Week. Rep. 376, that a solicitor for the defendant in an action, who also had an interest with the solicitor for the complainant in the costs of the proceeding, might, upon obtaining leave of the court that has control of the sale of his client's property, purchase the same, as the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

consent of the court relieves the solicitor from his fiduciary character and places him in the same position as any other person in relation to the sale.

In order to uphold an exchange by an attorney and client of the subject-matter of retainer, it is essential that the former should make a full and open disclosure of all the material facts in connection with the transaction, and he must disclose all the material facts in connection with his title to the property exchanged. Condit v. Blackwell, 22 N. J. Eq. 481.

Where an attorney purchased the subject of litigation from his client without informing his associate counsel or consulting with him as to the fairness or equity of the transaction, it will be set aside, as his failure to communicate the fact of his purchase to his associate counsel was unfair to his client. Atwood v. Hadley, Fed. Cas. No. 639.

Where an attorney acquires the subject-matter of litigation in exchange for worthless property owned by him, an inference of bad faith upon his part arises, which it is necessary he should overcome and rebut. Klein v. Borchert, 89 Minn. 377, 95 N. W. 215.

The purchase by an attorney of his client's property at a judicial sale for an inadequate price will be regarded as invalid where it results in a sacrifice of the property, prejudicial to the interests of the client. Smith v. Thompson, 7 B. Mon. 305.

Where an attorney who is aware of the successful outcome of litigation purchases the client's interest therein for an inadequate consideration, without disclosing such knowledge to the client, the transaction will be set aside. Dunn v. Record, 63 Me. 17; Miles v. Ervin, 1 M'Cord, Eq. 524, 16 Am. Dec. 623; Lane v. Black, 21 W. Va. 617.

This doctrine was applied in Dunn v. Record, supra, where an attorney who had a favorable "inkling" as to the result of litigation purchased the cause of action from the client for $300, on which the former subsequently received about $2,000.

So, where a client who is ignorant of the successful result of litigation sells the land her interest, which she declined. Finally, in November, 1905, Mr. Savage had an interview with Mr. Cutter, the local counsel for the railroad, in which the latter told Mr. Savage that he had spent two or three days in the Richmond county clerk's office, Staten island, examining the title; that he had personally inspected the property, and, although the descriptions were somewhat indefinite and differed in the Oakley deed and in the Meyer deed, he thought the property mentioned in both deeds was the same. He then said that the Oakley deed, under which the complainant claimed, called only for an undivided half of the land, and that, if partition proceedings were brought, the company would have set apart to it the land upon which the docks were constructed.

In reference to this interview the railroad counsel testified that he had never admitted before that he thought the property described in the two deeds was the same property. Mr. Savage testified that Mr. Cutter told him that he had made his report, and that the impression made upon his (Mr. Savage's) mind at that interview was that Mr. Cutter had reported that the complainant had some title. The facts thus communicated to the defendant, that the railroad had through its counsel examined the records in Staten island, and that the counsel had personally inspected the property and was satisfied that the complainant had title to an undivided one-half interest in the therein involved to a third person for an inadequate price, the latter having, without the client's knowledge, entered into an agreement with his attorney to purchase the property and share the profits with him, the conveyance cannot be sustained. Miles v. Ervin, supra.

And where it appears that an attorney who had been prosecuting a claim against the government, knew it had been allowed and, without so informing his client, purchased it for one third of the value thereof, and afterward received the full amount of the claim from the government, the client may repudiate the transaction and recover the difference between what the attorney received and what he paid his client for the claim, less the fee agreed upon, irrespective of any false representations made by the attorney to the client. Lane v. Black, supra.

An assignment to an attorney by two incompetent persons who were related to him, of certain claims he was prosecuting for them against the government, which he afterward succeeded in collecting, will be set aside where the assignment was obtained without requiring the assignors to act under independent advice, the attorney requesting them not to mention the assignment and, on several occasions, making incorrect statements to them as to the status of the claim. Brooks v. Pratt, 55 C. C. A. 515, 118 Fed. 725.

Where an attorney for $2,000 obtains an assignment of an interest in an estate worth about $15,000, although he states to the heirs that it was assessed for $10,000, and also informed them of the claims of remote kindred to the estate, it will be set aside, as such gross inadequacy in price will make the chancellor indulge his suspicion of wrong, especially where an attorney and an administrator have entered into an agreement to purchase the interest of the heirs and reap a benefit therefrom, and the court will not examine the evidence of good faith or the knowledge of the heirs of the condition of the estate on the litigation pertaining thereto, but will annul the transaction, notwithstanding it may be conceded that no improper influences were used, as the confidential relation existing and the great inadequacy of consideration will control the disposition of the case. Handlin v. Davis, 81 Ky. 34.

Where an attorney obtained a conveyance from his client of land which was the subject of a litigation, the attorney advising him that he had acquired title under a judicial sale which extinguished the client's title, leaving in the latter only a right to redeem, which was erroneous and misleading, as in fact all the right the attorney had was to be reimbursed by his client for the money he had paid in purchase of the property, the conveyance will be set aside. Roby v. Colehour, 135 Ill. 300, 25 N. E. 777.

Where an attorney who held a mortgage for the purpose of collecting the interest thereon purchased it from his client, who resides in another city, for about one quarter of its value, the purchase will not be upheld, unless the former affirmatively shows that he gave his client full information and disinterested advice, and that the whole transaction was conducted in perfect good faith and without pressure or influence on his part, and the client acted with entire freedom and with complete knowledge of the situation and circumstances. Dunn v. Dunn, 42 N. J. Eq. 431, 7 Atl. 842.

Where an attorney who is employed to foreclose a mortgage and to sell thereunder bids in the property in the name of his client, who resides in a distant state, and who, upon the false representations of the attorney as to the value of the property, conveys it for much less than its value to a third person, without being informed of the fact that he purchased for the attorney, who has also acquired the equity of redemption without the knowledge of his client, the conveyance will be set aside, as the duty of the attorney does not cease until the expiration of the time for redemption, and under the circumstances the latter failed to exercise that degree of good faith demanded by the confidential relation of attorney and client. Zeigler v. Hughes, 55 Ill. 288.

An attorney is not relieved from the obligation imposed by his confidential relation merely because negotiations are carried on urged immediate action on her part. He then filled out the deed, she executed it, and he paid her the $200. He also agreed to pay the fees of a former lawyer ($50), and agreed to send a letter explaining the deed which might be sent to the Virginia heirs.

It is admitted that, whether intentionally or otherwise, the defendant failed to make any mention to the complainant of his interview with the counsel for the railroad, or that he had since that time formed any further or other opinion as to the value of the complainant's interest or her chances of succeeding in bringing the railroad to terms. On the contrary, he at once wrote a letter to the complainant to be sent to the Virginia heirs, saying in part: "The best price that I could offer to you for your undivided interest in the 3-acre tract is $200. This is $100 more than the railroad company offered and in my opinion is its full value at the present time. It has really no value outside of the fact that it may be of some value to me eventually, and therefore I have offered $200." The defendant's negotiations with his client were based upon the position of affairs prior to his interview with the railroad's counsel, and not upon the situation as changed by that interview. He made to her no statement of fact and expressed no opinion as to the changed attitude of the railroad. He failed to disclose the impression made upon his mind by the admissions of Mr. Cutter, the railroad's attorney, but refrained from advising her as to the probabilities of success of the suit, without which he declared nothing could be obtained. On the other hand, immediately after he became the purchaser, in his further dealings and negotiations with the railroad, he boldly stood upon his interview with Mr. Cutter as establishing the recognition of his client's title. A side light is thrown upon the conduct of the attorney in not affording the complainant time for reflection and independent advice, but that when she requested delay he urged an immediate execution of the deed. Four days after acquiring the title, the defendant wrote to the railroad, not disclosing his purchase, but thereof unless he withdraws from such connection or puts himself completely at arm's length, and shows that he gave his client the same benefit of his advice as he would have done had the sale been to a stranger; and he is also bound to communicate to his client all the knowledge he has acquired as to the value of the estate. Cane v. Allen, 2 Dow, P. C. 289.

And where a solicitor is consulted regarding the sale of realty and agrees to find a purchaser, he cannot nominally purchase it for his brother, but really for himself, without disclosing that fact to his client, although such a sale might be sustained had there been a full disclosure. McPherson v. Watt, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 254.

So, a solicitor who is employed to conduct a sale of the client's property cannot, without full explanation to his client of all the facts, become the purchaser, and a deed taken in the name of a third person will be set aside as fraudulent. Re Bloye, 1 Macn. & G. 488. The lord chancellor said that he did not say to what extent solicitor and client might not deal with the property of the latter where he knows all the facts, but beyond all question the solicitor cannot surreptitiously, by which is meant without the knowledge of the client, become the purchaser.

Where an attorney who is employed to sell his client's property at auction, succeeds in disposing of but a small portion thereof, his subsequent purchase of a portion thereof, in consideration of a previous debt for costs and also for such an annuity for his client as the balance of the purchase price would obtain, will be set aside even after the client's death, where the latter was of intemperate habits, and the attorney did not make any special inquiries as to his health or habits, nor did it appear, as it must in order to sustain the sale, that the attorney exerted himself to obtain any better bargain for his client. Holman v. Loynes, 4 De G. M. & G. 270.

Where lands that a solicitor was employed to sell were appraised without his client's knowledge by a land valuer for a greater sum than the client had agreed to accept, the solicitor cannot, where one parcel sells for more than the appraised value, conceal that fact from his client, and purchase the remaining parcel in the name of a third person at a less figure than its valuation, the price of both parcels thus equaling the client's figure. Charter v. Trevelyan, 11 Clark & F. 714.

And such sale will be set aside when the facts are not disclosed to the client until thirty-seven years afterwards. Ibid.

Where a solicitor superintends an auction sale of his clients' property, one of whom is a minor, he cannot purchase a portion thereof at the sale, unless he shows special circumstances taking it out of the general rule against such transactions. Salmon v. Cutts, 4 De G. & S. 125, affirmed in 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 750. The court observed that the attorney should have advised his clients upon the subject or given them the advice of disinterested counsel before he became the purchaser.

There can be no acquiescence in such a purchase where the clients are all young. Ibid.

If acquiescence exists in any case the facts must be strong and plain, and show that the clients acted free from the solicitor's influence, and were aware of all the material circumstances, as well as the infirmity in the transaction. Ibid.

In Clarke v. Swaile, 2 Eden, 134, the pur-assuming to still represent the complainant, and stated that Mr. Cutter had finally concluded that the meadow property purchased by the railroad from Meyer was only a half interest, and not the whole property, and that the undivided one-half belonged to his client. He suggested an actual partition, and stated that he had had the property surveyed, and expressed the hope that they could agree upon a fair and equitable division.

After the ownership of the defendant became known, negotiations continued between him and the railroad on various lines, for a division of land by conveyances each to the other, by adopting a line of division or drawing by lot, for an exchange of contiguous properties owned by the parties, in which the 3-acre tract was included, for the purchase or sale at a figure to be fixed by the railroad. In fact, the evidence abundantly shows that the defendant made every effort in his power to realize upon the property without resorting to a lawsuit, to obtain an actual partition by agreement, to effect an exchange of properties, to realize cash upon his half interest by an actual sale at a figure, or to purchase the interest of the railroad at the same figure. Throughout the entire negotiations, the value placed upon the property by the defendant was $7,500, or in that immediate neighborhood. The negotiations having failed, the defendant brought a suit in equity against the railroad, claiming title to the land in question, asking for an accounting and a mandatory injunction against the railroad, enjoining and directing the removal of all the piers, docks, stores, buildings, and obstructions, and directing the restoration of Thorp's creek to its natural and navigable condition. The present suit was commenced nearly two years after the execution of the deed in question and shortly after the suit was brought by the defendant against the railroad.

As to the law applicable to this case, it is well settled. Mr. Justice (subsequently Chancellor) Magie in this court stated the rule as follows: "When two parties stand toward each other in any relation which necessarily induces one to put confidence in the chase by an attorney from his client of land for which he had been appointed trustee to sell, which he had failed to accomplish, was sustained where there was no fraud, and the purchase had been recognized and approved by the cestui que trust.

Right of attorney to purchase after termination of relation of attorney and client.

Even after the termination of the relation of attorney and client, the former will not be permitted to purchase the subject-matter of his retainer without clearly showing the fairness and equity thereof, as well as the adequacy of the consideration. Mason v. Ring, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 322; Brown v. Bulkley, 14 N. J. Eq. 451; Barrett v. Ball, 101 Mo. App. 288, 73 S. W. 865; Broun v. Kennedy, 4 De G. J. & S. 217, affirmed in 33 Beav. 133.

Or that the conveyance was the purely voluntary act of the client. Mason v. Ring, supra.

This doctrine was applied where, nine months after termination of the relation of attorney and client, the latter conveyed land to the attorney in compensation for his services. Ibid.

And this rule was applied in Broun v. Kennedy, supra, where, without independent advice, two months after the close of protracted litigation, a client conveyed to her solicitor a reversion of considerable value, charged with her debts and certain legacies, as such transaction is against public policy, and entitles the client to complain that she labored under a want of sufficient advice, information, and assistance on the subject before and when she executed the conveyance, which was, said the court, an instrument of great and substantial impropriety.

The reason for the rule being that a controlling influence over the client even then will be presumed to exist more or less. Barrett v. Ball, supra.

But it was held in Jinks v. Moppin (Tex. Civ. App.) 80 S. W. 390, that, where the relation of attorney and client has terminated, the purchase by the former in payment of his fees of property which was the subject of litigation is not affected by the usual rule in such cases, and the burden rests upon the client to prove fraud in the transaction.

Permitting conveyance to stand as security for attorney's advance and fees.

In general, in canceling such a sale by client to attorney, the latter will be allowed the amount paid his client therefor. Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 33 Pac. 836; Trotter v. Smith, 59 Ill. 240; Zeigler v. Hughes, 55 Ill. 288; Dunn v. Record, 63 Me. 17; Re Demarest, 11 App. Div. 156, 42 N. Y. Supp. 444.; Lane v. Black, 21 W. Va. 617.

In setting aside such a transaction, the attorney will be allowed his reasonable fees and expenses pertaining to the matter of his employment. Barrett v. Ball and Lane v. Black,—supra.

As well as his reasonable compensation. Keenan v. Scott (W. Va.) 61 S. E. 806.

And such a conveyance will be permitted to stand as security for what is actually due the attorney for his services and disbursements. Mason v. Ring, supra; Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. Jr. 120.

But is was held in Marden v. Dorthy, 12 App. Div. 176, 42 N. Y. Supp. 834, where an attorney is guilty of fraud in purchasing the subject-matter of his retainer, that the transfer will not be permitted to stand even as security for the money advanced by him thereon to his client.

other, and gives to the latter the influence which naturally grows out of such confidence, and a sale is made by the former to the latter, equity raises a presumption against the validity of the transaction. To sustain it the buyer must show affirmatively that the transaction was conducted in perfectly good faith, without pressure of influence on his part, with complete knowledge of the situation and circumstances, and of entire freedom of action on the part of the seller. When the confidential relation is that of attorney and client, the attorney who buys must also show that he gave to his client who sells full information and disinterested advice. Dunn v. Dunn, 42 N. J. Eq. 431, at page 443, 7 Atl. 842. The same principle is found in the English reports, following the leading case of Gibson v. Jeyes (1801) 6 Ves. Jr. 266. See Holman v. Loynes (1854) 4 De G. M. & G. 270; Savery v. King (1856) 5 H. L. Cas. 627; McPherson v. Watt (1877) L. R. 3 App. Cas. 254. Luddy v. Peard (1886) 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 884, is closely analogous to the present case. There a solicitor who had acted for a bankrupt purchased the interest of the latter in a trust estate. The solicitor had, apparently, in good faith and without intention to mislead, represented to the trustee in bankruptcy and to his solicitor and to the bankrupt himself that the interest was a life interest only, having no salable value; but before the purchase the solicitor's professional skill had led him to believe that this construction of the will was doubtful, and that it was possible that the bankrupt's interest was, after all, an absolute one, and he also formed the opinion that the estate was much more valuable than appeared from the rental, which he admitted was nothing like its true value. The solicitor purchased from the trustee in bankruptcy for £77 an estate which was worth £2,000. The opinion contains the following: "From a time anterior to the death of the testatrix until after his purchase from Sperring [the bankrupt's trustee], J. D. Peard acted as solicitor for Luddy in respect of this property. In the course of that employment he was called upon to consider carefully the extent of Luddy's interest under the will. He evidently formed an opinion that it was probably an absolute interest, and not merely . . . a life interest, as described in his letter of the 11th of December, 1876, . . . and his subsequent communications with Luddy and his trustee. In the course of the same employment he also formed an opinion that the property was more valuable than the actual rental showed. He did not disclose his opinion on these points either to Luddy or his trustee or the trustee's solicitor. . . . Putting aside the circumstance of secrecy and supposing Luddy not to be bankrupt, the case would be one in which Peard could not have maintained such a purchase from Luddy himself, unless he could show that he had made a full communication to his client of all he knew or believed respecting the property, and, as Lord Eldon said in Gibson v. Jeyes, supra, had given his client all that reasonable advice against himself that he would have given against a third person." As to the distinction made in the English cases between an attorney in hac re and one otherwise situated, see Montesquieu v. Sandys, 18 Ves. Jr. 302, at page 313; Holman v. Loynes and McPherson v. Watt, supra. There is no force in the contention here that Mr. Savage was not the attorney in hac re.

It is not necessary to find that the attorney was guilty of intentional wrongdoing. The reason why he did not disclose the material facts upon which we have commented is not important. The fact that he did not disclose them is sufficient. The law looks on transactions of this kind between an attorney and his client with suspicion, and will not permit a conveyance to the attorney to stand unless the attorney demonstrates the entire good faith of the transaction. It requires him to be absolutely frank and open with his client, to disclose every fact of which he has knowledge, and as well any professional opinion he may have formed, which could in any way affect the client in determining whether or not to make the conveyance. The conduct of Mr. Savage does not measure up to this standard of frankness.

The contention of the defendant's counsel that the Port Reading Railroad Company instigated the present action, and that it is intended to be and is a counter move on the part of the railroad to defeat the injunction suit brought by Mr. Savage against the railroad, or, as counsel graphically puts it, that "the hand of the railroad sticks up like a sore thumb throughout the entire suit from its commencement down to date,"—is interesting, but is no defense. The defendant is answered by the language of Vice Chancellor (now Mr. Justice) Reed in Ocean City R. Co. v. Bray, 57 N. J. Eq. 164, at page 167, 37 Atl. 604, 605, where he says: "In respect to those actions at law wherein malice is not an essential element in the plaintiff's case, or in those suits in equity where intent does not lie at the bottom of the right to relief, the courts will take no notice of the purpose in the mind of the parties in asserting or defending such legal or equitable rights. The right of a party to redress in such instances is ex debito justitiæ, and a court has no discretionary power to determine whether it will or will not award to a party his legal or equitable remedy, according to whether the party may or may not be actuated by a malicious or impolitic motive." In another case Vice Chancellor Reed aptly said: "In such case as this, bad motive in the complainant will not defeat the relief. At best it will arouse a suspicious scrutiny of the proofs as to the existence of the conditions upon which the remedy is given." Ft. Wayne Electric Corp. v. Franklin Electric Light Co. 57 N. J. Eq. 16, at page 21, 41 Atl. 666, 668. The United States Supreme Court has also held: "If the law concerned itself with the motives of parties, new complications would be introduced into suits which might seriously obscure their real merits. If the debt secured by a mortgage be justly due, it is no defense to a foreclosure that the mortgagee was animated by hostility or other bad motive." Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co. 176 U. S. 181, at page 191, 44 L. ed. 423, 430, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 311, 314; see also McFadden v. Mays Landing & E. H. City R. Co. 49 N. J. Eq. 176, at page 183, 22 Atl. 932; Davis v. Flagg (1882) 35 N. J. Eq. 491 (opinion by Beasley, Ch. J.); Roberts v. Tompkins (N. J.) 73 Atl. 505 (opinion by Parker, J.); McDonald v. Smalley, 1 Pet. 620, 7 L. ed. 287; Morris v. Tuthill, 72 N. The decree below is therefore reversed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA
v.

GEORGE EHRLICK et al., Appts.

(— W. Va. —, 64 S. E. 935.)

County attorney — authority — civil proceedings.

1. The prosecuting attorney of a county has authority, independent of the attorney general, to institute and prosecute all criminal actions and proceedings cognizable in the courts of his county, but has no such power or authority respecting the prosecution of civil proceedings on the part of the state, beyond that expressly conferred by statute.

Attorney general — powers.

2. As the chief law officer of the state, the attorney general is clothed and charged with all the common-law powers and duties pertaining to his office, except in so far as they have been limited by statute.

Same — civil litigation.

3. In the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, the attorney general has the management and control of civil litigation on behalf of the state.

Pleading — signature to bill by state — demurrer.

4. A bill in equity on behalf of the state, signed by counsel other than the attorney general, is not demurrable for lack of disclosure on its face of authority or direction from him to file the same. Such an objec-

Case Note. — Injunction at the suit of the state against public nuisance which is also a crime or misdemeanor.

This note is supplemental to that appended to the case of State ex rel. Crow v. Cauty, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 747.

It was held in State ex rel. Lyon v. City Club (S. C.) 65 S. E. 730, that the fact that an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor might be punished as a crime did not affect the equitable jurisdiction of the court to enjoin it as a public nuisance, at the suit of the state.

And this doctrine was applied in State ex rel. Lyon v. Columbia Water Power Co. 82 S. C. 181, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 435, 63 S. E. 884, notwithstanding the obstruction of a public navigable canal was also an indictable offense.

So, in Com. ex rel. Breathitt v. Respass (Ky.) 21 L.R.A. (N.S.) 836, 115 S. W. 1131, it was held that a court of chancery may, at the suit of the attorney general, enjoin as a common nuisance the maintenance of a place where pools upon horse racing are sold, notwithstanding it may also be a crime, where the criminal laws have proved ineffectual to afford relief. The court said that if the use of respondent's property was such as to require it to be restrained by injunction, the chancellor's jurisdiction was not affected by the fact that this use might be also a criminal offense. The remedy in equity being purely preventive, the chancellor does not punish for what has already been done, this being left for the criminal courts; but the only thing he does determine is that, in future, the property must be so used as not to be a nuisance.

The power to enjoin a public nuisance at the instance of the state or an individual, although an act is punishable as a crime, is conferred by statute in some instances. Attention is here called to a few cases in which such a statute has been construed. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; State ex rel. Duensing v. Roby, 142 Ind. 168, 33 L.R.A. 213, 51 Am. St. Rep. 174, 41 N. E. 145; Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488, 54 Am. Rep. 19, 22 N. W. 641; Carleton v. Rugg, 149 Mass. 550, 5 L.R.A. 193, 14 Am. St. Rep. 440, 22 N. E. 55; Clopton v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 105 S. W. 994; Ex parte Allison, 99 Tex. 455, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1111, 122 Am. St. Rep. 653, 90 S. W. 870; Ex parte Allison, 48 Tex. Crim. Rep. 634, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 622, 90 S. W. 492, 13 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 684; State ex rel. Rhodes v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 30, 18 L.R.A. 640, 25 Atl. 588, and cases therein cited.

tion must be raised by a motion to dismiss or plea in abatement.

Equity — jurisdiction — criminal matters.

5. If a charge is of a criminal nature, or an offense against the public, and does not touch the enjoyment of property or health, it is not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

Same — nuisance — abatement.

6. Equity has no jurisdiction to abate a public nuisance, either civil or criminal, at the instance of an individual or the state, not affecting or injuring the enjoyment of property or other personal rights.

Public nuisance — abatement — injunction.

7. In so far as a public nuisance injures property, or substantially interferes with the enjoyment thereof, directly or indirectly, or constitutes a purpresture, excluding citizens from the enjoyment of their civil rights in highways and other public grounds and places, or obstructing or interfering with the execution of the public business, it is abatable by injunction.

Injunction— protection of public rights — effect of criminality.

8. If an injunction is necessary and proper for the protection of such rights, criminality of the injurious act does not bar the remedy in equity.

Equity — criminal nuisance — gaming house — abatement.

9. Though the keeping of a gaming house is a criminal nuisance, punishable and abatable by indictment and conviction, there is no jurisdiction in equity to abate it, at the instance of either an individual or the state, unless it appears to be injurious to personal or property rights, and the injury is not otherwise adequately remediable.

Same — jurisdiction — criminal remedies — adequacy.

10. Criminal remedies and procedure must be deemed adequate to the maintenance of the public right in respect to moral and political principles, except in so far as the legislature may have provided others, since that body, having plenary power over such matters, has seen fit to rely upon existing remedies, and courts of equity are powerless to ordain jurisdiction for themselves.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Brooke County, perpetually enjoining them from conducting a business known as a "turf exchange." Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. J. Conliff for appellants.

Messrs. G. W. McClery, H. M. Russell, and William G. Conley for appellee.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On a bill purporting to be that of the state 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of West Virginia, not signed, however, by the attorney general, nor showing in any way that that officer authorized the filing of the same, but signed by the prosecuting attorney of a county, and an individual, describing himself as attorney for the state, the circuit court of Brooke county awarded a preliminary injunction, inhibiting the defendants, George Ehrlick and others, from carrying on or conducting what is known as a "turf exchange" in said county, extensively resorted to by people from other counties and states, for the purpose of betting on horse races occurring in different parts of the country, and reported by telegraph. On the maturing and submission of the cause to the court, a decree was made, perpetuating the injunction, from which the defendants have appealed.

The first objection to the bill is its failure to disclose any direction by the attorney general to institute the suit, his employment of counsel therefor, or his assent to the prosecution thereof; the record being entirely silent as to his attitude. Much authority is cited indicating power and authority in the attorney general to institute suits on behalf of the state, in proper cases, and the propriety of his doing so, but none indicating that such suits cannot be instituted by the prosecuting attorney of the county, either by virtue of his office, considering it as being independent of, and not subordinate to, that of the attorney general, or regarding it as a subordinate office in the executive department of justice of the state. The relation of the two offices to one another, their respective powers and duties, and the nature of the litigation, all enter into the solution of this question. The office of attorney general is of very ancient origin, and its duties and powers were recognized by the common law. That of prosecuting attorney is of modern creation, it seems, and its powers and duties are given, imposed, and prescribed by statutory law. 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1028; Atty. Gen. v. Forbes, 2 Myl. & C. 129. Prosecuting attorneys are generally described as deputies or assistants of the attorney general (4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1026), but they are not dependent upon him for their powers in all cases, nor in all respects subject to his control (23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 275). In the exercise of his common-law powers, the attorney general may, no doubt, advise the prosecuting attorney, as he does other officers, since he is regarded as the chief law officer of the state. As the Constitution and laws of the state make the two offices separate and distinct, and vest in the prosecuting attorney certain powers and impose upon him certain duties, it seems clear that the attorney general cannot strip him of the powers expressly given, nor increase the burdens laid upon him. The sense in which the local officer is subordinate to the general one seems to be that they are engaged in the same branch or department of the public business. This makes the relation theoretical, rather than practical. The business once pertaining actually as well as theoretically to the office of attorney general has been divided between the two offices for purposes of convenience. We may say the office of prosecuting attorney has been carved out of that of attorney general and made an independent office, having exclusive control, to some extent, of business of the state arising within the county.

No doubt the attorney general may assist the prosecuting attorney in the prosecution of such business, or perform it himself, in case of the nonaction of the prosecuting attorney, but he cannot displace that officer. He has neither power of removal nor control over him within his own province, so far as it is defined by statute, for, if the division of powers made by the statute were not respected nor observed nor susceptible of enforcement, the object and purpose of the division would be defeated. There would be no individual responsibility, if the powers of the attorney general and prosecuting attorney were coextensive and concurrent. The one would be no more responsible than the other for the nonenforcement of the laws. Concurrence would produce interference, conflict, and friction in many instances, delaying the disposition of business, to the detriment of the state. We think it plain, therefore, that, in a practical sense, the two offices are distinct and independent; but all the business does not seem to have been divided. Part of the civil business of the state in the county seems to have been reserved to the attorney general. Section 6, chap. 120, Code 1899 (Code 1906, § 3778), defines generally the duties of the prosecuting attorney, in the following terms: "It shall be the duty of every prosecuting attorney in this state to attend to the criminal business of the state in the county in which he is elected and qualified, and also to civil cases in which the state is interested in such county, when required by and under the direction of the auditor; and, when he has information of the violation of any penal law committed within his county, shall institute and prosecute all necessary and proper proceedings against the offender, and may in such case issue or cause to be issued a summons for any witness he may deem material. He shall also represent the county in all suits and proceedings for and on behalf of or against the county, or county court, overseers of the poor, or other public authorities of the county, and carefully look after and give attention to the general interests of the county." His authority extends to all the criminal business of the state in his own county. As to civil business in which the state is interested, he can act, on behalf of the state, only when required by the auditor, and under the direction of the latter, or when the duty is enjoined by some statute. There are many other provisions imposing specific duties concerning particular matters, but there is no statute giving him power to represent the state generally in respect to its civil business.

The conclusion just stated implies that the authority of the prosecuting attorney to institute this suit depends upon its character. If it is a criminal proceeding, he had such authority; but, if it is a civil one, he had not, unless it was given by the auditor, and, in the latter case, an inquiry might arise as to whether the auditor is chargeable with any duty or given any authority respecting a matter of this kind. As the bill was framed and is now regarded by its defenders, it is a criminal information, filed for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law. If it can be maintained as such, the filing and prosecution thereof are within the statutory jurisdiction and power of the prosecuting attorney; but if the procedure is not authorized by the criminal law, nor its object within the auditor's power of direction, it should have been instituted by the attorney general. Whether the absence of the signature of the latter to the bill, or the lack of disclosure in the bill of his direction to institute the suit, makes the pleading bad on demurrer, is the question most extensively discussed in the briefs; but no authority for any of the contentions is cited. It seems to us, however, that such an objection ought to be raised by a plea in abatement or motion to dismiss. It is not the bill of the attorney general. The state of West Virginia is the plaintiff, and there is a presumption that no attorney would institute such a suit without authority. It would be inconsistent with his duty and obligation as an officer of the court. When the question is properly raised, the authority of the attorney must be shown (Mullan v. United States, 118 U. S. 271, 30 L. ed. 170, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1041; Western P. R. Co. v. United States, 108 U. S. 512, 27 L. ed. 806, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 802); but we think the question was not properly raised.

The charge against the defendants is the keeping and conducting of a gaming house, constituting a public nuisance. Nothing of detriment to the community or the public at large is alleged against them other than the unlawfulness of the enterprise. The bill says they take dishonest profits from the betting, and carry it on with great profit to themselves and at slight risk of loss. It is not alleged that anybody's property is injured, or that the place is in any sense disorderly. The theory of the bill, adhered to in the argument, is that the enterprise tending to corrupt the morals of the public makes it a nuisance, abatable by injunction.

Jurisdiction in equity to abate nuisances is undoubted and of universal recognition. It is equally well settled that the state may institute suits for that purpose in proper cases, but it is nowhere asserted that either the state or a private individual may maintain such a suit in any and all cases of nuisance. In other words, relief in equity by abatement is not the necessary sequence of the establishment of the charge of nuisance. Some nuisances are criminal, while others are not. Criminal nuisances are abatable by criminal process; and, where this process is adequate, jurisdiction in equity fails, either because adequate legal remedy precludes jurisdiction in equity, or the subject-matter is beyond the scope of equity jurisdiction. If a nuisance purely criminal injures or affects a private plaintiff in certain respects, he may resort to equity for relief; but the existence of neither a civil nor criminal public nuisance necessarily calls for interposition by a court of equity. A private person cannot abate it unless it is specially injurious or prejudicial to him, and the state cannot proceed against it in equity if it be merely a criminal nuisance, unattended by injury to a personal or property right of some sort, creating necessity for prevention of irreparable injury.

"The cases in which chancery has interfered by injunction, to prevent or remove a private nuisance, are those in which the nuisance has been erected to the prejudice or annoyance of a right which the other party had long previously enjoyed. It must be a strong and mischievous case, of pressing necessity, or the right must have been previously established at law, to entitle the party to call to his aid the jurisdiction of this court." Van Bergen v. Van Bergen, 3 Johns. Ch. 287, 8 Am. Dec. 511; Fisk v. Wilber, 7 Barb. 395; Kingsbury v. Flowers, 65 Ala. 479, 39 Am. Rep. 14. "To obtain relief in equity for a private nuisance, the threatened injury must be irreparable, incapable of compensation in damages, and not doubtful or contingent." Green v. Lake, 54 Miss. 540, 28 Am. Rep. 378. "There is no case for equity unless the charge be for injury to the enjoyment of property or other personal rights." Sparhawk v. Union Pass. R. Co. 54 Pa. 401. It is elementary law that the subject-matter of the jurisdiction of the court of chancery is civil property. The court is conversant only with questions of property and the maintenance of civil rights. Injury to, property, whether actual or prospective, is the foundation on which the jurisdiction rests. The court has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or merely immoral, which do not affect any right to property. Nor do matters of a political character come within the jurisdiction of the court of chancery. Nor has the court of chancery jurisdiction to interfere with the public duties of any department of government, except under special circumstances, and where necessary for the protection of rights of property." Sheridan v. Colvin, 78 Ill. 237, 247; People v. Condon, 102 Ill. App. 449, 457; Ocean City Assn. v. Schurch, 57 N. J. Eq. 268, 41 Atl. 914. "If a charge be of a criminal nature, or an offense against the public, and does not touch the enjoyment of property, it ought not to be brought within the direct jurisdiction of this court, which was intended to deal only in matters of civil right resting in equity, or where the remedy at law was not sufficiently adequate; nor ought the process of injunction to be applied, but with the utmost caution. It is the strong arm of the court; and to render its operation benign and useful it must be exercised with great discretion, and when necessity requires it." Atty. Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 378; Morris & E. R. Co. v. Prudden, 20 N. J. Eq. 530, 536. "A court of equity has no jurisdiction in matters merely criminal or immoral. It leaves the correction of these matters to the criminal courts. The remedy at law is presumed to be adequate, but, if it is not so, the relief must come from the lawmaking power, and not from the courts." People v. Condon, 102 Ill. App. 449, Syl. point 4; Cope v. District Fair Asso. 99 Ill. 489, 39 Am. Rep. 30; Atty. Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371.

The text in Story's Equity Jurisprudence (§§ 921 to 924), according equity jurisdiction great latitude to interfere, by injunction, to abate nuisances, is to be taken and understood, not literally, but subject to the principles above stated. Although the language of these sections is very broad, it does not import in terms jurisdiction in equity to enforce the criminal laws or to interfere where the purpose is other than the vindication of personal and property rights. The English decisions referred to by Story, as showing the ancient origin of such jurisdiction, at the suit of the attorney general, all had such objects. None of them contemplated mere enforcement of criminal laws or the maintenance of public policy. Atty. Gen. v. Cleaver, 18 Ves. Jr. 211, had for its object the inhibition of the manufacture of soap, and the preparation of materials used in the manufacture thereof, in a certain place, on the ground that it was offensive and injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the community. No questions of morality or criminality entered into the cause. The court, having concluded that the carrying on of such a trade was not per se a nuisance, directed an issue to a jury to determine whether it was in fact a nuisance. Atty. Gen. v. Forbes, 2 Myl. & C. 123, related to a public highway; its object being to prevent, by injunction, municipal authorities from leaving a highway bridge open so that the general public could not pass over it. Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. Jr. 618, involved an injunction to prevent the defendants from using certain premises as a powder magazine, on the ground that it was a public nuisance; it having been erected near a public road and the premises of the plaintiffs, and having also been improperly constructed. This clearly involved a property right. It was so peculiarly and distinctively a bill of that kind that it was entertained at the instance of private parties; but the court, being of the opinion that the evidence did not make out a clear case of nuisance, directed an indictment to be drawn and the question put in issue, in the meantime withholding the injunction. This course was taken because courts of equity are reluctant to exercise this jurisdiction at all, and will not do so except in clear cases. The indictment was directed, not for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law, but to the end that, through it, the chancellor might know whether the carrying on of that trade was unlawful under all the circumstances; it not being per se a nuisance.

Another extensive class of cases, cited in the text of Story's Equity Jurisprudence, is composed of those having for their object the vindication of public rights in respect to property, such as obstructions to highways, public grounds, harbors, and landings. These obstructions are classed by the old writers as "purprestures," signifying inclosures. One who erects a structure in a street, road, park, harbor, or river, or makes inclosures thereon, may be said to take over to himself, or inclose for his sole benefit, the portion so occupied, and withdraw it from the use and enjoyment of all the citizens, to the injury and detriment of the general public. It may be no more to the detriment of one person than to another, so that no individual could enjoin the act as being peculiarly and especially injurious to him. In such cases the attorney general may proceed in equity on behalf of the public to abate the nuisance, if it be one. Whether it be a criminal nuisance or not is wholly immaterial. If it is indictable as a crime, it does not bar the remedy in equity, because the citizen and the general public have an immediate right to the enjoyment of the thing interfered with. A criminal prosecution is inadequate in such cases, because it does not prevent the doing of the unlawful act. It may ultimately correct the wrong, but, while the process of correction is going on, the public is deprived of an important and valuable right, wherefore the injury is irreparable. In such cases it is not the criminality of the act that gives jurisdiction in equity, but the deprivation of personal and property rights interfered with, injured, destroyed, or taken away by the unlawful act. For the mere vindication of the criminal law and the enforcement of the public policy of the state, let it be founded upon moral or other considerations, the legal remedy by indictment and prosecution is fully adequate and peculiarly appropriate.

The decisions in this country, awarding injunctions to abate purprestures, are numerous. The principle upon which they proceed underlies the decision in the notable case of Re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 39 L. ed. 1092, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900. After he had been committed for contempt in refusing to obey an injunction, Debs tested the jurisdiction in equity by a writ of habeas corpus from the Federal Supreme Court. In reply to his contention, that court asserted right in the government to proceed by injunction to clear from obstruction the artificial highways of the country for the passage of interstate commerce and the transmission of the mails. Debs was the leader of a great strike of railway men, and their organization and method of operation were such as to wholly prevent transportation of every kind through the city of Chicago and other places. The blockade or interference was as complete and effectual as would have been that of structures built entirely across the railroads. Though there were no buildings or structures interposed, there was an occupation of the railroads, the great common carriers of the country, so that nothing could pass. It wrought injury, personal and financial, to all the citizens of the United States, and deprived them of personal rights, such as those of travel and communication. All this constituted more than a crime. It was a material, substantial, incalculable injury to the people. The interference produced the same results that would have come from the erection of buildings or other structures on the railroad so as to prevent transportation. It fell completely and perfectly within the definition of a "purpresture." Other cases illustrating this doctrine are the following: Raritan Twp. v. Port Reading R. Co. 49 N. J. Eq. 11, 23 Atl. 127; People v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 396, 84 Am. Dec. 351; Biddle v. Ash, 2 Ashm. (Pa.) 211; People ex rel. Roberts v. Beaudry, 91 Cal. 213, 27 Pac. 610; State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.)

whether the defendant was guilty of having violated chapter 82, p. 143, Laws 1905.

The cause was duly submitted on the charge, made in due form, and a plea of not guilty and a stipulation of facts.

The facts agreed upon were, in substance, as follows: The defendant, on June 16, 1908, in Milwaukee county, Wisconsin, sold and delivered to Samuel Burden a sealed package of smoking tobacco, labeled as "Duke's Mixture Smoking Tobacco." Upon opening the package it was found to contain a coupon, so called, to the effect that, upon receipt of three of such coupons through the mails by "Duke's Mixture Department 8, 111 5th Ave., New York City, The American Tobacco Company, Mfr., Factory No. 42, 4th Dist. N. C.," would send to the one transmitting them a specified amount of Duke's Mixture cigarette paper. The Duke's Mixture Department named in the coupon is a department of the tobacco company mentioned, which is a foreign corporation. The defendant is a retail merchant in the city of Milwaukee, dealing, among other things, in tobacco at retail. He purchased the package sold as aforesaid in the open market, in the regular course of business, from a wholesale dealer, for the purpose of supplying his retail trade.

The defendant was duly adjudged guilty of having unlawfully offered for sale cigarette wrappers and cigarette paper for the purpose of being filled with tobacco for smoking, contrary to chapter 82, p. 143, Laws 1905. Thereupon further proceedings in the cause were stayed pending the result of a report of the same to this court, as to the question of law involved.

The trial court, being of the opinion that the facts stipulated as aforesaid presented a question of law of such importance and doubtful character as to require final solution by this court, certified the case for such solution, pursuant to § 4721, Stat. 1898, the defendant consenting thereto.

Messrs. F. L. Gilbert, Attorney General, A. C. Titus, and Norman L. Baker for the State.

Messrs. Winkler, Flanders, Bottum, & Fawcett, for defendant:

The significant fact which gives to the sale the character of interstate commerce is that the article sold is in another state, and, to effectuate the transaction as a sale, requires to be transported into the state where the sale is made.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented for solution is this: Is a sale or gift of an order or paper, characterized as a coupon in this action, by a person in this state to another therein, as part of an entire transaction including the sale of a package of tobacco, entitling the recipient, in case of his obtaining two other like papers, and sending all by mail to a designated dealer in tobacco products and cigarette paper outside the state, to receive therefrom a specified quantity of cigarette paper,—a violation by such person of § 1, chap. 82, p. 143, of the Laws of 1905, prohibiting "any person by himself, his servant or agent, or as the servant or agent of any other person, directly or indirectly, or upon any pretense, or by any device," from selling, offering for sale, keeping for sale, giving away, or otherwise disposing of, "any such cigarettes, cigarette paper," etc.?

That a transaction of the nature stated falls within the spirit of the statute seems beyond reasonable controversy, and that it falls within its letter seems hardly less plain.

It appears that the scheme is but a bald subterfuge to cloak the real purpose to sell or give away cigarette paper to persons in this state, in circumvention of the law, the local dealer being the principal in the sense that a sale of a package includes the sale of a coupon, and an agent in the sense that he acts for the foreign dealer in the latter's efforts to supply customers in this state with cigarette paper.

Counsel for the defendant do not seem to seriously contend to the contrary of the foregoing, and the learned attorney general appears to unite with them in presenting the matter from a common view point, exempting the defendant from liability upon the ground hereafter stated.

We have the anomalous situation of counsel for defendant contending, in the main, that the stipulated facts do not show a punishable violation of the cigarette law because such law is ineffective as regards an act requiring interstate commerce to effectuate it by putting the consumer in possession of the prohibited article, and the learned attorney general subscribing to the same view, and joining with defendant's counsel in urging the position upon the attention of this court as unavoidably requiring an answer to the submitted question in defendant's favor. Doubtless, the state's officer was unable to see any escape from such position, and so, in justice to the defendant and the court as well, frankly made known his opinion in that regard instead of contending to the contrary. That is commendable, but does not preclude the court from considering, or perhaps more correctly stated, excuse it for failing to consider, the question as involving the element of serious doubt discovered by the learned trial court, warranting the certification to this court.

The statute seems in effect to prohibit, as plainly about as English words could be used to that end, anyone in this state, as principal or agent, directly or indirectly, from being concerned in selling or giving away to any person in this state cigarettes or cigarette paper. Significant to that effect are the words "directly or indirectly, or upon any pretense, or by any device." The sale of the package of tobacco with the coupons inclosed, exchangeable for cigarette paper, would not have been any different if the package had contained such paper instead of the equivalent. Can anyone fairly say that was not a mere pretense or device resorted to for disposing of such paper while giving the transaction a different color? In the opinion of the court the answer must be as here indicated.

The stipulated facts, as we view them, do not raise any question of interstate commerce, and therefore the able arguments of counsel on both sides that they do, and that 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the proper solution thereof is fatal to the prosecution, we omit to consider.

The question submitted is answered in the affirmative, and the cause remanded for judgment upon the conviction.

Dodge, J., dissenting (filed January 29, 1909):

In the statement of facts should be noted absence of any knowledge on defendant's part that the sealed package contained the so-called coupon. I am unable to bring my mind to the view that the sale and delivery of a sealed package of tobacco, purchased by the seller of a wholesaler, is, in any reasonable sense, a sale of, or an offer to sell, cigarette papers in Wisconsin, merely because the manufacturer has clandestinely inserted in such package an offer that, upon performance of certain conditions, he will sell at New York cigarette papers to any person producing that and two other similar notices. No argument can add to the mere statement of the proposition. I think, too, that several phases of interstate commerce must be involved before the acts of defendant can in any way be connected with the sale of cigarette papers to anyone. The sale of a magazine containing an advertisement of the same offer by a New York merchant, would, to my mind, present exactly the same questions.

I therefore am constrained to agreement with the attorney general that no crime is disclosed, and to dissent from the judgment of the court.

Petition for rehearing denied March 30, 1909.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

HERBERT M. PETERS, Appt.,

v.

MARY GIRD PETERS, Respnt.

(— Cal. —, 103 Pac. 219.)

Husband and wife — personal injury — action.

1. A husband cannot maintain an action against his wife for injuries inflicted upon him by her act in deliberately wounding him with a gun, either at common law or under statutes giving her the right to separate property, and permitting them to contract with each other.

Same — statutory authority.

2. A mere statutory provision that, when the action is between a married woman and her husband, she may sue and be sued alone,

Case Note. — Husband's right to sue wife for personal tort.

A careful search has brought to light no other decisions upon this question, but the point was commented on in Kujek v. Gold- does not give him a right to sue her for a personal tort inflicted upon him by her.

Appeal — nonprejudicial error.

3. Although there is no appeal from the judgment, the cause will not be reversed for error in denying plaintiff's motion for new trial because defendant's evidence was not sufficient to support his defense, if the complaint on its face shows that no recovery can be had on the cause of action set forth therein, and that no amendment can correct it, so that the error, if any, is without prejudice.

(July 3, 1909.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court for San Diego County denying a new trial after verdict and judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been deliberately inflicted upon plaintiff by defendant, his wife. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. S. Utley and Haines & Haines for appellant.

Messrs. Daney & Lewis, for respondent:

Neither the husband nor the wife can successfully maintain an action for damages against the other for a tort committed by one upon the other while the marriage relation exists.

Shaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order denying his motion for a new trial. There is no appeal from the judgment.

The plaintiff and defendant, at the time the alleged cause of action arose, were, and still are, husband and wife. The wife severely wounded the husband by wilfully, without just cause or excuse, shooting him in the leg with a shotgun, injuring him so severely that he was confined to his bed for more than a month and was disabled from doing his ordinary work for several months thereafter. The verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendant.

The appellant complains of a number of rulings of the court below upon the introduction of evidence and in the giving and refusing of instructions to the jury. He also assigns as cause for a new trial that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. It is unnecessary to consider these assignments of error in detail. If we should concede that the plaintiff could maintain an action against his wife for battery, we should be compelled to hold that the evidence was wholly insufficient to support the verdict. According to her own testimony, she deliberately and wilfully shot her husband in the leg for no other reason than to prevent him from going into a bedroom of the house which she then occupied, for the purpose of taking therefrom a small amount of cotton batting which he claimed a right to take. She made no claim that she was in any real personal danger from him at the time, and there is no real foundation for the pretense that she was acting in self-defense. The shooting was entirely unjustifiable as a defense of her right to maintain possession of the cotton batting. The court below, upon its view of the right of the husband to maintain such an action, should have directed the jury to find for the plaintiff in such amount as they should believe from the evidence he was damaged. The defendant may consider herself fortunate that she was not prosecuted criminally for the act, and that such prosecution is now barred by lapse of time.

Notwithstanding this conclusion, we are satisfied that, under the law in this state as it is, an action cannot be maintained by one spouse against the other for a battery committed during the continuance of the marriage relation, and hence that the plaintiff has suffered no substantial injury to his rights by the verdict against him. The man, 9 Misc. 34, 29 N. Y. Supp. 294, affirmed in 150 N. Y. 176, 34 L.R.A. 150, 55 Am. St. Rep. 670, 44 N. E. 773, which was an action against a man who had been criminally intimate with the plaintiff's wife previous to their marriage, for fraud in inducing the marriage by falsely representing the woman to be chaste. The action was originally begun against both the defendant and plaintiff's wife, and although abandoned as against the latter, the court said: "The action was not maintainable by the plaintiff against his wife because of her participation in the fraud perpetrated upon him. The common-law unity of husband and wife operates to preclude either spouse from successfully maintaining an action for damages in tort against the other."

question is entirely new in this state, and such cases are rare in other jurisdictions; but there is no case in favor of the right to maintain such an action.

The common law of England is declared to be the rule of decision in all courts of this state, so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with our Constitution and statutes. Pol. Code, § 4468. By the common law the husband and wife were deemed to be one person, and no suit at law of any character could be maintained by one against the other. 21 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1517; 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 195; 1 Cooley's Bl. 442; Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 52; Phillips v. Barnet, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 436; Countz v. Markling, 30 Ark. 17; Crowther v. Crowther, 55 Me. 358; Hobbs v. Hobbs, 70 Me. 381. Owing to the modern statutes giving the wife the right to separate property and to make contracts with her husband concerning the same, it is now generally held that an action at law concerning property may be maintained between them. In many of the states such actions are expressly authorized by statute; but even where such actions are allowed, either expressly or by necessary implication, it has been uniformly decided, in the few states where the question has arisen, that neither can sue the other, even after a divorce, for personal wrongs inflicted upon one by the other during the marriage. 21 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1519; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 857; Peters v. Peters, 42 Iowa, 182; Main v. Main, 46 Ill. App. 106; Bandfield v. Bandfield, 117 Mich. 80, 40 L.R.A. 757, 72 Am. St. Rep. 550, 75 N. W. 287; Abbe v. Abbe, 22 App. Div. 433, 48 N. Y. Supp. 26; Schultz v. Schultz, 89 N. Y. 644, reversing same case in 27 Hun, 26; Freethy v. Freethy, 42 Barb. 641; Longendyke v. Longendyke, 44 Barb. 366; Chestnut v. Chestnut, 77 Ill. 350; Smith v. Gorman, 41 Me. 405; Abbott v. Abbott, 67 Me. 304, 24 Am. Rep. 27; Heyob v. Her Husband, 18 La. Ann. 41; Moore v. Moore, 18 La. Ann. 613. In New York the statute authorized a married woman to "bring and maintain an action in her own name for damages against any person or body corporate for any injury to her person or character, the same as if she were sole." [Laws 1860, chap. 90, § 7.] Yet the courts of that state declared that this was not intended to and did not permit a suit by her against her husband to recover damages for battery or slander. Longendyke v. Longendyke; Freethy v. Freethy; and Schultz v. Schultz,—supra. In the Longendyke Case the court said that to allow such actions is "contrary to the policy of the law and destructive of that conjugal union and tranquillity which it has always been the policy of the law to guard and protect." 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the Freethy Case it was further observed that "when the legislature intends to make such a striking innovation of the rules of the common law, and so much opposed to public policy and the peace and happiness of the conjugal relation, as would be the case if husband and wife were permitted to sue each other for alleged wrongs to character, it should use such language as will make it clearly manifest, and not leave it to the construction of the courts." These authorities clearly indicate what the rule should be in this state unless we find some statutory provisions to the contrary.

We discover in our statutes nothing that can be construed to show an intention to permit actions for tort between husband and wife. The Civil Code provides: That either husband or wife may "enter into any engagements or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might if unmarried" (§ 158); that they cannot, "by any contract with each other, alter their legal relations, except as to property," except to make a written contract for separation (§ 159); and that they "contract toward each other obligations of mutual respect, fidelity, and support" (§ 155); also, that each has the power to manage and dispose of his or her separate property (§§ 1093, 1094, 1187, 325, 1273). The Code of Civil Procedure provides that "when a married woman is a party [to an action] her husband must be joined with her, except: (1) When the action concerns her separate property, or her right or claim to the homestead property, she may sue alone; (2) When the action is between herself and her husband, she may sue or be sued alone." The third subdivision of this action authorizes her to sue alone when she is living apart from her husband, by reason of his desertion or a separation agreement. Code Civ. Proc. § 370.

The provisions of the Civil Code relate solely to contract and property rights. They recognize the separate property of husband and wife, and authorize contracts between them concerning the same. This necessarily implies that actions by one against the other for the protection of such property and the enforcement of contracts relating thereto can be maintained. Our Code system authorizes but one form of action for all cases, either in law or equity. Suits between husband and wife have long been permitted in equity, and in actions for divorce the husband and wife were necessarily upon opposite sides of the case. It was necessary therefore, in a Code providing for but one form of action, to make a rule covering all cases. Hence, in the chapter of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the parties to the single form of action provided, it was declared that, in actions between herself and her husband, a married woman can sue and be sued alone. This sufficiently accounts for the presence of that provision. It would be a forced interpretation to attempt to discern in that declaration, or in any of the provisions of the Civil Code, an intent to make a departure from the common law so radical, and so opposed to its general policy, as the authorization of a suit by the husband or wife against the other for injuries to the person or character. In the language of the supreme court of Maine in Abbott v. Abbott, supra, the relation of marriage, while it continues, so to speak, "acts as a perpetually operating discharge of all wrongs between man and wife, committed by one upon the other." The only remedies for such wrongs, afforded by our law, as it stands, are to be found in the Penal Code and in the action for divorce or maintenance, with the additional portion of the community property which may be given to the wronged party where cruelty is the cause for which divorce is adjudged.

The appellant contends that, as his appeal is from the order denying a new trial only, and there is no appeal from the judgment, the sufficiency of the complaint cannot be considered,—citing Swift v. Occidental Min. & Petroleum Co. 141 Cal. 161, 74 Pac. 700. He urges that the only course this court can pursue, inasmuch as there is manifest error in denying the motion for new trial and in the rulings upon the trial, is to reverse the order and remand the case for a new trial. The question whether or not the error complained of has produced substantial injury to the appellant is always a proper question for consideration upon appeal. It is not the rule that in every case where the evidence is insufficient to establish some one or more of the material facts in issue, or where erroneous instructions have been given, and there is no appeal from the judgment, this court must reverse the order denying a new trial and remand the cause, directing the lower court to try the case anew, notwithstanding our conviction that, because of facts admitted by the pleadings, and of which there can be no dispute, no different verdict could ever be properly rendered. No error should suffice to reverse a judgment or order, if it appears that the appellant has not been and could not be injured thereby. Where the complaint on its face shows that the plaintiff could not, in any event, recover upon the cause of action set forth therein, and it appears that no amendment could cure it, no erroneous ruling at the trial will justify a reversal of the judgment against him. Gilbert v. Allen, 57 Ind. 524; McPhail v. Buell, 87 Cal. 115, 25 Pac. 266; McCreery 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Wells, 94 Cal. 485, 29 Pac. 877; 3 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 385; 3 Century Dig. cols. 1933, 1934; Code Civ. Proc. § 475. Here it appears affirmatively from the record that the plaintiff was not and could not be injured in any substantial legal right by the verdict against him, and that the greatest injury this court could inflict upon him in the case would be to reverse the order without informing him, or the lower court, of his predicament, and allow him to go through the form of another trial, only to be met ultimately with a decision that he never had the cause of action against his wife for damages upon which he has sued, and that no judgment in his favor therefor could be sustained.

Our conclusion is that, notwithstanding the fact that the evidence is insufficient to support any finding that the defendant was justified in shooting the plaintiff, or any of the defenses set up in the answer, the verdict against the plaintiff is harmless because of the fact that he has no right to maintain the action at all.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

EMIL TOBLER et al., Appts.,

v.

JOHN NEVITT.

(45 Colo. 231, 100 Pac. 416.)

Attorney — authority — appeal.

The employment of an attorney to conduct a trial to final termination in the nisi prius court does not authorize him to appeal from an adverse decision or bind his client for the cost of a transcript of evidence to be used for that purpose.

(February 1, 1909.)

Case Note. — Implied power of attorney to bind client for expenses incidental to trial, including associate counsel fees.

This note does not cover the question as to an attorney's power to bind his client for witness fees and like items which are commonly taxed as costs. Neither are cases involving the power of attorneys to execute bonds on behalf of their clients included. The note deals only with the implied power of attorneys at law and excludes cases of attorneys in fact.

Implied authority to incur incidental expenses.

As a general rule an attorney at law has implied authority to bind his client for ex-

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Saguache County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover for certain personal services rendered. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Davidson, for appellants:

The authority of an attorney to represent his client in an action ceases upon the entry of judgment, except for a year and a day, during which he has authority to enforce the judgment by execution.

1 Coke, Inst. 378; 1 Tidd. Pr. 33; Kronschnable v. Knoblauch, 21 Minn. 56; Hinkley v. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. 9 Minn. 55, Gil. 44; McMurray v. Marsh, 12 Colo. App. 95, 54 Pac. 852; Weeks, Attorneys at Law, p. 496, § 242; Magnolia Metal Co. v. Sterlingworth R. Supply Co. 26 Misc. 63, 56 N. Y. Supp. 478.

An attorney employed to try a case in the district court has no authority to appeal.

penses incidental to the trial of the cause in which he is retained.

Stenographer's fees.

A stenographer is entitled to recover from a party for services rendered in taking testimony upon a reference of a special issue at the request of such party's attorney. Thorn-ton v. Tuttle, 20 Abb. N. C. 308, 7 N. Y. S. R. 801. The court said: "The relation of an attorney to his client is that of agency in respect to such matters as come within the conduct and management of the action in which he is employed. The method of taking evidence with a view to completeness and accuracy, as well as expedition, is a matter for the judgment of the attorney, relating to the trial of actions and to the preservation and presentation of the proofs for consideration. The use of stenography for that purpose is neither unusual nor unreasonable. And, ordinarily, the employment of the means to take the testimony in that manner and to furnish a longhand copy of it thus taken would come within the scope of the authority of the attorney as such, and the liability for the service be that of the client."

And the fact that such party instructed the attorney not to employ a stenographer will not affect the right of recovery where the instruction was unknown to the stenographer employed. Ibid.

So, the authority of the attorney is not qualified by the fact that the rules of the court in which the testimony is taken contemplate that the testimony shall be taken by the examiner and the depositions of the several witnesses read over to and signed by them. Ibid.

A client is likewise responsible for stenographer's fees where the stenographer is employed by his attorney to take the minutes of the proceedings before an auditor. Harry v. Hilton, 64 How. Pr. 199.

So, an attorney has implied power to bind 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Richardson v. Tallot, 2 Bibb, 382; Weeks, Attorneys at Law, pp. 510, 513, §§ 248, 249; Hopkins v. Mallard, 1 G. Greene, 117; Ikerd v. Borland, 35 La. Ann. 337; Delaney v. Husband, 64 N. J. L. 275, 45 Atl. 265; Coles v. Anderson, 8 Humph. 489; Covill v. Phy, 24 Ill. 37; National Park Bank v. Lanahan, 60 Md. 477; Clark & S. Agency, p. 1433; Hooker v. Brandon, 75 Wis. 8, 43 N. W. 741.

The presumption of authority from his employment in the trial court does not apply after judgment, and those dealing with him under such circumstances must inform themselves as to his authority.

Weeks, Attorneys at Law, 2d ed. 496, § 242.

Messrs. George T. Sumner and John Nevitt, for appellee:

An attorney has implied power, without special authority, to employ a stenographer to transcribe evidence to be used in the trial his client for the payment of a court stenographer's services in transcribing evidence for use at the trial. Miller v. Palmer, 25 Ind. App. 357, 81 Am. St. Rep. 107, 58 N. E. 213.

And evidence that the client never authorized his attorney to employ such stenographer is immaterial. Ibid.

So, where a court reporter furnishes copies during the trial at an attorney's request and the client knows that they are being used by his attorney, he is liable therefor. Palmer v. Miller, 19 Ind. App. 624, 49 N. E. 975. To the same effect is Query v. Cooney, 34 Misc. 161, 68 N. Y. Supp. 800.

In Bonyne v. Field, 81 N. Y. 159, which was an action to recover from attorneys for stenographer's services, the court said that the rule that, when a person contracts as the agent of another and the fact of his agency is known to the person with whom he contracts, the principal alone, and not the agent, is responsible, applies to the relation of attorney and client.

And in a like action it was held in Bonyne v. Waterbury, 12 Hun, 534, that an attorney was not liable for the fees of a stenographer employed to furnish a copy of testimony, unless he expressly bound himself for their payment.

Printer's bill.

The employment of a printer by counsel to print their briefs at the client's expense is implied from the relation of attorney and client. But the client will not be bound for a greater number than the rules of court require. Weisse v. New Orleans, 10 La. Ann. 46.

To the same effect are Williamson-Stewart Paper Co. v. Bosbyshell, 14 Mo. App. 534, and Livingston Middleditch Co. v. New York College, 31 Misc. 259, 64 N. Y. Supp. 140, reversing 30 Misc. 331, 61 N. Y. Supp. 918.

So, where a client directs his attorneys of his client's cause, and to bind the client for such services.

Miller v. Palmer, 25 Ind. App. 357, 81 Am. St. Rep. 107, 58 N. E. 213; Harry v. Hilton, 64 How. Pr. 199; Williamson-Stewart Paper Co. v. Bosbyshell, 14 Mo. App. 534; Moulton v. Bowker, 115 Mass. 40, 15 Am. Rep. 72; Clark v. Randall, 9 Wis. 135, 76 Am. Dec. 252; Nelson v. Cook, 19 Ill. 453; Newberry v. Lee, 3 Hill, 523; Oestrich v. Gilbert, 9 Hun, 245; Jenney v. Delesdernier, 20 Me. 191; Schoregge v. Bishop, 29 Minn. 367, 13 N. W. 194; Thornton v. Tuttle, 20 Abb. N. C. 308; Bonyng v. Waterbury, 12 Hun, 535; Hogate v. Edwards, 65 Ind. 372; Keady v. Owers, 30 Colo. 1, 69 Pac. 509.

An official court reporter has a right to presume that the attorneys have authority to order a transcript of the evidence.

Miller v. Palmer, supra.

The attorney has the right to bind his clients for any service which may be necessary and proper, not only for the preparation to appeal and they engage a printer to print the case and points, the client is liable for such printing. Tyrrel v. Hammerstein, 33 Misc. 505, 67 N. Y. Supp. 717.

And where an interested party has agreed to pay the expenses of litigation, except the attorney's fees, and the attorney orders a brief printed for use in the appellate court, the attorney is authorized to contract for the printing and such person is liable therefor, especially where his correspondence shows that he apparently considered that the attorney had such authority. Tyrrel v. Miliken, 135 Mo. App. 203, 115 S. W. 512.

And it was held in Trimmer v. Thomson, 41 S. C. 125, 19 S. E. 291, that, where an attorney contracts for printing briefs and arguments, the contract is his until he makes the contrary appear by proof.

Bookkeeper's or expert's fees.

It is held, too, that an attorney has authority to bind his client for services rendered in preparing a statement of accounts for use in a legal proceeding. Foland v. Dayton, 20 N. Y. Week. Dig. 59. The court here said that an attorney has authority, from the existence of the relation, to do all legal acts in the prosecution of the legal proceedings, or required to secure an intelligent and just disposition thereof.

And in Covell v. Hart, 14 Hun, 253, it was said that the services of a bookkeeper employed by an attorney to examine books, in order to enable him to prepare for trial, were such as he might cause to be performed for his client, since he might bind his client for any service necessary to the preparation of the case for trial. The suit was against the attorney, however, and it was held that he was not liable.

So, an attorney employed by the general manager of a foreign corporation to defend an expected case has authority to employ of the case for trial, but for the convenient conduct of such trial and the proceedings thereafter taken.

Miller v. Palmer and Harry v. Hilton, supra; Covell v. Hart, 14 Hun, 254; First Nat. Bank v. Tamajo, 77 N. Y. 476.

The official court reporter's right of action was not affected by any secret or confidential instructions given by the defendant to his attorney.

Miller v. Palmer, supra; Judson v. Gray, 11 N. Y. 408; Bonyng v. Waterbury, 12 Hun, 534; Sheridan v. Genet, 12 Hun, 660; Covell v. Hart, 14 Hun, 252; Harry v. Hilton, supra.

Mr. James D. Pilcher also for appellee.

Campbell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Emil Tobler and Frances Tobler were plaintiffs in an action which was tried in the district court of Saguache county. Its object was to obtain an injunction against an engineer and expert to examine the collapsed building, which caused the injury, although at the time no suit was actually pending. Brown v. Travellers' Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 21 App. Div. 42, 47 N. Y. Supp. 253. The court, after stating that the client would be liable in case a suit was pending at the time, said: "Does the fact that no action had been instituted at the time make this principle inapplicable? We think not. Where the case is that of the prosecution of a claim, it is clear that the authority of the attorney must precede the commencement of the action and begin at the time of his retainer. The rule should be the same where an attorney is retained to defend an expected suit. By the Code, evidence can be perpetuated for use in an anticipated litigation as well as in a pending suit. Often evidence, if not obtained at the time of the occurrence, cannot be subsequently procured. This was especially true of that which it was expected the plaintiff might be able to give. We do not say that Johnson, by virtue only of his general employment as legal adviser, might incur this liability for the defendant, but the admission is that he was the attorney of defendant in this particular matter, and he was called upon to act by the New York manager. Now, the particular matter was the expected actions against the Cornells, against which the defendant had agreed to indemnify the Cornells and the defense of which the defendant was entitled to control. It is therefore the same as if Johnson had been retained to defend a particular suit. His authority would be as great in one case as in the other, and sufficient to render his client liable for any reasonable expenditure."

The question of employment by the client in such case is for the jury. Ibid.

And a client is liable to an expert witness employed by his attorney to testify in threatened acts of defendants therein. The judgment went against plaintiffs, and the action was dismissed. John Nevitt was the official stenographer of that court and took notes of the proceedings at the trial. After the trial was finished and the case was submitted to, and taken under advisement by, the court, the plaintiff says that Ira J. Bloomfield, who was one of the attorneys retained by the Toblers in, and who helped try, the action, ordered Nevitt to write out in longhand a copy of the evidence, which he did. The defendants refusing to pay for the same, Nevitt brought this action against them, and recovered judgment, from which they appealed.

There is a direct conflict between Nevitt and Bloomfield; the former asserting, the latter denying, the employment. As the law applicable to the facts as testified to by plaintiff is not what the court gave to the jury, we assume, for our present purpose, that his version of the controversy is correct. The plaintiff does not claim that the evidence was used in the trial of the case for the convenience of counsel, or for the benefit of the trial judge in making findings, or that it was ordered for either purpose; but he says that there was no restriction made by him as to the use defendants were to make of it, though he was not employed to write it out until after the trial was over and the court had taken the case under advisement. Bloomfield was not the general attorney for the Toblers. He was retained by them for a special purpose, which was to conduct the trial in the district court to a final determination therein, and at its conclusion his fee was paid, and his connection with the case ceased. He was not retained or authorized to appeal the case or sue out a writ of error to the final judgment in case it went against his clients, unless the special retainer above mentioned, in law, gave him such authority. While the plaintiff says that no restriction or limit was placed upon the use a proceeding, in the absence of evidence that the witness knew of a limitation of the attorney's authority or agreed to look solely to the attorney for his compensation. Mulligan v. Cannon, 25 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 348, 41 N. Y. Supp. 279.

But, where the witness has notice that the attorney has no right to incur the expense, the client is not liable. Packard v. Stephani, 85 Hun, 197, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1016.

And where an attorney and client live in the same city, the attorney is not impliedly authorized to employ a patent expert at the expense of his client to assist in the preparation of the case. Knight v. Buser, 6 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 772. The court said: "In answer to this last proposition, I hold that, whatever might be the authority of an attorney in such matters under other circumstances, as, for instance, when a sudden emergency arose and his client could not be communicated with in time for him to receive instructions, no such authority existed here. Where an attorney and his client are living and doing business in the same city, and can confer with each other at any hour, the attorney cannot, by virtue of his employment as an attorney, exercise any such authority as that which is claimed here."

Employment of associate counsel—in general.

It is a general rule that an attorney has no implied authority to employ associate or additional counsel.

This was held to be the rule in the following cases: Continental Adjustment Co. v. Hoffman, 123 Ill. App. 69; Kneeland v. Hurdy, 97 N. Y. Supp. 957; Johnson v. Cunningham, 1 Ala. 249; Porter v. Elizalde, 125 Cal. 204, 57 Pac. 899; Bentley v. Fidelity & D. Co. 75 N. J. L. 828, 127 Am. St. Rep. 837, 69 Atl. 202; Lathrop v. Hallett, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

20 Colo. App. 207, 77 Pac. 1095; Chicago & S. Traction Co. v. Flaherty, 222 Ill. 67, 78 N. E. 29; Paddock v. Colby, 18 Vt. 485; Young v. Crawford, 23 Mo. App. 432; Taylor v. Alexander, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 12 C. S. 159; Auge v. Filiatrault, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 10 C. S. 157; Ex parte James, 8 N. B. 286.

In passing upon the power of attorneys to employ assistant counsel, the court in Briggs v. Georgia, 10 Vt. 68, said: "An attorney who has the management of a suit, and who is both the agent and attorney for the party, may employ assistant counsel at the charge of his client. The counsel employed may charge his fees to the attorney employing him, who may recover the same of the party, or they may be charged directly to the party. But when the attorney is only employed to attend to the suit, and the party is in the immediate vicinity, and directs as to the management of the suit, no general authority in the attorney to employ assistant counsel would be implied. If the attorney, who has the management of the suit, employ an assistant at the trial, and the client is present and sees the person, thus employed, assist in managing and conducting the suit, the inference would be strong, if not irresistible, that he consented to such employment, and he would be liable for the fees of the assisting counsel."

In Ex parte James, supra, the court said: "Situated as the profession is in this province, we are of opinion that the mere employment of a gentleman to act as an attorney in any cause or matter does not carry with it an authority to engage the services of counsel at the expense of the client. We do not mean to say that express authority would be necessary in every case, because it may occasionally happen that the interest of the client requires the employment of counsel where there is no opportu-

to be made of the transcript when prepared, he must have known, as the evidence conclusively shows, that it was not, and could not be, used by Bloomfield or his clients in the trial of the case, for that had theretofore terminated; and that it was not to be read by the judge preparatory to his findings, since plaintiff did not have it prepared until after the entry of judgment. At the time plaintiff says he was employed to transcribe the evidence, the cause had been, as we have seen, submitted to the trial court. In a letter written by him to Bloomfield several weeks later, and after entry of judgment against Bloomfield's clients, plaintiff referred to that judgment, and in that connection said, in substance, that he supposed an appeal would be taken, and his transcript, though not then, soon would be, completed. This shows that plaintiff himself supposed that the transcript was to be used, if at all, by plaintiffs in connection with a review in the supreme court, and not by the trial judge in reaching his conclusion. The case then is one where the action is against the client, and where an attorney retained specially to try a litigated issue in the district court, and without special authority from his client, employs the official stenographer in advance of judgment, and before it can be known what that judgment will be, to write out, from his notes, the evidence introduced at the trial for use on a review of the judgment in the supreme court.

The court specifically instructed the jury

nity of conferring with him or his agent, and, from the very nature of the employment and the communication between the resident attorneys and clients residing out of, or absent at the time from, the province, such authority may sometimes be implied; but in all cases where the client can be referred to, it should be done, and his consent obtained, where no express authority has been given; indeed we all know that generally the client expects to be consulted in the selection of counsel."

So, an attorney who has employed a substitute cannot recover for such substitute's services where his client has not, with knowledge of the facts, consented to the attorney's act. Meaney v. Rosenberg, 32 Misc. 96, 65 N. Y. Supp. 497. To the same effect is Voorhies v. Harrison, 22 La. Ann. 85.

And an attorney cannot recover of his client fees of counsel associated with him where he fails to prove his employment of such counsel at the client's request, or that with the client's sanction he has paid such fees. Cook v. Ritter, 4 E. D. Smith, 253.

Likewise, where associate counsel is employed under a personal contract with an attorney, the client of the latter is not liable for the services rendered. Gilliland v. Brantner (Iowa) 121 N. W. 1047.

And where an attorney employs associate counsel without authority, he does not have a lien for the joint services rendered, but only for his personal services. Gibson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 122 Iowa, 565, 98 N. W. 474. Neither has such associate counsel a lien. Lathrop v. Hallett, 20 Colo. App. 207, 77 Pac. 1095.

So, an attorney making a contract for a contingent fee, which provides that in the event of recovery the "necessary expenses" of the attorney are to be first paid, cannot deduct as necessary expenses fees for associate counsel employed by him. Whitlow v. Whitlow, 109 Ky. 573, 60 S. W. 182.

The attorney for a town has no implied authority to bind the town by the employment of assistant counsel although the agent of the town was not at the place of trial, where it does not appear that the attorney could not have seasonably consulted with such agent or that anything transpired rendering counsel necessary which was not known at the original consultation with the agent. Willard v. Danville, 45 Vt. 93.

And an attorney has no general power to employ associate counsel where his contract expressly reserved to the client the right to determine whether such counsel should be employed and the right to make the selection. Gilliland v. Brantner, supra.

Clearly, where the employing counsel has not himself been engaged, the assistant counsel retained by him cannot recover from the supposed client. Brown v. Underhill, 4 Ind. App. 77, 30 N. E. 430.

But it has been held that, although the relation of attorney and client does not imply authority to the attorney to employ other counsel at the client's expense, yet the attorney may employ an assistant to aid him in his work, and charge the client with the reasonable value of the entire labor. Vilas v. Bundy, 106 Wis. 168, 81 N. W. 812.

And it was held in Kingsbury v. Joseph, 94 Mo. App. 298, 68 S. W. 93, that, while an attorney cannot employ a new counsel without the authority of his client, yet he may engage assistance at his own expense, and this will not prejudice his right to recover the reasonable value of such services rendered under his own employment.

So, where the attorney for a company is also the agent and manager of the company's property, he has authority to employ an attorney to take and prosecute an appeal from an order appointing a receiver. Fowler v. Iowa Land Co. 18 S. D. 131, 99 N. W. 1095.

And in Armour v. Kilmer, 28 Ont. Rep. 618, it was held that solicitors who employ counsel have implied authority to pledge the client's credit for the payment of counsel fees, and that a legal privity exists between client and counsel though a solicitor intervenes in the usual way. The court said that this should be the rule because of the general authority which the retainer from the client to the solicitor imports to do all that needs to be done for the proper and effective conduct of the litigation.

that if Bloomfield was attorney for defendants in the case in the district court, and ordered plaintiff to write out the evidence produced in the trial of that case, or to make a transcript thereof, even though they should find that Bloomfield had no special authority from his clients to give the order, plaintiff was entitled to recover, unless he then knew of the termination of the relation of attorney and client. In this we think the court was wrong as applied to the facts of this case. At common law the general rule is that the authority of an attorney to represent his client in an action ceases upon its final determination and the entry of judgment. Especially was this true as to the defendants' attorney, or, more accurately speaking, the attorney for the defeated party. The attorney for the prevailing party was empowered, under his employment as attorney, to enforce collection of that judgment by suing out a writ of execution. A distinction is also made by some of the authorities between the power of an attorney who is retained to try a litigated issue and one employed to collect a debt. In the former case his authority is usually regarded as ending with the trial of the case. In the latter he may, it seems, appeal from the judgment, if it is against his client, or sue out a writ of error to reverse it, without a new retainer. If Bloomfield had ordered plaintiff to write out a transcript of the evidence for use in the trial of the case in the district court, or for the benefit of the judge as an aid to him in making findings, de-

Employment of resident counsel.

An attorney retained to conduct a case pending in another county may employ local counsel to attend to necessary formal matters, and the charges paid therefor are a proper item in the employing attorney's account. Dillon v. Watson, 3 Neb. (Unof.) 530, 92 N. W. 156. The court said: "It is no doubt true that a client is not liable for fees of other counsel employed by those whom he has retained to conduct his case, to assist therein, unless he authorizes or ratifies such employment. Sedgwick v. Bliss, 23 Neb. 617, 37 N. W. 483. But where a case is pending in another county, it frequently happens that orders have to be obtained, leave of court taken in matters of course, and calls of docket attended, which do not require personal attention of counsel familiar with the cause, but may be left to one person as well as to another. Expense is necessarily involved whether counsel retained by the party go in person or whether local counsel are employed to act for them. If the latter course is taken and the fees paid are less, or at least not more, than the expense necessarily involved in going in person, we see no reason why the sums thus expended are not as properly chargeable to the client as the traveling and other expenses would have been. It is in evidence that the fees paid in this case were less than the expense of attending the courts in person, and we think the items should be allowed."

It does not appear in People ex rel. Simon v. Pack, 115 Mich. 669, 74 N. W. 185, that the employing attorney had express authority, and resident counsel retained by the defendant's attorneys was held entitled to a lien for his services where he had actively assisted in the preparation and trial of the case.

Where fixed fee agreed upon.

An attorney who has agreed to conduct a suit for a certain sum is not entitled to recover extra compensation for an associate retained by him without the client's authority, where it appears that the only service rendered by the associate was sitting in court during the trial. Re Borkstrom, 63 App. Div. 7, 71 N. Y. Supp. 451, affirmed in 168 N. Y. 639, 61 N. E. 1127.

So, where counsel makes a written contract to transact certain business for a given per cent of the sum realized, he cannot charge his client with the fee of other attorneys whom he employs to perform the work. Hughes v. Zeigler, 69 Ill. 38.

And there is dicta in Re Hynes, 105 N. Y. 560, 12 N. E. 60, to the effect that a counsel retained for a fixed fee cannot bind his client for the expense of associate counsel.

Where attorney employed forms partnership.

Ordinarily where one member of a partnership is employed, the firm is employed, and the employer is entitled to the services of all the members of the firm. Williams v. More, 63 Cal. 50.

And an understanding between partners that each shall act as an individual, and charge and receive compensation therefor as individuals, cannot affect the client in the absence of knowledge of such agreement. Ibid.

And where an attorney after being retained enters into a partnership, the partner of such attorney is entitled to compensation only under the original contract. King v. Barber, 61 Iowa, 674, 17 N. W. 88.

And after the dissolution of a partnership, the client is not liable to the original attorney's partner in the absence of a new contract, unless he has knowledge that such partner was not rendering his services under the original contract, but expected to receive individual compensation. Ibid.

So, it is said that a person employing a lawyer who afterwards takes a partner who assists him in the case does not become liable to the firm for the fee contracted by simply talking or consulting with such partner about the case. Carr v. Wilkins, 44 Tex. 424.

To have the effect above referred to, the recognition must be such as to incorporate the incoming partner into the contract of employment as a party to it, by express terms or by unmistakable implication. Ibid.

defendants would have been bound thereby. It does not follow, however, that Bloomfield, merely by virtue of his retainer to try the litigated issue in the district court, had authority to appeal, or bind his client by a direction of the stenographer to transcribe the evidence for use in the reviewing court. The testimony is uncontradicted that Bloomfield was employed by defendants as one of several attorneys to try the litigated issues in, and his employment ceased when the case was submitted to, the district court. He was not specifically authorized by defendants to take any steps looking to a review or reversal of such judgment as the court might thereafter pronounce against his clients. The plaintiff is a lawyer, as well as official stenographer of the court, and is presumed to know what authority an attorney possesses by virtue of his retainer to try a litigated issue.

A review of some of the leading authorities will show the extent and duration of the authority of an attorney. Plaintiff says that an attorney has implied power, without special authority, to bind his client by an order to an official stenographer to transcribe evidence to be used in the trial of his client's cause. Miller v. Palmer, 25 Ind. App. 357, 81 Am. St. Rep. 107, 58 N. E. 213, so holds. The decision was right in that case, for the evidence was ordered to be, and in fact was, used in the progress of trial of the cause in the trial court. Harry v. Hilton, 64 How. Pr. 199, is to the same effect. There also the evidence was tran-

And where there is no evidence of an agreement with the client of one who, during the relation of attorney and client, forms a partnership, to substitute the firm as counsel, the attorney retained may recover for the services rendered without joining his partner. Davis v. Peck, 54 Barb. 425.

Ratification of employment.

The client, however, may ratify the unauthorized employment of associate counsel, and thereby render himself liable.

Thus, an attorney employed by counsel to assist in the case is entitled to recover from the client where such client is informed of the employment, expresses his satisfaction therewith, verifies pleadings drawn by the attorney, and accepts the results of the suit without protest. Dorr v. Dudley, 135 Iowa, 20, 112 N. W. 203.

And the performance of the services by a substitute is sufficient to warrant a recovery by the original attorney where the client knows of the substitution and accepts the services without objection. Smith v. Lipscomb, 13 Tex. 532.

So, recovery may be had for the service rendered by an attorney although he employed associate counsel to argue the client's cause, where the client was present and made no objection thereto. Eggleston v. Boardman, 37 Mich. 14.

And an implied consent which will render the client liable to his attorney for services of associate counsel is shown by evidence that the client knew that his attorney agreed to change off services with the one employed as associate, and that he acquiesced in it, was present at the trial, and consulted with the associate with reference to the case. Calhoun v. Akeley, 82 Minn. 354, 85 N. W. 170.

So, where nonresident attorneys without authority from their client employ resident attorneys to file pleadings and look after the answering of interrogatories, and such attorneys, after attending to these matters, without being requested, assist at the trial with the client's knowledge, they are 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

entitled to recover for the services rendered, since the client's conduct in allowing them to serve him at the trial amounts to an implied ratification of the employment. Hogate v. Edwards, 65 Ind. 372. To the same effect is Moore v. Orr, 10 Ind. App. 89, 37 N. E. 554.

Where a client accepts the benefit of a lawyer employed by his attorney on account of the latter's illness, a privity of contract is created which will entitle the lawyer to recover according to contract made with the original attorney. Reese v. Resburgh, 54 App. Div. 378, 66 N. Y. Supp. 633.

So, evidence that soon after associate counsel were employed the attorney engaging them informed his client of the fact, and that the client did not dissent therefrom, is proper for submission to the jury, to enable them to determine whether or not the client actually assented to the employment. King v. Pope, 28 Ala. 601.

But the fact that a client is present at the trial and sees another attorney assisting his counsel does not of itself render the client liable for such attorney's compensation. Young v. Crawford, 23 Mo. App. 432. The court said: "While the employment of an attorney is one that presupposes personal trust and confidence by the employer in the employee, there is nothing in the nature of the employment precluding one attorney from retaining another to aid him in the prosecution or defense of a suit, under a promise, express or implied, that the attorney thus employed shall look to the attorney employing him for compensation."

And where the client does not know that associate counsel have rendered service in the case until after the service has been performed, he is not liable therefor on the ground of acquiescence or ratification. Gilliland v. Brantner (Iowa) 121 N. W. 1047.

So, ratification of the acts of an attorney employed by counsel without authority from his client is not shown by the acceptance of an award recovered, where there are no accompanying circumstances which put the client upon inquiry as to how the award was obtained. Bassford v. Swift, 17 Misc. 149, 39 N. Y. Supp. 337.

The question as to whether an attorney scribed for use at the trial. In Moulton v. Bowker, 115 Mass. 36, 15 Am. Rep. 72, Gray, chief justice, thus expressed the rule, which has often been quoted with judicial approval: "An attorney at law has authority, by virtue of his employment as such, to do in behalf of his client all acts, in or out of court, necessary or incidental to the prosecution and management of the suit, and which affect the remedy only, and not the cause of action." The principle was applied to the case then before the court, and it was held that an attorney had power to release an attachment, at least before judgment. In Clark v. Randall, 9 Wis. 135, 76 Am. Dec. 252, it was held that an attorney for a foreign client or one residing at a distance, who was intrusted with the collection of a debt, had an implied authority to indemnify the officer in making a levy. In Jenney v. Delesdernier, 20 Me. 183, it was said that the attorney for plaintiff, without any special authority, may approve of the receipt taken by the sheriff for personal property attached by him, and thereby relieve the officer of his obligation to retain and produce the property. This upon the principle that the attorney has the power to elect and control the remedy, and all proceedings arising out of and connected with it. Thornton v. Tuttle, 20 Abb. N. C. 308, ruled that the attorney could bind his client by the employment of a stenographer to take and write out the testimony of witnesses upon a reference of a special issue. In Brown v. Arnold, 67 C. C. A. 125, 131 Fed. 723, it was held that the retain-was employed by a railroad is for the jury where a division attorney's employment covered litigation in an adjoining state in which such attorney had not been admitted, and it had previously always employed special counsel with the ratification of the general counsel. Northern P. R. Co. v. Clarke, 45 C. C. A. 635, 106 Fed. 794.

Effect of special contract.

The fact that a client is present and sees an assistant counsel aiding at the trial does not estop him to deny his liability to his attorney for such services, where he has a contract with his attorney by which the latter undertakes to handle the cause for an agreed percentage. Whitlow v. Whitlow, 109 Ky. 573, 60 S. W. 182.

To the same effect are: Porter v. Elizalde, 125 Cal. 204, 57 Pac. 899; Lathrop v. Hallett, 20 Colo. App. 207, 77 Pac. 1095; Price v. Hay, 29 Ill. App. 552, affirmed in 132 Ill. 543, 24 N. E. 620; McCarthy v. Crump, 17 Colo. App. 110, 67 Pac. 343.

And a statement by assistant counsel that the client whom he purported to represent would pay all of the attorney's fees in the case will not estop the client to dispute her liability to the assistant counsel, where such counsel was employed without her authority by attorneys with whom she had made a contract to conduct the case for a certain percentage. Porter v. Elizalde, supra.

And the fact that the client knows that other counsel than those employed by him are assisting in the case will not render him liable to such counsel, where the contract with his attorney provides that the client shall have the right to determine whether associate counsel are to be employed and who such counsel shall be. Gilliland v. Brantner, supra.

But counsel called in to argue a case by an indisposed attorney who had agreed with his client to handle the litigation for a stipulated fee is entitled to recover for his services where the client had knowledge of the employment, and the substituted counsel did not know of the special agreement. Allen v. Parish, 65 Kan. 496, 70 Pac. 351, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

So, a lawyer employed by defendants' attorney is entitled to recover from the defendants where they accepted his service, notwithstanding a special contract with their attorney that he was to pay for assistant counsel out of his fee, it appearing that the lawyer employed had no knowledge of this agreement. McCrary v. Ruddick, 33 Iowa, 521.

So, a client is liable to resident counsel employed by her nonresident attorney, where, she called upon them several times and they assisted in the trial of the case, notwithstanding an agreement with her attorney to prosecute the action to final judgment for a stipulated sum, of which the resident counsel were not informed. Sedgwick v. Bliss, 23 Neb. 617, 37 N. W. 483.

Where, however, the attorney employed knows of the special agreement, he cannot recover from the client. Hudspeth v. Yetzer, 78 Iowa, 13, 42 N. W. 529.

And it has been held that a client is liable to a senior counsel, called in by his attorney, where such counsel conducts the trial in the client's presence and consults with him without objection, notwithstanding a secret agreement between the original attorney and the client, that if senior counsel became necessary, it should be paid for by the attorney. Brigham v. Foster, 7 Allen, 419. The court said: "This was a secret arrangement, unknown to the plaintiff, and one which, in the ordinary course of professional services, he had no reason to suppose might exist. It may operate as a valid contract between the parties to it; but as respects the plaintiff, it cannot under the circumstances avail the defendant. These circumstances are the facts above stated, that the services of the plaintiff were performed in the presence and with the co-operation of the defendant, he adopting him as his counsel and consulting with him as such. We think it was the defendant's duty, before thus knowingly receiving the plaintiff's services and accepting him as counsel to manage his case, to inform him of the special agreement with Mr. Porter, and that the defender of an attorney to conduct an action confers upon him authority to stipulate with opposing counsel, after the rendition of judgment in favor of his client and after the expiration of the term of court, but within the time for procuring of a writ of error, that the case shall abide the final decision of another action which involves the same question and is conducted by the same attorneys. In that case the court said that the stipulation was manifestly for the benefit of the clients and was acted upon by the opposing party. The court said the case came within the exceptions to the general rule, and that, by virtue of his general retainer, an attorney for the prevailing party has the power to collect or enforce the judgment, to admit service of a citation issued upon a writ of error or appeal to review it, and authority to oppose any steps that may be taken within a reasonable time by the defeated parties to reverse it. The court held that the action of the attorney in this case tended to an enforcement of the judgment which he had secured for his clients.

It will be observed that in all of these cases, relied upon by plaintiff as deciding that an attorney has implied authority to bind his client, such acts related to the proceedings in the trial court and which tended to enforce the judgment therein rendered. In none of them is it held that an attorney, merely by virtue of his retainer to try a litigated issue, has power to take an appeal or sue out a writ of error to reverse a judgment, and to bind his clients to pay for transcribing the evidence to be used upon such review. Two cases from Massachusetts, and possibly others may be found, are said to go to the full length claimed by plaintiff. In Grosvenor v. Danforth, 16 Mass. 74, it was held that an attorney of record in an action in which an erroneous judgment has been rendered against his client may sue out a writ of error for its reversal without special authority. This, apparently, was based upon a previous decision of the same court in the case of Dearborn v. Dearborn, 15 Mass. 316. In that case the attorney was employed to undertake the collection of a debt. After obtaining his judgment he sued out process against the bail. It was claimed that that was a new suit, and that he had no authority to bring it without a fresh direction from his client. It was held, however, that the scire facias against the bail is not to be considered a new suit. There are decisions to the contrary. The court, however, said further that, when an attorney undertakes to collect a debt, he is bound to sue out all process necessary to that object, and that the prosecuting of a scire facias is but a regular step in collection of the original demand. The Dearborn Case seems not to go to the length reached by the decision in Grosvenor v. Danforth. Dearborn v. Dearborn we think is clearly distinguished from ant was to be at no expense for the fees of the senior counsel. Not having done so, but remaining silent on the subject when he should have spoken; and when the plaintiff might have withdrawn from the case, the defendant, after choosing to avail himself of the professional services of the plaintiff, cannot now avoid a personal liability for the payment of a reasonable compensation therefor." To the same effect is Emblem v. Bicksler, 34 Colo. 496, 83 Pac. 636.

Miscellaneous.

The authority to sue out a commission to take a deposition of a nonresident witness is included in the powers of an attorney employed to defend a suit. Fairchild v. Michigan C. R. Co. 8 Ill. App. 591. The court said: "This testimony is not contradicted; but it is urged that the attorney, in making such agreement, transcended the limits of his authority and did not bind his client. That he was the attorney for the defendant in the suit in which the deposition was taken is proved, and is not disputed; and it will be presumed that he was vested with the authority ordinarily appertaining to that relation. He was clearly authorized to take all such steps as were necessary to a proper defense of the suit; among which may fairly be included the suing out of a commission to take the deposition of a nonresident 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

witness, as well as procuring the services of a suitable person to execute such commission. This seems to be conceded, as the defendant does not contest the propriety of its attorney's acts in suing out the commission or in employing the plaintiff to take the deposition."

So, attorneys have power to bind their clients by a stipulation for a different rate of compensation to referees than that fixed by the Code. Mark v. Buffalo, 87 N. Y. 184.

And where a nonresident corporation directed its attorney to bring suit and recover property claimed, authority is implied to bind the client to pay the expenses of removing the property from the premises of the defendant. Fox v. William Deering & Co. 7 S. D. 443, 64 N. W. 520.

But an attorney has no authority under a general employment to instruct a sheriff to conduct the business in a restaurant which has been levied upon, and the client is not liable to the sheriff for the expenses incurred. Alexander v. Denaveaux, 53 Cal. 663.

And where an attorney employed to contest a claim turns the matter over to another attorney, who incurs costs for sheriff's fees, the client is not liable therefor, since no power of delegation exists. Antrobus v. Sherman, 65 Iowa, 230, 54 Am. Rep. 7, 21 N. W. 579.

the one at bar by the supreme court of Iowa in Hopkins v. Mallard, 1 G. Greene, 117. The court, speaking by Greene, justice, said there was nothing in the Dearborn Case conflicting with the decision announced in the case then under consideration, for it was said that the attorney there was employed and undertook to collect a debt, and that it was justly held therein that he was bound to sue out all process necessary to that object; whereas, in the case in hand the retainer to try a cause in a trial court did not authorize the attorney to prosecute an appeal. In Weeks on Attorneys at Law, 2d ed. 248, the rule is stated to be that an attorney once appointed continues in that character until judgment or other termination of the suit, and that, "where a scire facias is necessary to revive a judgment a fresh authority is necessary," and, also, it is necessary to justify bringing a writ of error. At § 249a, the author says that "the employment of an attorney to defend an action pending in a trial court does not, under ordinary circumstances, authorize him to take an appeal to a higher court from the judgment rendered against his client." To this is cited Hooker v. Brandon, 75 Wis. 8, 43 N. W. 741, where the court, speaking by Taylor, justice, announced the rule and gives clearly the reasons for it. Connett v. Chicago, 114 Ill. 233, 29 N. E. 280, held that a city attorney, whose duty it is to look after and protect the interests of the city in all legal controversies, has the power on behalf of the city to pray for an appeal from a judgment against the city and prepare the necessary steps for taking the same, but the court recognized the general rule that the retainer of an attorney by a private party to prosecute or defend in a trial court does not authorize him to prosecute an appeal or writ of error in the same case, adding that a city attorney occupies a different position; the general scope of his powers and duties being much larger than that of an attorney for a private litigant especially retained for a single case. In 2 Clark & Skyles on the Law of Agency, § 650, the authors say that the general rule is that an attorney cannot begin proceedings for an appeal from a judgment against his client without further authority from the latter. In Delaney v. Husband, 64 N. J. L. 275, 45 Atl. 265, it was held that the retainer in the original suit did not, of itself, constitute a retainer to bring a writ of error. To the same effect is Richardson v. Talbot, 2 Bibb, 382. Ring v. Charles Vogel Paint & Glass Co. 46 Mo. App. 374, is not authority for plaintiff's contention. The court there held that, under conflicting evidence, the legal presumption that an attorney appearing in a case has proper authority of his client was not overcome by the proofs.

Our conclusion therefore is that an attorney at law, employed only to try a litigated issue in a nisi prius court, has not thereby the implied authority to appeal from, or sue out a writ of error to, a judgment rendered against his client, or to bind the client to the payment of stenographer's fees for services rendered at the instance of the attorney in transcribing the evidence to be used in prosecuting a review in the supreme court. There is no evidence in this case of ratification of, or acquiescence in, such employment of plaintiff by defendants in this action. The cause having been tried by plaintiff's counsel upon the theory, which the trial court adopted by so instructing the jury, that the special retainer of Bloomfield to try the case in the district court necessarily carried with it the implied power, without any special authority from his clients, to perfect an appeal and represent his clients therein and to bind them to pay all the costs and expenses necessarily incurred in the prosecution of such review, its judgment cannot stand. It therefore is reversed, and the cause remanded.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

INDIANAPOLIS TRACTION & TERMINAL COMPANY, Appt.,

v.
THOMAS J. KINNEY, by Next Friend.

(171 Ind. 612, 85 N. E. 954.)

Master — railroad — increased liability — validity.

1. Applying to proprietors of railroads a rule of liability with respect to injuries of employees different from that applied to other classes of employers does not deprive them of the equal protection of the laws.

Same — character of employment — street railroad.

2. A member of a repair and construction gang on a street railway is not, while engaged in unloading rails from a standing car, exposed to any of the peculiar hazards of using and operating a railroad, so as to come within the protection of a statute by

Note. — Upon the general question, What is a railroad hazard within the statutes abolishing or restricting the fellow-servant rule as to railroad employees, see case notes to Johnson v. Great Northern R. Co. 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 477, and Hanson v. Northern P. R. Co. 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 968.

and refers to the character of the employment, and not to the employer. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lighthouse, supra; Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough (1907) 168 Ind. 671, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 418, 80 N. E. 529; Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 222, 8 L.R.A. 419, 45 N. W. 156; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Haley, 25 Kan. 35; Potter v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1877) 46 Iowa, 399. The peculiar and superlative dangers to which employees are necessarily exposed in the running of trains form the basis of such classification, and it is not therefore material whether the employer in railroad service is a corporation, partnership, or an individual. The liability is the same in one case as in the other. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lighthouse, 168 Ind. 438, 464, 78 N. E. 1033. To separate railroading from all other kinds of business is not an unconstitutional discrimination, because no other business is beset with so many and severe dangers as those encountered by employees in preparing for, and during, the movement and operation of railroad trains. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Houlihan, 157 Ind. 494, 54 L.R.A. 787, 60 N. E. 943. Such classification cannot be arbitrarily made. There must exist some good and natural reason for it. We said in Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough, 168 Ind. 671, 674, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 418, 80 N. E. 529, touching this subject: "Such legislation must not only operate equally upon all within the class but the classification must furnish a reason for, and justify the making of, the class; that is, the reason for the classification must inhere in the subject-matter, and rest upon some reason which is natural and substantial." See a large line of authorities collated on pages 674 and 675 of 168 Ind. Laws are general and uniform, not because they operate on all alike, for they do not, but because everyone who is brought within the circumstances and conditions provided by the law is affected thereby. Notwithstanding the language of the statute is "that every railroad, or other corporation except municipal, operating in this state, shall be liable for damages for personal injury suffered by any employee while in its service," [Burns's Anno. Stat. 1908, § 8017] etc., it must not be for a moment understood that the benefits of the statute are extended to all employees of a railroad corporation, or to any other class of employees than those whose duties expose them to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads. There is no reason, in fact or fancy, why the benefits of the statute should be extended to the office and shop employees of railroad corporations, or to others removed from the dangers of train service, and denied to the multitude of other workmen engaged in businesses of like and equal hazard.

So far as our researches have gone, no court has attempted to set up an arbitrary line of demarcation by which the application of the statute may be determined. It is apparent that no reliable test can be established by any general rule. Each case must be decided upon its own facts, the court bearing in mind that, to keep within constitutional limitations, the statute must be construed as designed exclusively for the benefit of those who are, in the course of their employment, exposed to the particular dangers incident to the use and operation of railroad engines and trains, and whose injuries are caused thereby. Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough, 168 Ind. 671, 678, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 418, 80 N. E. 529. By this, we do not mean that it is essential to the bringing of an employee within the statute that he should be connected in some way with the movement of trains, but it seems sufficient if the performance of his duties brings him into a situation where he is, without fault, exposed to the dangers and perils flowing from such operation and movement, and he is, by reason thereof, injured by the negligence of a fellow servant described in the act. Frandsen v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 372; Williams v. Iowa C. R. Co. (1903) 121 Iowa, 270, 96 N. W. 774, and cases cited. To illustrate more fully by the Frandsen Case, supra: The plaintiff was a section hand, and belonged to a gang of five. He, with the boss and three others, started east on the hand car with their tools. The passenger train going west was then due, but the boss directed the men to proceed east. The train coming in sight around a curve 250 feet distant, the boss directed an immediate stop and removal of the car from the track. An effort was made to do so, but, on seeing that they were about to get caught by the onrushing train, and when the hand car was but partly off the track, the boss commanded the gang to flee, but the engine, striking the hand car with great force, threw it in the direction the plaintiff was fleeing, and it struck and injured him. Held that the plaintiff's employment related to the perilous business of railroading, and entitled him to the benefits of the statute. Do the facts pleaded show the plaintiff within the protection of the statute? He was employed as a common laborer, to do service with a repair and construction gang of a street car company. When injured, he was engaged in unloading rails from a flat car standing on a siding of the street car tracks. His gang was not engaged in hauling iron on the car. He was not working with a train, not even with the particular car, beyond helping to discharge its load. He was in no sense a train man. He was not injured by a moving car, nor because the car was designed to move in short trains and on fixed rails. His duties had no connection with the car, nor with the use and operation of the railroad, except to relieve the car of its load. The injuring skid did not slip off and fall upon the plaintiff because it had rested on a car. If negligently placed, it might have slipped from a standing wagon with precisely the same result. We are unable to see how the duties of the plaintiff exposed him to any of the peculiar hazards of using or operating a railroad, within the protection of the statute.

Iowa, in 1862, enacted a statute in substance the same as ours; and, to meet constitutional demands, it was construed by the Iowa supreme court, in a number of cases, to relate only to such employees of a railroad as were exposed, in a performance of their duties, to the dangers and hazards arising from the use and operation of railroads. Deppe v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1872) 36 Iowa, 52. In 1873 the statute was amended by inserting in it the following words: "When such injuries are, in any manner, connected with the use and operation of any railroad, on or about which they shall be employed,"—thus writing into the statute what the courts had previously read into it by construction. Schroeder v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1875) 41 Iowa, 344. Kansas copied the Iowa statute of 1862, and Minnesota and Indiana have adopted it in substance. With respect to the adjudications in Iowa, it is said in Foley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 644, 649, 21 N. W. 124, 127: "With the exception of Deppe's Case, all the actions in which this court has determined that railroad companies are liable in this class of cases are those where the injury was received by the movement of cars or engines upon the track,"—citing seven other Iowa cases to establish the statement. Among the many instances in which the benefits of the statute have been denied are the following: The plaintiff's duties were to wipe engines, open and close doors of the engine house, remove snow from the turntable and connecting tracks. He was not, by reason of such duties, employed in the operation of the railroad. Malone v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 417, 54 Am. Rep. 11, 21 N. W. 756. The plaintiff was employed in a coal house of the railroad, and was injured by the negligence of a fellow servant while loading coal upon a car. He was denied the benefit of the statute because his injuries were connected in no way with the operation of the railroad. Luce v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 75, 24 N. W. 600. One Matson was a member of a construction gang, and his duties required him at times to ride upon the train, and to work on and about the cars and track. He was injured by the negligence of a coemployee striking his hand with a heavy stone while engaged in placing stones under the ends of the ties. It was held that the injury was not connected with the operation of the railroad. Matson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 22, 25 N. W. 911. Many other valuable illustrations may be found in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Artery, 137 U. S. 507, 34 L. ed. 747, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 129. In Minnesota the plaintiff was a bridge carpenter, engaged in repairing a bridge on the defendant railroad, and in doing the work it was necessary to leave the draw partly open. Through the negligence of a coemployee, the draw was left unfastened, was blown shut by the wind, and injured the plaintiff. Held, the company was not liable, because the employment did not embrace the peculiar hazard incident to the operation of a railroad, within the meaning of the statute. Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (1890) 43 Minn. 222, 8 L.R.A. 419, 45 N. W. 156. The plaintiff was a section man, and while his crew was engaged in loading rails from the ground on a flat car, one of the crew negligently let a rail fall upon the plaintiff's arm and injured it. Held that the injury was not the result of any danger peculiar to, or directly connected with, the use and operation of the railroad, and not within the statute. Pearson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1891) 47 Minn. 9, 49 N. W. 302. From these considerations we are led to conclude that the employment in which the plaintiff was engaged at the time of his injury does not belong to that distinctive and peculiarly hazardous class of service, necessary to the moving and operation of railroad trains, for which special statutory protection finds constitutional sanction.

The conclusion just announced renders it unnecessary to consider whether the statute under consideration applies to street railroads. But see majority opinion of Justices Gillett, Monks, and Hadley in Kinsey v. Union Traction Co. 169 Ind. 601, 81 N. E. 922; Funk v. St. Paul City R. Co. 61 Minn. 435, 29 L.R.A. 208, 52 Am. St. Rep. 608, 63 N. W. 1099; Riley v. Galveston City R. Co. 13 Tex. Civ. App. 247, 35 S. W. 826; Sams v. St. Louis & M. River R. Co. 174 Mo. 53, 61 L.R.A. 475, 73 S. W. 686; Lincoln Street R. Co. v. McClellan, 54 Neb. 672, 69 Am. St. Rep. 736, 74 N. W. 1074; Railroad Comrs. v. Market Street R. Co. 132 Cal. 677, 64 Pac. 1065; Front Street Cable R. Co. v. Johnson (1891) 2 Wash.

But it is urged that the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action at common law. We do not think so. It is alleged that the incident occurred "wholly and entirely" from the negligence of John Wilson, the foreman in charge of the work gang to which the plaintiff belonged, in the placing of the skids, and in not furnishing sufficient men to handle and carry the rails. With respect to the failure to furnish an adequate number of men to handle the rails, it is enough to say there was no charge in the complaint that any particular number of men were promised or necessary in handling the rails. It is a familiar rule, pertaining to the relation of master and servant, that the master shall observe reasonable care, in the selection of his servants, to choose none but efficient and careful workmen; and this done, all those engaged in the same general employment are fellow servants, and must look out for each other's carelessness, and can have no recourse to the master for an injury that may happen from the negligent act of a fellow workman. It is a further duty of the master to furnish his employees not only a safe working place, but proper and safe tools and instrumentalities to work with; and their correlative duty is to use those tools and instrumentalities in a proper and safe manner. Bedford Quarries Co. v. Bough, 168 Ind. 671, 680, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 418, 80 N. E. 529; Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Barker, 169 Ind. 670, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 542, 83 N. E. 369, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 375; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Harrell, 161 Ind. 689, 699, 63 L.R.A. 460, 68 N. E. 262; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Martin, 160 Ind. 280, 66 N. E. 886; Central R. Co. v. Keegan, 160 U. S. 259, 40 L. ed. 418, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269; Kraus v. Lehman, 170 Ind. 408, 83 N. E. 714, 84 N. E. 769. In this instance it was the duty of the company to furnish proper and safe skids for unloading the rails, and the corresponding duty of those employed to unload them to so carefully use and place the skids as to avoid injuring one another. Chicago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Barker, 169 Ind. 670, 678, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 542, 83 N. E. 369, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 375; Hodges v. Standard Wheel Co. 152 Ind. 680, 52 N. E. 391, 54 N. E. 383. It may be said that the following principles are as old as the common law itself: First, the master is not liable for injuries received by an employee through the negligence of a coemployee engaged in the same common service; second, the boss of a gang of four or five section men or track repairers is, when not charged with duties of the master, the fellow servant of those working under him, and this is true even though it be shown that the boss had been expressly authorized by the master to give orders and directions to those working with him, with respect to the performance of all their duties, not involving duties of the master. Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Kane, 169 Ind. 25, 30, 80 N. E. 841, 81 N. E. 721; Dill v. Marmon, 164 Ind. 507, 515, 69 L.R.A. 163, 73 N. E. 67; Southern Indiana R. Co. v. Martin, 160 Ind. 280, 288, 66 N. E. 886; Hodges v. Standard Wheel Co. 152 Ind. 680, 52 N. E. 391, 54 N. E. 383; Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson, 162 U. S. 346, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843. It is charged in the complaint that the accident was caused "wholly and entirely" by the negligence of the gang boss, John Wilson. This alone was sufficient to carry the case beyond the limits of the common law. There are other questions presented, arising under the motion for a new trial, which will probably not arise again, and which we do not consider.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to grant appellant a new trial.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

HAMILTON SCOTT et al.

v.

NANCY R. SCOTT, Appt.

(137 Iowa, 239, 114 N. W. 881.)

Evidence to explain will.

1. In the absence of ambiguity in a will, parol evidence of declarations of testator as to his intention is not admissible.

Life tenant — bond.

2. A life tenant of money or its equivalent, which is to go into his possession, but not to be diminished by him, may be required to give security for the benefit of the re-

Case Note. — Right to require legatee of life interest in money or its equivalent, to give security for benefit of remainderman.

In general it may be said that where the legacy consists of money or its equivalent, the holder of the life interest may be required to give security to the remainderman for the forthcoming of the principal of the fund upon the termination of the life estate. The reason for this rule is to be found in the fact that money and securities are of such a nature that they may be more easily lost or wasted than other personal property. The rule followed in SCOTT v. SCOTT is one of general application among the reported maindeman, although the will made him executor without bond, where his intention is to spend much time out of the state, he is hostile in feeling to the remainderman, and, in making investments, has not exhibited the care and prudence ordinarily essential for the preservation and conservation of the property.

In Whittemore v. Russell, supra, the court said: "Where the use of money is given, the gift is of the interest only; and as such property may be easily lost or wasted, the general rule is that the legatee must give some reasonable security to safely preserve the funds for the remainderman, or the money may go into the hands of a trustee, of whom a bond would be required."

And note the language of the opinion in Kinnard v. Kinnard, supra: "But, so far as the legacy consists of money, or is to be converted into money, before paid over, it has been the invariable practice to require security of the first legatee, notwithstanding he may be perfectly responsible, and no cause shown to induce a belief that there is danger of his wasting it, and that his estate may not be sufficient to replace it. . . . But it has been contended that this case does not come within the rule, because the testator did not so intend it. It is said that he designed his widow should have the right of using the principal, as well as the interest, of the legacy, if she should find it necessary or convenient for her support and maintenance; and to show that he so intended it, that clause of the will by which he 'directs that his personal property that may be left at the decease of his wife shall be sold,' etc., is relied on; but this direction cannot well be applied to any part of the personal estate except the specific goods bequeathed, and would, therefore, more reasonably seem to mean, when taken in connection with the residue of the will, those things only which should not be worn out or consumed by use." 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mr. Tom H. Milner for appellant.

Messrs. Popham & Havner, for appellees:

Where a life estate is created in personal property, a court of chancery may require the legatee to give security that the funds shall not be wasted or misapplied.

Security Co. v. Hardenburgh, 53 Conn. 169, 2 Atl. 391; Burnett v. Lester, 53 Ill. 325; Swan v. Ligan, 1 M'Cord, Eq. 227; 2 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, 2d

A life legatee was required to give a bond for the benefit of remaindermen in Re Lowery, 19 Misc. 83, 43 N. Y. Supp. 972, although it was said there could be no doubt but that the testator intended to vest the possession, management, and control of the principal unreservedly in the holder of the life estate. No danger to the fund or other special reason appeared for requiring security in this case.

A life tenant of money and securities was required to secure remainder interests, in Maguire v. Maguire, 110 La. 279, 34 So. 443, although named as executrix "without bonds."

Even where a will directed that certain legacies be paid to life tenants "on their own responsibility," thus indicating the intention that they should be entitled to receive their shares in the fund without giving security, nevertheless equity will require security where one of the legatees of a life interest has disposed of part of the corpus of the fund, and threatens to dispose of all of it, with an expressed view to depriving a remainderman, whose interest she denies, of his interest. Sherman v. Sherman, 36 N. J. Eq. 125.

A life tenant will be required to secure the interests of remaindermen when the former has expended from the principal in excess of that necessary for her support, as provided by the will, and by other misconduct has hazarded the estate. Reed v. Reed, 80 Conn. 411, 68 Atl. 852.

And security is always to be required from a life tenant of moneys, etc., where there is shown to be special reason for protecting the remaindermen, either because of the irresponsibility of the life tenant, her removal of the estate beyond the court's jurisdiction, or her dangerous management of the same. Langworthy v. Chadwick, 13 Conn. 42.

Under the authority of a statute requiring testamentary trustees to give security in the same manner as provided in the case of executors and administrators, security may be required from a life tenant of a sum of money bequeathed to him "in trust, to be invested for the benefit of his heirs, he having the use or interest of the same." Montfort

v. Montfort, 24 Hun, 120, and see Little v. Geer, 69 Conn. 411, 37 Atl. 1056.

In Schenk's Estate, 17 Lanc. L. Rev. 369, a life estate in personal property consisting of certificates of deposit, stocks, etc., was given to the testator's widow, with the privilege, in addition to the life use, of taking from the principal as necessary for her comfortable support, so long as she remained unmarried. The widow was executrix, and her conveyance to herself, individually, of all the personal estate, just previous to her remarriage, resulted in the court's requiring her to give security to protect the remainder interests.

And it has been held that a legatee of a life estate may be required to give a bond for the faithful management and preservation of the fund bequeathed, even where the will gave not only the use and income during life, but the right to any part of the principal, if needed, making the life tenant the sole judge of the need. Pierce v. Stidworthy, 79 Me. 234, 9 Atl. 617.

The decision in Pierce v. Stidworthy, supra, was influenced by the peculiar circumstance found in the fact that the fund in question, being an award for damages to a vessel in which the testator was interested, could not have been known to the testator, as he died before the claim on which it was awarded was presented; and on a subsequent hearing (81 Me. 50, 16 Atl. 333), the life tenant was discharged from the obligation of giving a bond, the court saying: "On the evidence submitted in support of this petition it is evident that she cannot furnish the bond, and we think, on reconsideration of the matter in the new light afforded us, she should be discharged from the obligation to do so. It is not strange that she cannot, when we consider that sureties on a bond would have to undertake a very uncertain and indefinable liability; namely, what would be a fair discretionary use of the interest and principal of the property. If she commit waste of the property (and that would be a difficult thing to determine, where the will intrusts her with such enlarged discretion), an application can be made to the court to provide a remedy." 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

When there is reasonable ground to believe that property subject to an estate for life will be either wasted, secreted, or removed out of the state, a court of chancery will protect the interest in remainder by compelling the tenant for life to give security.

Langworthy v. Chadwick, 13 Conn. 42; Cheshire v. Cheshire, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 539; Re McDougall and Re Fernbacher, supra; 2 Perry, Tr. 3d ed. § 451; Security Co. v. Hardenburgh, supra; Howard v. Howard, 16 N. J. Eq. 486; Security Co. v. Pratt, 65 Conn. 161, 32 Atl. 396; Re Garrity, 108 Cal. 463, 38 Pac. 628, 41 Pac. 485; Re Camp, 126 N. Y. 377, 27 N. It will be found that few decisions draw the distinction between moneys and other forms of personal property in passing upon the question of requiring security, and in some cases it is difficult to determine the character of the personal estate. In many instances the residue of an estate consists of money, and so it has been held that where a life interest is given in the "residue" of an estate, the remaindermen may demand that the life tenant secure their interests. Clarke v. Terry, 34 Conn. 176; Re Gillespie, 18 Abb. N. C. 41.

And see Re Hunt, 38 Misc. 721, 78 N. Y. Supp. 291, where a husband, as executor of his wife's estate and life tenant under the will, was ordered to give security for the benefit of remaindermen, to cover a debt owing from the husband at the wife's death.

And in Burnett v. Lester, 53 Ill. 325, it was said that a life tenant of personal property which she had sold might be required to secure the remainder interest in the proceeds.

But it was held in Weeks v. Weeks, 5 N. H. 326, that no security should be required from the testator's widow as life tenant of a money legacy where it was undoubtedly the testator's intention that she should have possession. The court said: "It is true the widow may expend the property and leave nothing to answer for it. But this must have been known to the testator, and yet he did not see fit to provide that she should give security. It is, therefore, a fair presumption that he had entire confidence in her integrity, and thought that no security was necessary."

The payment of a money legacy to a life tenant was directed to be made without security in Green's Appeal, 42 Pa. 25, where the bequest in the will was of the "principal and interest (if she needs it), her lifetime."

No security except a receipt filed with the probate judge was required in Sampson v. Randall, 72 Me. 109, where several legacies in a will were of a life income only. It was said: "If testators do not desire to have the remainders provided for in their wills thus endangered, they can easily guard against the danger by the appointment of

The requiring of a bond is within the sound discretion of the court.

Amiss v. Williamson, supra; Mason v. Pate, 34 Ala. 379.

Ladd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The will of James Scott was construed in Scott v. Scott, 132 Iowa, 37, 109 N. W. 293, to bequeath $3,000 to his widow, Nancy R. Scott, and the use of the residue of the estate during life, with remainder over to his heirs, who are the appellees in this case. The estate consisted of personal property save a one-fourth interest in a hotel at Andes, New York, consisting of money and mortgages amounting to $18,600. After deducting the legacy to her, there remained $15,600 worth of property of which she is entitled to the use, and to the principal of which the appellees are entitled at her death. She was appointed executrix without bond, as recommended in the will, and has filed her final report, asking her discharge as such, and that she retain the $3,000 absolutely, and the residue subject to the title in the remaindermen. As a condition to so doing, they demanded that security be exacted, and the district court required the execution of a bond in the sum of $25,000, with sureties, to be approved by the clerk of court, conditioned that upon her death all property coming into her hands as life tenant will be promptly turned over to those entitled thereto.

The early practice in England was to re-trustees, and declaring that the income only shall be paid to the donees for life. Most wills creating remainders contain such provisions. The will now under consideration contains no such provision."

Where a testator willed his widow a certain sum in money for her sole use and benefit during her life, and at her death to revert to his children, and directed that it be paid to her within sixty days after his death, it was held that the bequest should be paid without requiring the widow to give security, although it had been alleged that she was insolvent and that the money would be squandered. Martin v. Martin, 69 Miss. 315, 13 So. 267.

In McGuire v. Gallagher, 99 Me. 334, 59 Atl. 445, a will was construed as giving a life tenant not only the use of the income of the real property and funds in the bank, but also of the corpus of the estate, as she desired; and as the testator had required no bond of the life tenant as executrix, there was held to be no necessity for any bond in regard to the life estate.

Even where security for remainder interests is provided for by statute, it may not be required where a testator gave his widow "full use" of a certain amount of money during her lifetime, and only expressed a desire that on her death it should go to others, if anything were left. Hambricht's Appeal, 2 Grant, Cas. 320.

It was held in Boyd v. Boyd, 6 Gill. & J. 25, that, in the absence of proof that the interests of remaindermen were in danger, conformity to the plain and manifest intention of a testator who willed a sum of money "to be at your disposition and for your use, free of interest, during your natural life," would not warrant requiring the life tenant to give security.

In Flanagan v. Flanagan, 8 Abb. N. C. 413, where the donee of a life estate was held entitled under the will to dispose of the fund given for her life use as she saw fit during her life, even to a possible exhaustion, it was held that security could not be required.

A will which gives a life legatee "the custody and possession of all personal property" thereby constitutes such legatee a testamentary trustee of the principal of the testator's personal estate, and it should be turned over to the life tenant without requiring security, there being no proof of the latter's insolvency or any intention to dispose of the principal of the fund. Re Ungrich, 48 App. Div. 594, 62 N. Y. Supp. 975, affirmed in 166 N. Y. 618, 59 N. E. 1131.

A direction in a will that the beneficiary of a life estate in a certain fund should not be obliged to enter security was held valid in White's Estate, 1 W. N. C. 114, the right to require security being one which the testator could waive, and thus preclude remaindermen from setting up certain statutes which apparently allowed them to claim security.

In McClernan v. McClernan, 73 Md. 283, 20 Atl. 908, a testator gave one of his daughters a fourth part of the residue of his estate, to have, hold, use, and enjoy the same during her natural life, with full power to expend or appropriate any part or all of the same for her own use only, and any portion that might remain to go to her brothers. The will enjoined the daughter to hold the gift as a trust, and at once to make her will, so that the testator's wishes might be carried out. In refusing to exact security from this legatee, the court said: "Upon the allegations of the bill in this case, there does not seem to be any ground laid for the interference of a court of equity, and requiring her to give bond, as asked. Her duty is to make a will, and to make it at once. It is not alleged she has not done so. If there were charges that she had not done so and would not do so, and that she was wantonly and needlessly wasting the property, and perverting it from her own personal uses 'only,' to the use of others, there would possibly be ground for the court to interfere to prevent the misuse of the trust funds, and to secure to those designed to take after her death what might remain of the property given to her for life, with discretion as to its use for herself. Her discretion in the reasonable and honest use of principal or interest for her own self ought not to be restricted by the court, and she ought not to be subjected to any costs quire security from the life tenant for the protection of the remainderman before allowing the former the possession of personal property of any character to the use of which he had become entitled by bequest, but a distinction later was drawn between specific bequests of property and those of the residue of an estate; and the rule may be regarded as firmly established that, where specific articles are left to legatees for life, with remainder over, all required, in the absence of a showing of danger of loss or waste, is that an inventory thereof be indorsed by the life tenant, with acknowledgment that these are held for life only, with title in the remainderman. See Foley v. Burnell, 1 Bro. Ch. 274. Where that of which the use for life is bequeathed is money or its equivalent, or is the residue of an estate which is money or its equivalent, or is such property as must be converted into money, a different rule obtains. Unless it is to be inferred from the language of the will that the legatee is to have possession, he will be entitled to no more than the income to be derived from a proper investment of the funds by the executor or a trustee to be appointed. Hetfield v. Fowler, 60 Ill. 45. The will before us, however, plainly indicates the intention of the testator that his widow shall have custody of and manage the property during her life. The third clause reads: "The rest, remainder, and residue of my property, of every kind and nature, I will, devise, and bequeath to my beloved wife, Nancy R. Scott, to have, hold, use, and enjoy during the term of her natural life, except that I will, devise, and bequeath her the sum of $3,000 absolutely, and the balance to her exclusive use, benefit, behoof, and enjoyment during the term of her natural life, as aforesaid." The words "have" and "hold" as here employed manifest an intention that she receive the property into her custody and retain the same during the period named. Gee v. Hasbrouck, 128 Mich. 509, 87 N. W. 621; Rountree v. Dixon, 105 N. C. 350, 11 S. E. 159; Stansbury v. Hubner, 73 Md. 228, 11 L.R.A. 204, 25 Am. St. Rep. 584, 20 Atl. 904. But there is no intimation in the instrument that she may encroach at her discretion on the principal, in which event no security should be exacted. Pierce v. Stidworthy, 81 Me. 50, 16 Atl. 333; Re Ryerson, 26 N. J. Eq. 43; Re Garrity, 108 Cal. 463, 471, 38 Pac. 628, 41 Pac. 485. At her death, the bequest is of "the rest, residue, and remainder of my property, of every kind and nature, to my legal heirs, share and share alike. The expression "rest, residue, and remainder" is that portion of the estate not given to testator's wife absolutely in the previous clause. Had the previous clause given her the use only of the entire estate, the right of diminishing the property while in her hands might be implied. See Re Garrity, supra; Markley's Estate, 132 Pa. 352, 19 Atl. 138; Warren v. Webb, 68 Me. 133; Martin v. Martin, 60 Miss. 315, 13 So. 267. But it had given her a part and the use for life of the remainder, so that the expression has direct application to the portion undisposed of; i. e., the corpus of that portion of the estate to which she is given the life use. The language employed furnishes no intimation of any exemption or requirement of security from the life tenant. That she was exonerated from executing a bond as executrix is not alone sufficient to warrant the inference that he also intended that no security should be exacted upon the determination of her duties as such, and when she assumed the management of the property herself and as trustee for the remainderman. There being no ambiguity in the language employed, parol proof of the declarations of the deor supervision about the matter, so long as she exhibits upright purposes and conduct with reference to the estate and its uses."

But in view of a provision which gave a share of the residue of his estate to a daughter-in-law of the testator, and advised, recommended, and enjoined her to at once invest the same so that it might be "preserved for the use and benefit of" the legatee and her husband during their lives and for their children, it was said in McClernan v. McClernan, supra, that, as to this share, the testator clearly intended the preservation of the estate for the benefit of the legatee's children when the life estate terminated, and that section of the Code which entitled remaindermen to security for the proper administration of a trust would require the legatee in this instance to give bond as trustee to carry out the directions of the will.

Provisions of a will creating a life estate, and giving the tenant power to use all or 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

any part of the testator's property as she wished, with the right to possession, without being required to give security, were held in Martin's Estate, 160 Pa. 35, 28 Atl. 575, to warrant the trustees, on her application, in advancing to her from the principal such sum as was needed for her suitable maintenance without requiring security whenever it affirmatively appeared that the income which was primarily devoted to it was insufficient to accomplish the testator's controlling purpose.

There has been no attempt to include in this review of authorities any cases upon the duty of an executor to require a life tenant to give security for the remainder interests, or upon the executor's liability for failure to exact such security. It should be noted also that the scope of this note does not cover cases where an estate is dependent upon a contingency.

We have, then, the naked question whether, in the absence of any intimation on the subject in the will, security should be exacted from the life tenant for the protection of the remainderman when money or its equivalent is bequeathed to the former, with remainder over. The rules on the subject are clearly stated in Whittemore v. Russell, 80 Me. 297, 6 Am. St. Rep. 200, 14 Atl. 197: "A gift of the use of personal property for a lifetime, with a gift over, as it is here, is to be regarded according to the nature of the property and other circumstances. If of perishable articles, the use of which consists in their consumption, it amounts from necessity to an absolute gift of the property. If of articles which may depreciate by using, but which will not necessarily be consumed or worn out in that way, a full title thereto is not given; but the life legatee, under ordinary circumstances and risks, is allowed to retain possession of the articles without giving security for their preservation. Circumstances may, however, alter the case as to such property. Where the use of money is given, the gift is of the interest only; and, as such property may be easily lost or wasted, the general rule is that the legatee must give some reasonable security to safely preserve the funds for the remainderman, or the money may go into the hands of a trustee, of whom a bond would be required." Re McDougall, 141 N. Y. 21, 35 N. E. 961; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 790. In 2 Woerner's American Law of Administration, § 456, the author says: "Where a testator bequeaths a residue consisting of money, or property whose use is the conversion into money, with remainder to another, it is the duty of the executor either to take security from the life tenant, protecting the interest of the remainderman, or to convert the fund into cash, and invest it for the benefit of all who are entitled under the will. So, where the executor is himself the devisee for life, he may be compelled, after completing his duties as executor, to give security for the benefit of the remainderman, although relieved from bond as executor." In many of the authorities, however, the matter of exacting security is regarded as discretionary with the court, for, the testator having directed that the life tenant have possession of and management of the property, without suggesting indemnity, the fair inference seems to be that none was thought necessary. Thus it was said in Re Camp, 126 N. Y. 377, 27 N. E. 799, that "generally, before making an order for such security, there must be some fact alleged and proved tending to show the property would be unsafe and insecure in the hands of the tenant for life." In Re Garrity, supra, the court observes that "the rule is one of equity, established by courts for the protection of the remainderman, in the absence of any direction in the will; but the rule thus established must yield to the terms of the will, and if it appears, from a proper construction of the will, that it was the intention of the testator that the property should be placed in possession of the life tenant without security, such intention will be carried out. It is to be assumed that the testator intended the life tenant to have the full enjoyment during his lifetime of the property bequeathed to him, and that this enjoyment shall not be impaired, except for the protection of the remainderman. The testator has the right to make the life tenant the trustee of the property bequeathed, without requiring any security from him; and very slight indications in the will will be construed as showing that the testator intended the life tenant, rather than the executor, to be the trustee, subject, of course, to the general rules applicable to the obligations of a trustee to his cestui que trust. If the testator has not required such security to be given by the life tenant, courts are not authorized to require it, in the absence of any showing of danger or liability of waste; otherwise, the will of the testator that the life tenant shall enjoy the property will be frustrated." See Langworthy v. Chadwick, 13 Conn. 42; Hodge v. Hodge, 72 N. C. 616; Cheshire v. Cheshire, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 569; Howard v. Howard, 16 N. J. Eq. 486. We are inclined to regard this the more reasonable rule, for it is to be inferred from the giving the life tenant the management of the residue of the estate without fixing conditions or requiring security, that the testator intended to repose confidence in his fidelity. But the interest of the remainderman in moneys or securities is more precarious than that in specific articles of personal property, because ordinarily more readily lost, secreted, abstracted, or converted, and the courts will act with greater caution in guarding the respective interests of the parties. The record before us shows that the life tenant is not kindly disposed toward the remaindermen; that she has no property of her own save some household goods and the $3,000 left her under the will; that she does not maintain a home, but rooms while in the state; that she spends a large portion of her time in the state of New York, and expects to do so in the future; that she has buried her husband there, and expects to be buried at his side; that all her relatives live there; that she had considered moving there, but was not decided. There is no proof of loss in of insurance. Every company, or officer or agent thereof, who shall violate the provisions of this section, shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $500, to be recovered by action in the name of the commonwealth, and, on collection, paid into the state treasury."

The testimony would bear the construction that the general course of business pursued by the insurance company was such that the agent was entitled to a certain percentage of the premiums, which he retained as his own, and which, in this case, was much larger than the so-called rebate. It was possible for the court to find that the insured paid to the agent the customary premium, and that the latter returned to him a part of his commission, and also paid to the insurance company the full amount of the premium due to it on such an insurance. It might be that another construction would be a more reasonable one, but that would not justify the reversal of the finding of the court upon a question of fact. The finding of the court must be interpreted as a finding that the agent gave to the insured a part of his own money, and not a part of any money belonging to the company. We do not think that such a case is within the prohibition of the statute.

With regard to the second, the court took the view that there was no evidence in the record to show that Dalton lost his life while carrying concealed upon or about his person a deadly weapon. There was no testimony whatever to show that the deceased was carrying the pistol, whose discharge brought about his death, concealed upon his person. There is nothing to show that the pistol was concealed; and, if it was concealed, there is nothing to show that the death of the deceased was due to its concealment. Now, to sustain this defense, it is necessary to show that the offense of carrying a concealed weapon was being committed, and, further, that that offense brought about the death of the deceased.

A property owner is not liable to trespassers who are injured by lawful instrumentalities on his property, except in the case of traps.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Bernard Hermes, as administrator of the estate of his infant son, William Hermes, deceased, instituted this action in the Kenton circuit court to recover damages of the appellee, the Hatfield Coal Company, for the death of his son, caused, as he alleges, by the negligence of the appellee. The appellant, in his petition, alleges that the appellee, the Hatfield Coal Company, was and is engaged in the business of selling coal in the city of Covington, that it maintains and operates a coal elevator and coal chutes; that it is the owner of, and maintains, a certain coal chute on Eleventh street in the city of Covington, near the east end thereof; that appellee negligently and with gross and wanton carelessness erected a ladder in close proximity to Eleventh street, extending to the top of its coal chute, a distance of about 60 feet; that the ladder and coal chute had been so erected for a period of nine or ten years; that children of the surrounding neighborhood were in the habit of resorting to and amusing themselves both by day and by night in and upon the ladder and in the building and on the chute; that the chute was a large opening, and children were in the habit of climbing the ladder and peering down the hole, all of which was known to the appellee and its officers; that the same was enticing and seductive to children to walk and play upon, and that a large number of small children were in the habit of resorting to and playing and amusing themselves upon the ladder and chute, all of which appellee well knew; that the elevator chute had not been in operation for about a year, and was not necessary to the conduct of the business of appellee; that the ladder and building had not been used for many months; that appellee knew the building, ladder, and chute were seductive and enticing to children to play in and upon, and that it was within 20 feet of Eleventh street; that on the 5th day of July, 1908, the decedent, a boy ten years of age, with other children, got upon the ladder and climbed from the bottom to the top, and then went upon the building where the coal chute was erected, and where many children had been resorting for many years past; that, while the decedent was looking down the chute, he fell into it and broke his neck, from the effects of which he immediately died. To this petition a general demurrer was interposed and sustained, and, appellant declining to plead further, the petition was dismissed; from which ruling of the court this appeal is prosecuted.

The petition in this case, although evidently so intended by the pleader, does not fall within the principle of Bransom v. Labrot, 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 193. There the defendant maintained upon its property, adjacent to the public street, a pile of lumber, which was so arranged as to easily fall if interfered with. A child going upon the premises of the defendant, and playing upon the lumber pile, was hurt by the falling of the lumber, and it was held that these facts constituted a cause of action against the owner of the lumber for the death of the child; it being said that the owner maintained near the public highway a thing which, of itself, was an invitation to children to come in and play upon, and that under these circumstances, if the lumber was so piled as to readily fall under the influence of the children's play, the owner was liable in damages for the injury accruing. But the facts of the case at bar do not present the question adjudicated in the case 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) cited. In that case the lumber was so piled as to be a trap for unwary infancy playing upon it. An examination of the case shows that the careless piling of the lumber so as to constitute a trap for the child was the basis of the cause of action for the injury. In the case at bar, the ladder upon which the infant climbed was, in itself, perfectly secure and safe, and well adapted to the purposes for which it was used. If the rounds of the ladder had been so arranged as to break under the weight of the infant climbing upon it, and thus caused his injury, the two cases would have been similar. But this was not the case. Here the ladder was perfectly safe for the purposes for which it was used. The infant climbed upon it to the top, and, after reaching this point, got upon the coal chute, and by his own negligence fell into the hole and was killed.

The case at bar falls within the principle of Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 909, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 111 S. W. 712. In that case the defendant company maintained an electric line of such high voltage as to be deadly in its effects if touched. The wire carrying the deadly current was on a pole some 18 feet from the street or highway. An infant climbed the pole, came in contact with the dangerous wire, and was instantly killed. We held that a peremptory instruction should have gone in favor of the defendant company. In the opinion it is stated that the pole which the infant climbed in order to come in contact with the deadly wire was not an attraction to infancy, within the doctrine of Bransom v. Labrot. In the opinion many cases are reviewed, and the rule is stated that the doctrine announced in Bransom v. Labrot is rather to be limited than extended. If the defendant company is responsible in the case at bar, then it is difficult to limit the rule which would hold a defendant responsible for the trespasses of children. There are very few things which do not afford an opportunity for headlong infancy to injure itself. For instance, the ordinary steps which lead from the first to the second floor of a building, and the banisters which usually guard them, are the favorite playground of children, who run up the steps and slide down the banisters. In so doing they may receive a fall at any moment, and, if the defendant is guilty of negligence in the case at bar, it would be difficult to formulate a rule which would exculpate the owner of the banisters from which any heedless infant might fall and injure itself. A tree with low, projecting limbs is undoubtedly an attraction for infants inclined to climb, and yet we believe that no one would say that one who maintains such a tree in his yard would be liable for damages if a neighbor's child trespassed upon his premises, climbed the tree, fell, and was injured.

If the ladder maintained by the appellee herein had been unsafe for the purpose for which it was used, and the climbing infant had been precipitated to the ground and injured by the breaking of one of the rounds, then the case at bar would have fallen within the principle announced in Bransom v. Labrot. But such was not the case. The infant safely climbed the ladder, left it, and walked to the mouth of the coal chute to peer down into its depths, and by accident fell headlong, and received the fatal injuries to recover damages for which this action was instituted. The appellee was not guilty of any negligence in the premises. The infant was a trespasser, and was fatally injured, not because of any defect in the ladder or coal chute, but because, by his own carelessness, he fell into the hole of the chute.

We are of opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN B. LEVERT, Appt.,

v.

DAILY STATES PUBLISHING COMPANY et al.

(123 La. 594, 49 So. 206.)

Libel — malice — damages.

1. Malice on the part of a publisher of statements selected from other journals that are injurious to the reputation or character of private individuals or public officials is conclusively inferred if the communications are false in fact. The good intentions of the publisher affect only the question of damages; and, where no special damages are proven, the plaintiff is entitled to such damages on account of injured feeling as must unavoidably be inferred from the nature of the libel.

Same — official misconduct.

2. A sweeping charge of official favoritism and misconduct, leveled against the members of a public board, without exception, necessarily points the finger of condemnation at every one of them, though none are named; and, if not proven, constitutes a libel, if the members are known and the publication is generally understood to apply to them.

Constitutional law — freedom of press — libel.

3. The "freedom of the press" consists in a right, in a conductor of a newspaper, to print what he chooses, without previous license, but subject to be held responsible therefor as anyone else for a similar publication.

Damages — libel — malice.

4. The absence of actual malice in the publisher of a libelous article on a matter of public concern will be considered in mitigation of damages; and, where no special damages have been sustained, nominal damages, at least, will be awarded for the purposes of vindication.

(April 26, 1909.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clegg & Quintero and Miller, Dufour, & Dufour, for appellant:

The publication of statements selected from other journals that are injurious to the reputation or character of private individuals or public officials, or editorial articles favorably commenting thereon, if false in fact, are libelous and defamatory, and are presumed to be malicious, and therefore objectionable.

Fitzpatrick v. Daily States Pub. Co. 48 La. Ann. 1135, 20 So. 173.

Plaintiff need not be named in the libelous publication if matters of description or other references therein, or the extrinsic facts

Case Note. — Right of one not specially named to maintain action for libel or slander, based on charges made against a class or group of persons to which he belongs.

For the purposes of this note, each of the words "class" and "group" is to be used in separate and distinct senses. "Class" is to be regarded in its most general sense, and as having reference to a large number of persons who may be designated collectively by a single name, irrespective of geographical limitation, political division, place of abode, or any similar restriction. "Group" is to indicate a particular, local, or limited collection of the members of a general class. For example, the officers or soldiers of an entire army are a class, while the officers or soldiers of a particular regiment are to be regarded as a group. Likewise, professional men and public officers generally belong to classes. But if only those within a certain city are referred to, they may be said to form a group. As will be seen, these words are thus defined in order to simplify the presentation of the rules to be deduced from the cases.

The question here considered is, Admitting or conceding that the language used would be libelous if it had been directed at the plaintiff personally, is it actionable and the circumstances, are sufficient to show that he was intended as the object of it, and it was so understood by others.

Mr. William Stirling Parkerson for appellees.

Land, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit for $10,000 damages for an alleged newspaper libel against the plaintiff when directed impersonally at a class or group to which he belongs? It may be said generally that, if the language is so used as unerringly to point to plaintiff, his right of action is not affected by the fact that it is also applicable to others; and, although the language may not on its face refer to the plaintiff, he may maintain his action if he can establish its application to himself.

But if there is nothing in the language employed which, by proper inducement or colloquium, can be given personal application to the plaintiff, he has no right of action. Comes v. Cruce, 85 Ark. 79, 107 S. W. 185, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 327; Hardy v. Williamson, 86 Ga. 551, 22 Am. St. Rep. 479, 12 S. E. 874; Lewis v. Soule, 3 Mich. 514; McGraw v. Detroit Free Press Co. 85 Mich. 203, 48 N. W. 500; Watson v. Detroit Journal Co. 143 Mich. 430, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480, 107 N. W. 81, 8 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 131; Merrill v. Post Pub. Co. 197 Mass. 185, 83 N. E. 419; Stewart v. Wilson, 23 Minn. 449; Kenworthy v. Journal Co. 117 Mo. App. 327, 93 S. W. 882; Miller v. Maxwell, 16 Wend. 9; Hauptner v. White, 81 App. Div. 153, 80 N. Y. Supp. 895.

Class.

Keeping in mind the sense in which the word "class" is used in this note, it may properly be said that an individual who is not named cannot maintain an action for the publication of matter in derogation of the class to which he belongs.

A dealer in antiquities cannot maintain an action for the publication of a libelous article describing certain leaden objects sold for antiquities, as fabrications, stating that they were being offered for sale, not only in London, but throughout the country, and characterizing the sale of them as a gross attempt at deception and extortion. Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 Fost. & F. 349.

And an individual concern engaged in the trading stamp business cannot maintain an action for libel against one publishing an article not referring to all persons engaged in that business in the city, but referring generally to concerns engaged in 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

as a member of the board of administrators of the Tulane University of Louisiana. The case was tried before a jury, and the plaintiff appeals from a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants.

On August 15, 1906, there appeared in the columns of the Daily States, a newspaper of general circulation, published and edited in the city of New Orleans by the defendants herein, the following article:

Affairs of Tulane University.

(From the Boston Herald, August 8, 1906.)

"A most unpleasant, and, as it appears, reprehensible, condition of affairs has been developed in respect of Tulane University of New Orleans. The newspapers of the city discuss it with much tenderness, but the business. Watson v. Detroit Journal Co. supra.

And a township supervisor cannot, simply because he was a candidate for re-election and a member of the election board, maintain an action for the publication of an article, conceding it to be libelous, which declared that it must be painful to conscientious persons to witness the frequent violations of truth at elections by those brought forward at the polls, and that the recurrence of false swearing was too common to pass unpunished. Lewis v. Soule, supra.

And it was doubted by the court in Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 211, 97 Am. Dec. 605, whether a soldier of the Civil War could have maintained libel for the publication of an article imputing cowardice to the whole Army, and improper treatment of persons of all ages and sexes to those bodies of soldiers that passed through, or occupied, four specified places.

It was said in People v. Eastman, 188 N. Y. 478, 81 N. E. 459, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 302, that a Catholic clergyman could not maintain an action for libel against the author of a scurrilous and vile attack on Catholic clergymen generally.

Group generally.

In this connection another distinction, in addition to that between class and group, should be kept in mind. If the defamatory matter is used toward the entire group,—that is, includes all of them,—it may generally be said to refer to each, so that each may sue. On the other hand, if the language is used indefinitely or impersonally toward one or a few of several members of a group, any member must establish its application to him in order to maintain his action.

It was held in Foxcroft v. Lacy, Hobart, 89a, decided about 1725, that one of sixteen persons, of whom it was said that they murdered a certain person, could maintain an action for slander against the author of the charge, the court saying, in effect, that the words applied to each of them as forcibly as if he had been named.

there appears to be a practically unanimous sentiment that the institution has been grossly imposed upon and abused by the management or mismanagement of its responsible officers of administration. Tulane University is one of the leading educational institutions of the South, and it has received endowments that give promise of enhancing its importance if they are prudently and intelligently managed. It has obtained from the state landed property in New Orleans which was valued, when prices were very much lower than now, at $200,000. It is also exempted from taxation on all property below $5,000,000. Being thus endowed and favored by the state, in addition to private endowments, it had high rank and promise. Dr. E. A. Alderman, now president of the University of Virginia, was for several years at its head, and he ranked among the best-equipped college presidents of the country, and gave prestige to the institution. It has 1,500 or more students, and more than 100 instructors.

"During last winter a movement was undertaken to obtain for it an annual subvention from the state treasury, and in this way to raise it to the position of the State University. Although there is already, at Baton Rouge, a recognized State University, the scheme was, we believe, to effect some kind of union of the two, making the Baton Rouge institution an agricultural and technical department of the complete State University. This movement to officialize Tulane University led to an investigation of its

And it was held in Chandler v. Holloway, 4 Port. (Ala.) 17, that where the defendant spoke and published concerning the plaintiff and others, "You are a gang of murderers; you killed Taylor," the plaintiff's action for slander was maintainable.

One of two persons who have held a note at different times may maintain an action for a libelous publication importing that the note has been fraudulently altered. Forbes v. Johnson, 11 B. Mon. 48.

And an action for slander for the speaking of the words, "Those people upstairs keep a whore house," may be maintained by one of the people "upstairs." Cook v. Rief, 20 Jones & S. 302.

So, too, one of several occupants of a house may maintain an action for libel for the publication of an article characterizing it as a disorderly house. McClean v. New York Press Co. 46 N. Y. S. R. 706, 19 N. Y. Supp. 262.

But it was held in Smart v. Blanchard, 42 N. H. 137, that a woman who arranged a donation party could not maintain libel for the publication of an article characterizing the affair as a rumseller's benefit, and stating that the "more part" of those present went because of the good stuff in the cellar, where the spirits were kept, and in the ladies' chamber, unless she showed that the words were applied in their actionable sense to her, and that the persons to whom they were published so understood them. This case, if not unsupportable, is on the border line. It would seem that the language here used must necessarily have been understood as applying to the plaintiff, who got up the party.

It was held in Shearlock v. Beardsworth (1816) 1 Murray, 196, that the lieutenant colonel of a regiment could maintain an action for the making of a slanderous statement that the regiment was composed of cowards and blackguards, and had, for that reason, been dismissed and sent home.

So, a member of a court-martial may maintain an action of libel for the publication of a caricature representing the court-martial in a ludicrous and contemptible light, position, and condition, if he is specifically and individually held up to hatred, contempt, and ridicule. Ellis v. Kimball, 16 Pick. 132.

On the other hand, it was held in Sumner v. Buel, 12 Johns. 475, that an officer of a regiment of militia could not maintain libel for the publication of an article reflecting on the officers thereof generally, since the article had no particular and personal application to him, and no special damages were alleged. This case was subsequently criticized in Ryckman v. Delavan, cited infra, under "Groups of persons in certain business, profession, or employment."

—jurors or witnesses.

A member of a jury may maintain an action for a libelous publication characterizing the jury's verdict as infamous, and stating that "we cannot express the contempt which should be felt for these twelve men who have thus not only offended public opinion, but have done injustice to their own oaths," since the publication is clearly directed at the individual jurors, and not at the jury as such. Byers v. Martin, 2 Colo. 605, 25 Am. Rep. 755.

But one of seven witnesses at a trial cannot maintain libel for the publication of an article stating that another one of them, naming him, had been arrested for perjury, and that two or three others would be arrested on the same charge, unless he shows the application of the words to himself. Kenworthy v. Journal Co. 117 Mo. App. 327, 93 S. W. 882. It will be observed that this language expressly refers to but "two or three" out of seven.

—groups of municipal officers.

And a member of a board of town trustees may maintain an action for the publication of a libelous publication entitled "Ring," and stating that the trustees had the "wring" in the noses of the taxpayers in a most contemptible, illegal, and unjust management of the state aid already given to it. It was discovered that it had never rendered an account concerning the use of its endowment, given by the state in trust, and the press insisted that the board of management should make a report of its stewardship. The showing of facts that was made rather reluctantly was far from indicating that a prudent and wise discretion had been exercised, and one transaction was revealed that has the quality of a scandal and has been visited with severe criticism.

"There was a certain parcel of improved property for which, some time ago, a demand appeared. A citizen offered to purchase it for a sum specific in order to devote it to business purposes. The question to be considered, of course, was whether its sale at the price was advantageous to the university. The price was by some not deemed sufficient, in view of the fact that real estate in that quarter was appreciating in value. After protracted consideration, in which the person offering to purchase showed a wholly commendable purpose to do what was fair, it was finally voted by the board of managers, with his approbation, that the property should be put in the market by advertisement, he and the board practically agreeing that his proposal should rest in abeyance until it should appear by responses to the advertisement whether the university could dispose of the property to better advantage.

"While the subject was thus temporarily disposed of, a meeting of the board was manner, and charging them with a corrupt combination with a successful bidder for the construction of a culvert. Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 64 Pac. 290.

One member of a board of commissioners may maintain an action for a libelous publication charging the commissioners with wasting public funds by favoritism in letting public contracts, and is not precluded therefrom by the possibility that he may have voted against the letting of the contract, where the entire charge is false and malicious. Wofford v. Meeks, 129 Ala. 349, 55 L.R.A. 214, 87 Am. St. Rep. 66, 30 So. 625.

And one of four coroner's physicians in a borough of a city may maintain libel for the publication of an article referring impersonally to "the coroner's physician," and charging and detailing iniquitous practices in the coroner's office, and adding that the graft goes not to the underlings, but to those higher up. Weston v. Commercial Advertiser Assn. 184 N. Y. 479, 77 N. E. 660.

And a newspaper article stating, in reference to a city fire department, "The entire staff of harness makers of the department, being three in number, have been dismissed for alleged thefts of leather. . . . The rascals ought to feel thankful for getting off without more severe punishment," points with sufficient certainty to them individually to support the action of one of them for libel. Dwyer v. Fireman's Journal Co. 11 Daly, 248; Ryer v. Fireman's Journal Co. 11 Daly, 251.

The following words, spoken with reference to a city hall: "I was ejected by force from this building . . . by a gang of thieves, murderers, and robbers and pirates, at the head of whom stood that old gray-headed scoundrel. He committed an assault on me. We have some police officers on the force of whom I am proud, while there are others that cause me to blush with shame. There are burglars, geese stealers, murderers, and pirates,"—may be found to have been uttered of and concerning the chief of police. Woods v. Gleason. 18 App. Div. 401, 46 N. Y. Supp. 200.

A publication calling policemen "hogs and blood-sucking police officers who insist on sitting on juries," declaring that they neglect their duties as policemen and cheat honorable citizens out of jury fees, and adding that this has no reference to the chief of police, because he is beneath notice, makes an actionable libel upon him. Smith v. Utley, 92 Wis. 133, 35 L.R.A. 620, 65 N. W. 744.

On the other hand, it has been held that a member of a city police board cannot sue for libel for the publication of a charge of a corrupt combination of others with the board to promote gambling, lotteries, and brothels, unless he shows that it was published of and concerning him. Caruth v. Richeson, 96 Mo. 186, 9 S. W. 633. In this case the court intimated that the jury might have found that the charge was published of and concerning the plaintiff, but that its verdict to the contrary would not be disturbed in the absence of corruption, prejudice, or passion.

In Giraud v. Beach, 3 E. D. Smith, 337, the court doubted whether a member of a hose company could maintain an action for libel against one publishing an article stating that a theft had been committed by some of the members of the company. Here again is a case where charges were made against only a part of the group mentioned.

—groups of persons in certain business, profession, or employment.

In Ryckman v. Delavan, 25 Wend. 186, the court stated that it inclined to the reasoning in the opinion of the minority in Sumner v. Buel (supra, under "Military bodies"), in which the writer said that it was difficult to see how a person understanding English could hesitate in applying the libel to the plaintiff, and, in effect, that it would seem necessarily to follow that the complaint should prevail. Then taking up the question presented to it, the court held that a member of one of six firms engaged in brewing and malting in a certain locality, could maintain libel for the publication of an article charging that they engaged in unwholesome and filthy called without any notification to this person, at which, without any notice of such purpose, it was voted to lease the property for a term of ninety-nine years to a certain party at an annual rate which public opinion esteemed to be ridiculously low, and without any provision for reappraisal and readjustment of the condition during the uncommonly long term. The person to whom the lease was thus summarily voted was, we understand, not well known; in fact, he was either a dummy or had but a small interest in the matter, the real parties being two relatives, a son and a nephew, if our memory serves, of the president of the board of managers. Within the short period that has since elapsed, it is demonstrated that the lease was a highly profitable bargain for the lessees and a very unfortunate one for the university. It is altogether likely that in a growing city like New Orleans the property will, in the life of three generations, make the fortunes of those who have secured it.

"We hazard nothing in saying that such malversation on the part of trustees of an educational institution, accentuated by such favoritism to the family of one of them, would here result in a storm of righteous indignation that would forever debar those who committed it from public respect and confidence. But the president of the board of managers answers all criticism by defying anyone to show that the action was not "legal." It will occur to most people of uprightness to say that it is an action justly practices in the process of malting, where it was false and malicious.

It was held in Le Fanu v. Malcomson, 1 H. L. Cas. 637, that the proprietors of a factory in a certain county in southern Ireland could maintain an action for the publication of a libelous article calling attention to factory abuses in such county, stating that, in some factories in Ireland, tyranny, oppression, Sabbath-breaking, and extortion were practised, and that the author had one in mind in the south of Ireland, where the jury found that the article applied to the plaintiff's factory.

One of ten subordinate engineers of a construction company is entitled to maintain an action for a libelous publication charging collusion between a brick company and its subcontractors and the subordinate engineers, or some of them, to defraud the construction company, if he can satisfy the jury that the words referred especially to him. Hardy v. Williamson, 86 Ga. 551, 22 Am. St. Rep. 479, 12 S. E. 874.

And the president of a labor union may maintain an action for a libelous publication stating that a piano had been sold to the union, that it was a great victory, requiring great financiering, and that the one who sold it thought it was a great thing "to bribe a committee or officers;" and his right of action is not affected by the fact that no name was mentioned, since the article must have been generally understood as referring to the president and trustees of the union. Barron v. Smith, 19 S. D. 50, 101 N. W. 1105. The cases of Whitford v. Smith, 19 S. D. 158, 102 N. W. 1135, and Nichols v. Smith, 19 S. D. 159, 102 N. W. 1135, were disposed of with the remark that they involved identically the same question as the foregoing case, and were governed by its authority.

One of the house surgeons in a hospital is as clearly libeled in his professional capacity as if he had been referred to by name, by a newspaper article characterizing them as jackasses disguised as doctors, brutes graduated to care for the sick, ghouls graduated to mutilate the dead, and the like, and charging that they had inflicted indignities upon the dead body of an old man, who had been a patient at the hospital. Bornmann v. Star Co. 174 N. Y. 212, 66 N. E. 723.

A petition circulated by persons who describe themselves as reputable physicians and dentists occupying a building, and reciting that, endeavoring to uphold the honor and dignity of their professions, and desiring to encourage only the best and most desirable tenants for the building, they are emphatically opposed to the rental of offices to osteopaths, criminal practitioners, advertising specialists, patent medicine fakirs, quacks, charlatans, and other fraudulent concerns, is a libel upon an osteopath having an office in the building. Lathrop v. Sundberg (Wash.) 24 L.R.A. —, 104 Pac. 176.

But one of a number of persons of a community, engaged in raising grapes and lawfully selling wine made therefrom, cannot maintain an action for the publication in a newspaper of an article stating that the killing of a negro was the result of the "wine joints," in one of which the trouble started; that the passions of the negroes were inflamed by the decoction sold as wine, which, in the general opinion, was adulterated, and possibly never saw a grape,—where no malice or ill-will can be legitimately construed to be indulged toward any individual of that class. Comes v. Cruce, 85 Ark. 79, 107 S. W. 185, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 327. It will be observed that in this case reference is made to one of the wine joints as the place where the trouble started.

A publication concerning a public market, stating that it was not a howling success, and that at no time were there more than a dozen people therein on Saturday night, is not, conceding it to be libelous, a libel upon one who occupied a stall therein for the sale of cigars and the like, or against his business. McGraw v. Detroit Free Press Co. 85 Mich. 203, 48 N. W. 500.

A member of a church vestry, who voted to request the resignation of the rector, may maintain an action for a libelous publicacomparable with the actions of those former officials of the great New York life insurance companies, who used their offices to enrich themselves at the expense of policy holders. The faculties and students of Tulane University for a hundred years will, in a just sense, be the victims of this deed of selfish rapacity. Men who would do such a thing would seem quite capable of robbing an orphan asylum or a church if they thought they could do it and escape the penalties of the law.

"Still worse, a committee representing in some sense the university, having investigated the matter and reported the facts essential as we have recited them, have declared that nothing wrong was done. This is a finding that impugns their own character in the forum of probity and morals. It is condemned in earnest language by the city newspapers, which are proud of the university, and jealous of its good name and prosperity. They insist that the whole business shall be thoroughly investigated by a disinterested legislative committee, and that not another dollar of public money shall be intrusted to the university until the scandalous contract shall be canceled and a new board of managers chosen to conduct its financial interests. In this demand they are wholly reasonable, and we trust that they will succeed. A clearer case of mercenary graft by abuse of a fiduciary office we do not recall. It may be what a distinguished Tammany politician calls 'honest graft' because it was accompanied without violation tion stating that the "vestry . . . relentlessly turn their back upon legal and moral obligation, to the detriment of a rector . . . who suffered himself to become debilitated while plodding along the path of duty to his congregation," and charging that promises to the voting body of the church, made to prevent a change of the personnel of the vestry, had been violated, where the words lead fairly and naturally to the conclusion that the writer's purpose was to denounce the persons in the vestry as an entity. Goldsborough v. Orem, 103 Md. 671, 64 Atl. 36.

And a publication stating that the alleged ladies of the W. C. T. U. in a city ignorantly and brazenly lowered themselves in an attempt to prevent the circulation of a Sunday newspaper, and thus used up time that could have been more profitably used in scrubbing their filthy kitchens and patching their husband's trousers; that they had little Christianity except that which they flaunted on dress parade; that they were indifferently good mothers and wives, and intermeddlers who neglected the duties God had created for them; and expressing doubt that the city could be circumscribed by such a pair of petticoats,—was held, in an action by one of them for libel, to be libelous per se. Street v. Johnson, 80 Wis. 455, 14 L.R.A. 203, 27 Am. St. Rep. 42, 50 N. W. 395.

In Henacre v. —, (1875) 1 Keble, 525, it was held that where one person said to another, "Your daughters are whores and play the whore for their silk gowns," one of the daughters could maintain an action therefor, the court saying: "When words are spoken in the plural number, all may bring actions; but when they are in the singular number . . . it hath been a doubt long controverted for the uncertainty." This is the earliest case, and is one of the few that expressly refer to the distinction with respect to whether all or part of the members of a group are referred to.

One who publishes matter concerning a family in its collective capacity assumes the risk of its being libelous as to any member thereof; and such matter concerns a class of which any member can maintain an action for defamation of himself, personally, because the libel applies to each individual member, through the class, by the use, without discrimination, of the collective appellation. Fenstermaker v. Tribune Pub. Co. 12 Utah, 439, 13 Utah, 532, 35 L.R.A. 611, 43 Pac. 112, 45 Pac. 1097.

So, any member of a family, capable of maintaining an action, may sue, for slander, one uttering words imputing to them the crime of murder. Chandler v. Holloway, 4 Port. (Ala.) 17.

And the words, "Your boys stole my corn," spoken to a father, are slanderous per se, and will support an action for slander brought by one of the sons. Maybe v. Fisk, 42 Barb. 326.

A fortiori where a person says to another during a conversation concerning the latter's children, and one of them in particular, "Your children are thieves, and I can prove it," the child so mentioned in the conversation may maintain an action for slander. Gidney v. Blake, 11 Johns. 54.

A case in which the too rigid enforcement of technical rules of pleading led to a result that cannot be commended, in the light of later decisions, is Milligan v. Thorn, 6 Wend. 412, where it was held that a declaration in slander, alleging that the defendant said to plaintiff's father, "You have brought up your sons to break open letters and steal money out of them; they have broken open letters and stolen money out of them," was bad where it was not averred that the statement was made of and concerning the plaintiff, and of and concerning such sons, although it was averred in an antecedent part of the declaration that plaintiff was one of the sons.

One of three brothers cannot maintain an action of slander for words to the effect that one of them had stolen corn, unless he can be identified as the person of whom the words were spoken. Harvey v. Coffin, 5 Blackf. 566. Here again, as in the next case, reference is not made to all.

000; that said board being informed of the said application of Dr. Kells for an option, and of the said project of Curtis & Walmsley, then resolved that the real estate committee be authorized and directed to advertise for proposals to be submitted by the 1st of February, 1897, for the disposition of the property on Baronne, Common, and Dryades streets (exclusive of Tulane Hall), either for a lease thereof for ninety-nine years or by sale.

The answer further avers that notice of this resolution was communicated to Dr. Kells, but on December 18, 1896, a special informal meeting of said board was held to consider a proposition submitted in the name of Thomas Nicholson to lease said property for ninety-nine years at a rental of $10,000 per annum, payable in advance; that at said meeting Charles E. Fenner, the president, informed said board that his relative, Sam Henderson, Jr., was interested in said proposition, and that his son, Charles Payne Fenner, would also be interested therein; that said board then and there resolved that said Nicholson be informed that the proposed price and terms of payment were satisfactory, and instructed its committee to take no action until further instruction relative to the advertisement of the property; and that the said board, without notice to Dr. Kells and Curtis & Walmsley, and without advertising for proposals, according to its resolution, did, on March 11, 1897, by Charles E. Fenner, president, execute said lease to Nicholson of said property for the term of ninety-nine years from October 1, 1897, at an annual rental of $10,000, and gave immediate possession.

The answer further avers in substance that Charles E. Fenner, Sam Henderson, Jr., and Charles P. Fenner were members of the law partnership of Fenner, Henderson, & Fenner, and that the three were joint owners of an office building known as the "Medical Building," numbered 124 and 126 Baronne streets, and that, after Dr. Kells made his application for the option, as above stated, Sam Henderson, Jr., suggested to Charles E. Fenner a project to obtain a lease of said University property to said Henderson, Charles Payne Fenner, and Thomas Nicholson, John S. Rainey, and C. M. Soria for a term of ninety-nine years at an annual rental of $10,000; that said Charles E. Fenner immediately expressed approval of said project, and referred said Henderson to the chairman of the finance and real estate committee of said board for negotiation.

The answer further sets forth the subsequent transfer of the leased premises to the Tulane Improvement Company, organized by the said Nicholson, Henderson, Charles P. Fenner, John S. Rainey, and C. M. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Soria; that one third of the stock of the concern stood in the name of Henderson for the equal account of himself and Charles P. Fenner, and that in April, 1897, one third of this third, or one ninth of the whole, was transferred by Henderson to the wife of Charles E. Fenner, and was paid for out of her personal funds, but that said stock remained in the name of said Henderson for a long time thereafter. It is further charged in the answer that Walter C. Flower, a member of the board, in 1899 purchased the stock which had been issued to John S. Rainey for account of himself and C. M. Soria, and that subsequently Charles E. Fenner purchased at par $10,000 of bonds issued by said Tulane Improvement Company, and that Walter C. Flower purchased at par $30,000 of the same issue of bonds.

In connection with the Nicholson lease, it is charged that the board warranted the exemption of the property from all state, parochial, and municipal taxes for the whole term of the lease. The answer, however, contains an admission that all the property of the Tulane board is exempt from such taxation under the act of 1884.

The answer further avers that the board was charged with and had knowledge of the fact that its president and his relatives and partners owned the Medical Building; that it was to their common interest that the option sought by Dr. Kells with the view of erecting a rival building should not be granted.

The answer further charges that the action of the board in the premises was favoritism to the individual interests of a member of said board, to the prejudice of the interests of the University, contrary to the duty of said board, and was maladministration of the trusts with which said board was charged.

The answer further charged that Nicholson, the lessee, was a party interposed, to the knowledge of the president of the board.

It is further charged that the lease was in legal effect tantamount to a sale, and that the board had no power or authority to warrant the lessee and his assigns against taxation.

The answer contains other averments of matters subsequent to the lease that need not be now mentioned, and winds up with the charge that the actions and doings of the board relative to said lease "were against good morals and the policy of the law, injurious to the trust they were charged by law to administer, and were acts of maladministration, malversation, and unfaithfulness to duty on the part of said board, and on the part of several members of said board who participated in and consented to said actions and doings."

Act No. 94, p. 98, of Laws of 1890, authorized the Tulane board to lease, sell, and dispose of any part of or the whole of the immovable property transferred to it by the state, and to make title thereto: "Provided, that the price and terms of said transfer shall be first approved by the governor of the state."

In case of a sale or other disposition, the act provided that the full amount of the price should be reinvested in immovable property within the city of New Orleans, and, in case of a lease, that the rent received should be devoted exclusively to the purpose of the university. The board was also authorized, in its discretion, to demolish the old buildings, and to construct in their place buildings for commercial or other purposes.

In 1893 the board, having decided to remove the Tulane University to grounds on St. Charles avenue, purchased for that purpose, passed a resolution authorizing the real estate committee to sell all the property then occupied by the university (except the Tulane Hall) at not less than $150,000, or, including the janitor's house and Tulane Hall, at not less than $250,000. On May 9, 1895, the board passed a resolution authorizing a lease of the property (exclusive of Tulane Hall) for not less than $10,000 per annum. In June, 1895, Robinson & Underwood offered for said property $125,000, $25,000 cash, and the balance in ten equal payments, with 4 per cent interest. The board declined this offer, but authorized a sale for the price of $150,000, $25,000 cash, and the balance deferred payments, with 5 per cent interest, payable annually. In December 1895, Robinson & Underwood renewed their offer of $125,000, which was declined. In 1896, the property was placed in the hands of Curtis & Walmsley, real estate agents, for sale or long lease; but no results followed.

On December 11, 1896, at a meeting of the real estate committee, a letter of date December 5, 1896, written by C. Edmund Kells, Jr., and addressed to the board, was produced and considered. In this letter Dr. Kells applied for an option to purchase for a period of thirty days for the price of $150,000. The committee recommended to the board that it be vested with the power to grant the option asked by Dr. Kells on the 15th January next, if, in the meantime, no other desirable arrangements with regard to the property should have been developed. It seems that Curtis & Walmsley had a project on foot to lease the property for a term of ninety-nine years upon a valuation of $200,000, at 5 per cent per annum. At the same meeting of the board a letter from Dr. Kells was read, to the effect that he had plans of his proposed building drawn, an estimate of the cost of the same made, and that the time to lay the matter before the people he wished to interest in the matter was propitious. The letter concludes as follows: "$150,000 is no small sum to raise, you know, and that much now is preferable to more in the far distant future."

After a lengthy discussion, a resolution was passed, directing the real estate committee to advertise for proposals for the lease for ninety-nine years, or for the sale of the property, to be submitted by February 1, 1897. On December 15, 1896, Dr. Kells was notified by the secretary of this action of the board.

On December 18, 1896, an informal meeting of the board was called to consider the proposition of Thomas Nicholson to lease the property for ninety-nine years at an annual rental of $10,000, payable in advance, the contract to contain the usual clauses in leases of ninety-nine years used in Chicago and other cities.

The minutes contain the following recital:

"Judge Fenner also said that Mr. Sam Henderson, Jr., his relative and partner, being interested in the proposition for lease of the Old University Building, that was to be submitted at this meeting from Thos. Nicholson, he desired his position well defined in the matter, and would like the board to allow him not to take part in the deliberations, and to retire.

"A general discussion followed, and it was the sense of the meeting that there was no impropriety in Judge Fenner presiding at the meeting."

A motion to that effect was put and unanimously carried.

After discussion, a resolution was adopted that Nicholson be informed that the board was satisfied with the price offered and the term of payment, and that, if the other details could be satisfactorily arranged and the consent of the governor obtained, the board would be ready to conclude the contract. The lease was drafted, and was approved at a meeting of the board held on January 28, 1897. It was finally executed and approved by the governor of the state on March 11, 1897.

The fact that the property greatly enhanced in value in subsequent years has nothing to do with the case, beyond tending to show a want of prophetic foresight in the board of administrators.

The published articles charged, to use the language of defendants' counsel: "That the board of administrators had been unfaithful to their trust; that, in violation of their duty to Tulane University, (they) had so disposed of the property held by them in trust, as to injure the university to the advantage of the president of the board, his relative and partners."

The gravamen of the charge is official favoritism, and misconduct to the prejudice of the university.

In the first place, the evidence does not show that a more favorable disposition of the property could have been made at that particular time. There is nothing to show that Dr. Kells, if given an option, would have purchased the property for $150,000, or that such a sum was preferable to an assured revenue of $10,000 per annum. A large majority of the members of the board testified on the trial of this case that the Nicholson offer was the best the board had ever received, and that they all rejoiced at the consummation of this lease. The testimony of a number of independent witnesses acquainted with the facts tends to show that, at that time, the Nicholson lease was considered a good bargain for the board and a poor investment for the lessees. The real estate agents of the board had endeavored in vain to lease on the same terms, and the board had never been offered more than $125,000 for the property. At the time there was no proposition pending save the application of Dr. Kells for an option, and there was no assurance that he would have exercised the option if it had been granted to him. The most that can be said on the undisputed facts of the case is that the board committed an error of judgment in not holding on to the property. The governor, who approved the lease, certainly considered the price and terms as fair to the university.

The record shows that Judge Fenner informed the board that his relative and partner, Mr. Henderson, had an interest in the lease. On the trial of the case the secretary and Judge Fenner testified that the latter also said that his son would have or probably have an interest in the lease. There was nothing in the statements of Judge Fenner to indicate to the board that their fellow member and presiding officer had any personal interest whatever in the transaction. A charge of favoritism to a particular individual necessarily implies actual knowledge of his interest in the subject-matter. Now, the evidence in the case is to the effect that Judge Fenner had no personal interest in the lease to Nicholson. That Judge Fenner and his wife subsequently acquired an interest in the subject-matter in no manner affects the bona fides of the members of the board who voted to accept the proposition made by Thomas Nicholson. The most that can be said on the evidence is that Judge Fenner, being the part owner of an office building across the street, had an interest in preventing the erection of a similar building on the Tulane property. There is 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) no evidence that such collateral interest, if known to, influenced, any of the members of the board.

On the whole case, we are clearly of opinion that the plea of justification tendered by the defendants has not been sustained by the evidence.

The charge that the board has been guilty of maladministration in not seeking to annul said lease and to recover the property assumes the invalidity of the lease,—a question which cannot be determined in this suit for want of proper parties, if for no other reason. We express no opinion as to the validity of the lease. The question in this case relates to the motives of the members of the board, and not to the legality of the corporate action. The evidence fails to show that the members of the board acted from improper motives, as charged in the libel.

The Boston Herald retracted the offensive article and apologized. The defendants published the retraction, but have continued to affirm the truth of the charges made in said article.

Malice on the part of a publisher of statements selected from other journals that are injurious to the reputation or character of private individuals or public officials is conclusively inferred, if the communications are false in fact. Fitzpatrick v. Daily States Pub. Co. 48 La. Ann. 1135, 20 So. 173. The animus of the publisher affects only the question of damages; and, where no special damages are proven, plaintiff is entitled to such damages on account of injured feeling as must unavoidably be inferred from such a libel. Id.

The freedom of the press consists in the right to print without any previous license, but subject to responsibility therefor to the same extent that anyone else could be responsible for the publication. 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 406.

The privilege of fair and reasonable criticism of public men does not embrace the right to publish false statements of fact, or to falsely impute to them malfeasance or misconduct in office. 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 402, 403.

That the plaintiff was not named, and that the defendants did not even know that he was a member of the board, is no legal excuse, but may be considered as a mitigating circumstance. The libel not only assailed the corporate action of the board, but impeached the integrity of every individual member who participated in the proceedings.

The wholesale charge of official favoritism and misconduct pointed to all the members of the board who participated in the proceedings. These gentlemen were citizens of more or less prominence in the community,

And their official connection with the Tulane University was well known. It is manifest that the plaintiff, although not named in the libelous publication, was necessarily one of its objects, and it must have been so understood by those who knew that he was a member of the board. 25 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 352, 362, 363.

The evidence shows no actual malice on the part of the defendant, and no special damages sustained by the plaintiff, but the latter is entitled, at least, to nominal damages.

Assuming that the plaintiff is seeking the vindication of his good name rather than to enrich himself at the expense of the defendants, we fix the damages in the sum of $50.

It is therefore ordered that the verdict and judgment below be reversed, and it is now ordered that the plaintiff, John B. Levert, do have and recover of the Daily States Publishing Company, Limited, W. C. Chevis, and Robert Ewing, in solido, the full sum of $50, with legal interest from this date, and costs of suit in both courts.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

STATE OF MAINE

v.

PANIEL KAPICKSKI.

(— Me. —, 73 Atl. 830.)

Indictment — continuing offense — proof.

1. To secure a conviction under an indictment for maintaining a common nuisance in a place of resort where intoxicating liquors are dispensed between certain dates, it is not necessary for the state to show that the place was used for such purposes during the entire period named in the indictment.

Intoxicating liquor — social club — nuisance.

2. An unlicensed social club which distributes among its members, to be consumed upon the premises, intoxicating liquors from a stock which had been bought in common by them, is a common nuisance under a statute providing that all places of resort where intoxicating liquors are kept, sold, given away, drunk, or dispensed in any manner not provided by law are common nuisances.

(February 10, 1909.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Androscoggin County, made during the trial of an indictment charging him with maintaining a common nuisance. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George S. McCarty, for defendant:

In order to find the defendant guilty of maintaining a common nuisance, the jury must find that the place mentioned in the indictment had been habitually, commonly used for the purpose.

State v. O'Conner, 49 Me. 594; 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 59; Com. v. McCulloch, 15 Mass. 227; Com. v. Tubbs, 1 Cush. 3; Com. v. Davis, 11 Pick. 432; State v. Stanley, 84 Me. 561, 24 Atl. 983; State v. McIntosh, 98 Me. 401, 57 Atl. 83.

Mr. Frank A. Morey for the State.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an indictment against the defendant under § 1 of chapter 22 of the Revised Statutes, for maintaining a common nuisance from the 1st day of May, 1908, to the day of the finding of the indictment at the September term, 1908, of court in Androscoggin county. It is alleged that "the defendant kept and maintained a certain tenement as a place of resort where intoxicating liquors were unlawfully kept, sold, given away, drunk, and dispensed in a manner not provided for by law."

The defendant was one of 204 members of the St. Bartholomew Society, occupying the premises mentioned in the indictment. The society had occupied the premises from April, 1908, to the time of the trial of the case, in September. The premises consisted of one large lodge room, a billiard room, and a small "barroom," so called, in connection with the latter. The society itself was regularly organized, having a constitution and by-laws, and from the dues assessed to the members sick and death benefits were paid. The billiard room was open practically all of the time for the recreation of the members. The defendant claimed that the barroom was open three times each week, and that at these times cigars and nonintoxicating drinks were sold to the members; the profits of the sales being devoted to the payment of rent, lights, heat, and other expenses incident to the running of the rooms. A member of the society acted as janitor and keeper of the barroom, each in turn for two weeks, and without compensation.

Note. — The above case, with others, was cited in the case note to Manning v. Canon City, ante, 192, where a reference will be found to notes covering the prior cases upon the question of the applicability of liquor laws to social clubs dispensing intoxicating liquors to their members,

The state introduced evidence tending to prove that, on two separate occasions during the time mentioned in the indictment, intoxicating liquors were sold upon the premises by the respondent. The first occasion was on the evening of August 29th, when the officers, looking through a window, saw the defendant making numerous sales of what they claimed to have been ale. The other occasion, that of September 5th, when the officers, looking through a hole in the curtain overhanging this same window, saw the respondent making sales of beer alleged to be intoxicating, and, later in the evening, searched the premises and found the beer, which proved upon analysis to contain sufficient alcohol to be in fact intoxicating. The defendant claimed that the beer seized was bought in common by the members of the society in anticipation of Labor Day, September 7th; each contributing a certain amount, for which he was to receive his proportionate part of the beer. It was in evidence that some of the members began to drink their allowance during the afternoon of September 5th, and that the drinking continued and was in progress from that time to the time of the seizure, late in the afternoon.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the case comes to this court on exceptions to certain instructions to the jury, given in the charge of the presiding justice.

It is provided by § 1 of chapter 22 of the Revised Statutes that "all places used . . . for the illegal sale or keeping of intoxicating liquors . . . [and] all houses, shops, or places where intoxicating liquors are sold for tipling purposes, and all places of resort where intoxicating liquors are kept, sold, given away, drunk, or dispensed in any manner not provided for by law, are common nuisances."

It was obviously the intention of the legislature by this enactment to declare all places to be common nuisances whenever they should, commonly and habitually, be used for the illegal sale or keeping of intoxicating liquors, and also whenever commonly and habitually used as places of resort where such liquors are "given away, drunk, or dispensed in any manner not provided for by law." State v. McIntosh, 98 Me. 397, 57 Atl. 83; State v. Stanley, 84 Me. 555, 24 Atl. 983.

But it is not incumbent upon the state to show that the place was used for such unlawful purposes during the entire period named in the indictment. Proof that the defendant kept and maintained a tenement for any one of such purposes during any part of the time comprised within the days named in the indictment will warrant a conviction. Com. v. Mitchell, 115 Mass. 141, and cases 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cited. In Com. v. Gallagher, 1 Allen, 592, the defendants erected a temporary tent or booth, constructed of boards, and covered with cloth, and on the following day had there several kinds of intoxicating liquors, and, between the hours of 9 and 11 o'clock in the forenoon, made four or more sales of such liquors. The land on which the booth was erected was hired for three days; but the booth was torn down by the officers at 11 o'clock of the first day. The defendants were found guilty of maintaining a common nuisance. In the opinion the court says: "The evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury in convicting the defendants. A disturbance of the public peace by the assembly of noisy and dissolute persons, the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, and other similar acts which tend to make disorder and injure public morals, and thus to create a common nuisance in a house or tenement, may be proved to have occurred in the course of a few hours, as well as during a number of days, a week, or a month. It is the nature of the acts done, not the length of time during which they are committed, that constitutes the offense."

In the case at bar the presiding justice correctly defined the word "resort," and sufficiently explained the meaning of the phrase "place of resort," as employed in the statute. The following instruction was then given to the jury:

"All places of resort where liquors are 'given away,' and again, all places of resort where liquors are 'drunk,' even if they are not 'sold' or 'given away,' if it is a place of resort under the definition I have given you, and, when there, those men drank the liquor which is intoxicating, that makes it a nuisance under the laws of this state."

In further defining what constitutes a "nuisance" under the law, the presiding justice used the following quotation in instructing the jury, viz.:

"Among other things, the legislature has said, and it applies to this case, that any place of resort where intoxicating liquors are kept, sold, given away, drunk, or dispensed in any manner not provided for by law, is a nuisance; any place that is resorted to—that is, a place of resort—for the mere purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors is a nuisance; any place of resort where liquors are illegally kept is a nuisance; any place of resort where liquors are given away is a nuisance. It must be a place of resort, and then the statute goes on to say that any person keeping or maintaining such a place shall be found guilty and be punished therefor.

"In this case the state says that between the 1st day of May last, and the day of the finding of this indictment, at some time between those dates, this place described here, the tenement, and so forth, was a place contrary to the form of this statute,—a place of resort; and that at that place of resort, at some time during this space of time, liquors were kept, sold, given away, drunk, or dispensed in some manner not provided by law. The state need not prove that this place was so kept and used during the whole of that time. The case is made out, the offense is committed, if for a single day between those dates that place was so used. Nay, if for a single hour in the day it was so used; for that hour it was a common nuisance, and whoever for that hour maintained the place was guilty of keeping and maintaining a common nuisance.

"It makes no difference, you see, under this statute, whether the men were joined as a club, and chipped in in advance, contributed their 16 cents and bought this liquor and paid for it and had it come, if when it came there it was drunk there on the premises resorted to, that would be no defense whatever."

To these instructions the defendant has exceptions; but it will be observed upon examination of the language used that it is, for the most part, essentially a restatement of the terms of the statute, and that the comments of the presiding justice, as well as the paragraphs quoted by him, are in entire harmony with the previous rulings and decisions of this court, as well as the authorities cited from Massachusetts, and are obviously a correct interpretation of the true meaning and purpose of the statute.

In support of the last paragraph of the instructions to which exceptions were taken, that "it makes no difference under this statute whether the men were joined as a club, and chipped in in advance and bought the liquor, if when it came there it was drunk on the premises resorted to," the case of Com. v. Baker, 152 Mass. 337, 25 N. E. 718, may be cited as an authority. That was an indictment for maintaining a nuisance under the Massachusetts statute of 1887 (chap. 206, § 1, which provided that "all buildings or places used by clubs for the purpose of selling, distributing, or dispensing intoxicating liquors to their members or others shall be deemed common nuisances." In the opinion the court says: "A place would be equally a nuisance under the statute if used by a club either to sell intoxicating liquor to its members, or to distribute among its members, intoxicating liquor owned by them in common, or to procure for and dispense to its members intoxicating liquor which was bought for and belonged to them individually. If the club, by its agent, purchased and stored intoxicating liquors for its members, and dealt out in portions to each member, upon his order, the liquor belonging to and kept for him, and kept the place for that purpose, the place was a common nuisance under the statute."

Finally, the defendant's counsel requested the following instructions: "In order to find the respondent guilty of maintaining a common nuisance, the jury must find that the place mentioned in the indictment must have been habitually, commonly used for the purpose."

The presiding justice gave this instruction in the following language: "This is the law of the state; but there is no limit as to the time, as I have stated to you. A nuisance may be maintained and kept in two hours or two weeks or two days if you find the facts are sufficient.

It has already been seen that this instruction respecting the length of time during which it must appear that the nuisance was maintained in order to warrant a conviction is directly and fully supported by Com. v. Gallagher, 1 Allen, 592, above cited.

It is, accordingly, the opinion of the court that, when all of the instructions to which exceptions were taken are considered in their proper relation to the entire charge, and applied to the facts in evidence in this case, no exceptionable error is disclosed.

The certificate must therefore be: Exceptions overruled.

Criminal law — photographing and measuring prisoner — validity.

1. The photographing and measuring before trial for purposes of identification by the Bertillon system of one arrested on a criminal charge does not violate any of his constitutional rights if the photograph is not to be placed in the rogues' gallery, or the means of identification distributed prior to his conviction, unless he becomes a fugitive from justice.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City dissolving a preliminary injunction theretofore issued by it in a suit to restrain the police authorities of Baltimore City from photographing and measuring plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Harry B. Wolf for appellant.

Mr. Alonzo L. Miles, for appellees:

In the discharge of their duties as police officers and detectives, defendants have an absolute right to photograph and measure any person who may have been arrested for a felony, if there are reasonable grounds to believe that he was guilty of the charge upon which he was arrested.

Mr. Luther Eugene Mackall also for appellees.

Schmucker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case was taken from an order of the circuit court of Baltimore city dissolving a preliminary injunction theretofore issued by it. The injunction had been issued upon the filing of a bill of complaint, to restrain the police authorities of Baltimore city from photographing and measuring the appellant, who had been arrested and was detained by them upon a charge of embezzlement of public funds of the city. The defendant, having answered cided since the preparation of the earlier note.

In People ex rel. Gow v. Bingham, 57 Misc. 66, 107 N. Y. Supp. 1011, it was held that the acts of police officers in requiring a man to submit to having his photograph taken and measurements and impressions of his body made, for the purpose of preserving them in the criminal records of the department, simply because such person had been indicted charged with a criminal offense, were unlawful, being violative of the natural rights of the person, and not authorized by the provisions of the city charter, which made it the duty of the police to "especially preserve the public peace, prevent crime, and detect and arrest offenders," and which required the police commissioner to "make such rules, orders, and regulations" as may be reasonably necessary to effect the prompt and efficient exercise of all powers conferred upon him by law; nor were they authorized by a provision of the penal Code which required that, upon the determination of a criminal action in favor of the defendant, the police authorities should turn over to him all photographs, proofs, plates, etc., taken by the authorities while the action or proceedings were pending.

It was held, however, that the plaintiff had mistaken his remedy in instituting an action for mandamus to compel the authorities to turn over to him such photographs, records, etc., to be destroyed, as in the absence of special statutory authority a writ of mandamus lies only to compel one to do what ought to be done in the discharge of a public duty, and not to undo what is improperly done, even though it may have been done under the color of performance of public duty.

But in Mabry v. Kettering, 89 Ark. 551, 117 S. W. 746, it was held that public off-cers charged with the enforcement of criminal laws and having in their custody individuals charged with crime may use photographs for the purpose of identifying the individual accused; and the court ordered dissolved a temporary injunction restraining the defendant police officers from developing certain photographs of the plaintiff taken while under arrest. The court said that no question of the "right of privacy" was involved, nor was the question presented whether or not the officers in charge of the prisoner should be restrained from compelling him to submit to having his photograph taken. A demurrer to the complaint having been sustained, the plaintiff appealed again to the supreme court ([Ark.] 122 S. W. 115), and the court reasserted its former views, and said that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction without showing specifically that the photographs were to be used in an improper way. As to the allegation that the photographs were to be placed in the "rogues' gallery," the court said: "It is true that it is alleged in the complaint that the photographs were taken by the defendants for the avowed purpose of developing said plates into photographs, as these plaintiffs believe and allege, for the purpose of having said photographs placed in what is known as the 'rogues' gallery,'" but they fail to state what the rogues' gallery consists of, and we cannot take judicial cognizance thereof. For aught we know to the contrary, it may be some legitimate method of identification of criminals or those charged with crime; and we have held that the photographs of accused persons may be used for such purpose." This judicial ignorance as to the meaning of the term "rogues' gallery" is somewhat surprising.

the bill, made a motion to dissolve the injunction. The motion was heard upon bill and answer, and the order dissolving the injunction was passed, and the appeal taken therefrom.

The substantial allegations of the bill are as follows: On March 30, 1909, the plaintiff, William F. Downs, who had for some years theretofore been a clerk in the office of the city register, was arrested by a city detective upon complaint of the register, and locked up at the Central Police Station on the charge of embezzling $1,000 of the money of the city. The police authorities were about to put Downs through the Bertillon system, consisting in part of having his photograph taken, the measurement of his head, height, age, color, and pedigree, together with his finger prints, in order that the record thereof might be preserved for the use of the police department, and it was their intention to take his photograph immediately after his preliminary hearing before the magistrate, and before his trial upon the charge of embezzlement. It is also alleged that there is a rogues' gallery in connection with the police department of the city, where are kept the pictures and photographs of criminals and notoriously bad men who have been tried and convicted of various offenses in different jurisdictions, and that it was the custom of the police authorities to take the photographs of persons arrested for any violations of law; but it does not allege the existence of a custom to put the photographs of unconvicted persons in the rogues' gallery, or charge the defendants with a purpose to put Downs's picture there, but only with an intention to preserve it for the use of the department. It is further alleged that Downs, up until his arrest, enjoyed the confidence and esteem of his employer and associates, and that he will be irreparably injured if the police authorities are permitted to carry out their contemplated acts, which it is charged would constitute a violation of his personal liberty and constitutional rights, and that he is without adequate remedy at law. The appellees, as defendants below, answered the bill, admitting the facts of the arrest and detention of Downs upon the charge of embezzling the public moneys, and that, prior to the issue of the injunction, it had been their purpose to take his photograph, in order to enable them to identify him if it became necessary in any criminal proceeding then pending against him, or that might thereafter be instituted against him. They also admit the conducting by them of a bureau of identification under the superintendence of a lieutenant of police on the Bertillon system, in connection with which they photograph persons arrested for felony or other crimes of the character charged against the plaintiff. And they further say that the practice of photographing and measuring persons so charged prevails in every large city of the country where proper police regulations are well established and enforced; and that, when a prisoner is arrested, charged with a crime of the character charged against the plaintiff, who may be released upon bail, it is necessary, to the proper enforcement of police regulations and the securing of the prisoner for trial, that a full description of him should be had in order that, if he should undertake to become a fugitive from justice, the police and detective department may be in possession of such information as will enable them to have him identified, wherever he may be found; that the defendants are required, in the proper discharge of their duties, to run down and arrest offenders who may escape after having been released on bail; and that, if they are not permitted to provide efficient means of identification of persons charged with offenses, their efforts in that direction will become ineffectual and unavailing. Further answering, they say that it is not their practice to publish the photograph of a prisoner who has been arrested upon the first offense, or to place it among the photographs of well-known and established criminals, until and unless the prisoner whose photograph has been taken has either been convicted, or has undertaken to escape and avoid the payment of his bail; and that such was not their purpose with reference to the plaintiff. It is also averred in the answer that, since the filing of the bill, Downs had been admitted to bail in the sum of $10,000, but that subsequently, upon investigation, it was discovered that his alleged embezzlements were of such larger proportions than were disclosed by the testimony taken at the hearing on the first charge, and his crime was of such greater magnitude, that he was rearrested, and was, at the time of the filing of the answer, confined in a cell at the Central Police Station.

The issue presented for our consideration is the propriety of the dissolution of the injunction upon the case made by the bill and answer. Without stopping to consider whether the appellant had an adequate remedy at law for any invasion, if such there should be, of his personal rights, we will devote our attention to the substantial issue presented by the record. The precise question there presented for our determination is whether the police authorities of Baltimore city may lawfully provide themselves, for the use of their department of the city government, with the means of identification of a person arrested by them upon a charge of felony, but not yet tried or convicted, by photographing and measuring him

Same — bargain sale — violence of customers.

2. A merchant is not liable for injury to a customer who is pushed down a stairway by the violence of a crowd which is attracted to the store by a bargain sale.

(June 3, 1909.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

Statement by Amidon, District Judge:

This is an action for personal injury. The plaintiff in error, the defendant below, is the owner of the Five and Ten Cent Store at Minneapolis. The store room is 44 feet wide and 127 feet deep, and extends east and west, fronting on Nicollet avenue. It advertised a special sale of granite ware, which attracted a large crowd, and among them the plaintiff. The counter at which this ware was sold was a long wall counter on the north side of the store, and situated a little to the west of the center. In front of it was a broad aisle extending the entire length of the store. To the west, and separated from this counter 2 or 3 feet, was a small counter, immediately back of which was an open stairway leading to the basement. The counter served to protect the stairway on the south side. On the east side it was protected by a railing, and on the north side by the wall of the building. A short distance back of this counter and the stairway was the partition of a private toilet room for the employees. Between this partition and the end of the counter was an aisle leading to the stairway. The entrance to the stairway was guarded by a gate, which was open at the time of the accident. The store was well lighted by windows, and also by arc lights, one of which was situated about 11 feet from the stairway. The basement was used only for storing goods, and not for their sale. The aisle leading to the head of the stairs was for the use of employes, and patrons had no occasion to enter it. At the time of the accident a clerk was standing on the long counter above referred to, handing out goods to purchasers, who were required to approach him with the correct change for their purchases in their hands. The crowd became violent. Some of the women fainted, and others clambered on the counter. So great was the crush that the plaintiff was pushed past the man on the counter. She claims that she was crowded along down the aisle past the small counter, and then into the side aisle between it and the partition. Plaintiff, all the time that she was moving along, claims to have had her eyes on the clerk, and was hoping to attract his notice. But she says that she was pushed sidewise or backwards, head foremost, down the stairs. The negligence charged in the complaint is the unguarded stairway, and the permitting of a large and violent crowd to assemble on the store premises. A motion for a directed verdict was made by the defendant at the conclusion of the evidence, and denied. The case was then submitted to the jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for $500. The denial of the motion for a directed verdict is the chief error assigned in this court.

Argued before Hook, Circuit Judge, and River and Amidon, District Judges.

Messrs. Arthur M. Keith, Charles T. Thompson, and Edwin K. Fairchild, for plaintiff in error:

The duty to exercise reasonable care with respect to the condition of the premises to which people are invited is confined to those parts and places of an establishment to which the invitation extends.

The absence of a guard at the top of the stairway was not the proximate cause of the injuries received by the defendant in error.

Amidon, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion should have been granted. It was not negligent to maintain the open stairway. It was separated from the part of the store to which patrons were invited or accustomed to resort. Indeed, if it had been situated in a portion of the room used by the public, that would not have constituted negligence. Important retail establishments are now accustomed to occupy several stories of the building in which their business is carried on. Open stairways leading from one story to another are a part of the ordinary equipment of such premises. Even when elevators are provided, there is usually a stairway adjacent to the shaft, and there are frequently other stairways in such rooms. Such stairways are closed on three sides, as was the one in this case; but the entrance is left open. Any other arrangement would be manifestly impracticable, and defeat the very object which the stairways are designed to accomplish. Such open stairways being an ordinary feature of store premises, the public, when resorting there, assume the risk arising therefrom, and are bound to protect themselves by the use of their eyes against such dangers. Mr. Justice Holmes, then speaking as chief justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, states the rule applicable to such a situation as follows, in Hunnewell v. Haskell, 174 Mass. 557, 55 N. E. 320: "There is no duty on the part of a shopkeeper to give warning of the presence of an ordinary flight of stairs in broad daylight, or to guard the necessary access to it, even if there is a crowd in his shop. The sides of the opening were guarded. Everyone who is on an upper story knows that there probably are stairs from it somewhere, and must look out for them. . . . The case is different from that of a hole in the floor which commonly is covered, and which is of a kind not to be expected."

See also Dunn v. Kemp, 36 Wash. 183, 78 Pac. 782.

The crowd on the present occasion seems to have been somewhat more violent than usual. Still such crowds are often found in large stores at the time of special sales, and during holiday seasons. They are an unavoidable feature of mercantile life in large cities. The defendant, on the occasion in question, had no reason to believe that such a sale as it was conducting would lead to any uncontrolled or violent conduct on the part of customers visiting the store, and was not therefore required to maintain its store in an unusual condition of safety to meet such an emergency. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

It had no reasonable cause to anticipate such violence, but, on the contrary, had a right to believe that patrons would demean themselves with a proper regard to others using the store. It was not, therefore, guilty of any negligence by reason of anything done by the crowd. In the excitement plaintiff seems to have lost her head and become wholly oblivious of her own safety or environment. She has met with an accident which is quite frequent, and there is nothing in this record justifying the shifting of her misfortune upon the defendant.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted.

CHARLES D. HARRINGTON, Appt.,
v.

WABASH RAILROAD COMPANY, Resp't.

(— Minn. —, 122 N. W. 14.)

Carrier — agent of shipper — package — contents — notice — nondelivery — damages.

Plaintiff gave to a local express company at a point in Missouri a crated sewing machine and a box for delivery to defendant carrier, to be by it transported to a point in Minnesota, and there delivered to a named consignee. The box was delivered to, accepted by, and receipted for by, defendant as books. Instead of containing books only, it actually contained a few books, and mis-

Headnote by JAGGARD, J.

Case Note. — Effect of misrepresentation as to character, quantity, or value of goods by shipper on his right to recover for loss.

This note is confined to cases in which the shipper intentionally or otherwise concealed either by silence or by direct misrepresentation, the true character, quantity, or value of the goods shipped, and, after loss, attempted to recover the real value of the goods. Cases are excluded where the decision turns merely upon the validity of a stipulation in the contract of carriage by which the carrier limits or attempts to limit its liability to a fixed or agreed valuation, regardless of the particular kind, quantity, or value of the goods. In many of the cases falling strictly within the scope of this note there is such a stipulation, but such cases only are taken as involve the effect of the acts of the shipper in not truly stating the character or value of the goods; cases involving the effect of the carrier's acts in putting such a stipulation into the contract of carriage have not been taken.

Cases dealing with the liability of the carrier for the loss of merchandise which is de-cellaneous articles of household goods and of personal effects. The value of the crated sewing machine was $50. The value of the books was $5. The tariff rate per hundred-weight fixed by defendant for books was 63 cents; for household goods and personal effects, 94½ cents. The articles shipped were lost through defendant's negligence. It is held:

(1) The local express company was plaintiff's agent for delivering the box for shipment, and for whatever usually and naturally belongs to the doing of it, and therefore for the giving of the information necessary to the shipment.

(2) In the absence of more definite information, the carrier had the right to accept the shipper's marks as to the contents of a package offered for transportation, and was not bound to inquire particularly about them in order to take advantage of a false classification.

(3) A neglect on the part of the shipper to disclose the true nature of the contents of a receptacle offered for transportation is conduct amounting to a fraud on the carrier, if there be anything in its form, dimensions, or outward appearance which is likely to throw the carrier off its guard, whether so designed or not. Intention to impose upon the carrier is not essential.

(4) Plaintiff's damages were properly limited to $55.

livered to it by a passenger as baggage have not been included, as such cases present a different question, although the liability of the carrier in such cases is frequently referred to the general rule that is discussed herein. The fact, however, that carriers are not, according to the general rule, required, under any circumstances, to carry merchandise as baggage, distinguishes this class of cases from those considered here.

The general rule is that, if a shipper is guilty of any fraud or imposition in respect to the carrier, as by concealing or misstating the value or nature of the article, or deludes the carrier by his own carelessness in treating the parcel as a thing of no value, he cannot hold the carrier liable for the loss of the goods beyond their apparent value, or the value as stated by him, as he has deprived the carrier of the compensation to which he was justly entitled, and caused him to relax his vigilance in carrying the goods. 5 Am. & Eng. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 459; Texas Exp. Co. v. Scott, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 50; Tily v. Morrice, Carth. 485.

The reason for the rule is thus stated in Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra: "If the shipper is guilty of fraud or imposition, by representing the nature or value of the articles, he destroys his claim to indemnity, because he has attempted to deprive the carrier of the right to be compensated in proportion to the value of the articles and the consequent risk assumed, and what he has done has tended to lessen the vigilance the carrier would otherwise have bestowed."

And in Earnest v. Southern Exp. Co. supra, it was held that where the shipper, to avoid paying the regular charges, had concealed the value of the package, and thereby thrown the carrier off his guard, and induced him to treat the package as of small value, it would be gross injustice to allow him to recover beyond what he had stated the value of the package to be. In this case he was allowed to recover the value which he had placed on the package, although it appeared that, had it not been for his misstatements, no loss at all would have ensued.

The same general rule was applied in The St. Cuthbert, supra, where valuable memorandum books were concealed in clothing and sent as "worn clothing;" in Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Collins, 77 Ga. 376, 4 Am. St. Rep. 87, 3 S. E. 416, and in Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shea, 66 Ill. 471, where clothing was inclosed in a bundle of bedding and sent as bedding; in Charleston & S. R. Co. v. Moore, 80 Ga. 522, 5 S. E. 769, where jewelry was inclosed in a package and sent as household goods; in Bottum v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 72 S. C. 376, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 773, 110 Am. St. Rep. 610, 51 S. E. 985, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 118, where a similar package of pictures was shipped as containing glass, and the liability of the carrier for the loss was held to be limited to for a less sum than was demanded in an action brought to recover damages for loss of certain goods while in defendant's possession for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Paul J. Thompson, for appellant:

As the mistake was innocently made, the shipper did not fraudulently misrepresent the contents of the box.

In the absence of more definite information, the carrier has the right to accept the shipper's marks as to the contents of a package offered for transportation, and is not bound to inquire particularly about them in order to take advantage of a false classification.

Bottum v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 72 S. C. 375, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 773, 110 Am. St.

the value of a package of glass; in Shackt v. Illinois C. R. Co. 94 Tenn. 658, 28 L.R.A. 176, 30 S. W. 742, where a quantity of silks, satins, laces, silver spoons, etc., was sent as household goods; in Relf v. Rapp, 3 Watts & S. 21, 37 Am. Dec. 528, where jewelry was sent in a package labeled "glass."

The same rule was applied in St. John v. Southern Exp. Co. supra, where the defendant was in ignorance of the value of the package, and in consequence failed to place it in the hands of a messenger known to be honest and trustworthy, who was uniformly employed to deliver valuable packages.

Where a shipper delivered a sealed package worth $234,000 to a carrier, and represented that its value was $1,000, and paid the charges for that value, it was held in United States Exp. Co. v. Koerner, 65 Minn. 540, 33 L.R.A. 600, 68 N. W. 181, that the liability of the express company was limited to carrying $1,000 worth of property; and consequently it was not entitled, in an action for further compensation, to recover on the theory that, in case of loss, the limit of its liability would be for failure to deliver the whole $234,000 worth.

One who ships his horse as an ordinary horse, knowing that a regulation of the carrier limits its liability in case of the loss of such animals to a certain sum, and requires extra compensation for transporting animals of greater value, thereby elects to treat his horse, for the purpose of transportation, as of no greater value than that fixed by the regulation, and he cannot, in case of loss, insist on a higher valuation. Duntley v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 N. H. 263, 9 L.R.A. 449, 49 Am. St. Rep. 610, 20 Atl. 327.

The ground for holding that a carrier is not liable for goods shipped under a wrongful classification was said, in Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Collins, supra, to be that there is no contract existing between the carrier and the shipper to carry other than those described in the bill of lading.

A carrier may accept the shipper's marks as to the contents of a package offered for transportation, and is not bound to inquire particularly about them, in order to take advantage of a false classification. Bottum v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 72 S. C. 375, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 773, 110 Am. St. Rep. 610, 51 S. E. 985, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 118.

In a number of cases the act of the shipper in concealing or misrepresenting the character or value of the goods has been held to be such a fraud as to invalidate the whole contract of carriage, and to release the carrier from any liability at all thereon, especially if the loss was directly traceable to the fact that the carrier was in ignorance of the true character or value of the goods. The decision in some of these cases may be influenced by the fact that the package lost, although containing valuable goods, was of no apparent value, but the language used by the court is apparently broad enough to sustain the rule as stated, and some of the cases so hold expressly.

Thus, in The Ionic, 5 Blatchf. 538, Fed. Cas. No. 7,059, it was held that where the shipper informed the captain of a vessel that he had nothing but clothing in his trunk, when in fact he had money, the carrier was not liable for the loss even of the clothing which the trunk contained; for, if the truth had been stated, the captain would have protected his vessel from responsibility for the loss by putting the trunk in a place of safety.

A constructive if not an actual fraud to obtain cheap rates of freight, which relieves the carrier from liability for loss of the goods, is shown where a man of intelligence ships in a basket with a rope around it, without making known its contents, a quantity of silks, satins, laces, curtains, silver spoons, and other valuable articles, most of which were for sale by his wife, in her business as a dressmaker and milliner, and remains silent when he hears the carrier's agent designating them as "household goods," the rate on which is very much less than that on merchandise. Shackt v. Illinois C. R. Co. supra. In this case no recovery at all was allowed the shipper, although it does not appear that the constructive fraud of the shipper in any way caused or tended to cause the loss.

So, in Hayes v. Wells, F. & Co. 23 Cal.

Rep. 610, 51 S. E. 985, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 118; Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Collins, 77 Ga. 376, 4 Am. St. Rep. 87, 3 S. E. 416.

• If a fraud is practised by the shipper upon a carrier by misleading the carrier as to the nature of the shipment, the contract of carriage is thereby made void, and the carrier will not be liable for the loss of the shipment; and neglect or failure to disclose the real value of a package and the nature of its contents is conduct amounting to a fraud upon the carrier.

185, 83 Am. Dec. 89, the court said that if any fraud or unfair concealment of value is used, the carrier will not be responsible for any loss, and it will make the contract between them null and void; and this rule applies to all cases of concealment or suppression of facts, and to all false statements made by the shipper for the purpose of misleading the carrier.

And in Southern Exp. Co. v. Everett, 37 Ga. 688, it was held that if the shipper so conducted himself as to induce the carrier to regard a box as of but little value, or if he intentionally concealed from the carrier the true value of the contents of the box, for the purpose of depriving him of his lawful freight therefor, such concealment by the shipper is, in law, a fraud upon the carrier, and releases him from liability.

And the Everett Case was cited with approval and followed in Southern Exp. Co. v. Wood, 98 Ga. 268, 25 S. E. 436, where it was held that conduct upon the part of the shipper which amounted to a concealment of the true character of the contents of the package constituted such a legal fraud upon the carrier as would in law discharge it from all liability as a carrier. And to the same general effect was the decision in Southern Exp. Co. v. Pope, 5 Ga. App. 689, 63 S. E. 809.

So, in Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Thompson, 19 Ill. 578, it was held that by suppressing and concealing the fact that a box contained bank bills in such a way as to deceive the carrier as to the true contents of the box, the shipper committed a fraud upon the defendant and made the contract void, for there could be no action where the plaintiff practised fraud and deceit. And this case was cited and followed in American Exp. Co. v. Perkins, 42 Ill. 458, where it was held that a carrier was not liable for injury to a wreath consisting partially of glass, where the carrier was not informed of the true contents of the package. To the same general effect was the decision in Pennsylvania Co. v. Kenwood Bridge Co. 170 Ill. 645, 49 N. E. 215, where the carrier accepted certain bridge iron which was of greater height than it was represented to be 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Charleston & S. R. Co. v. Moore, 80 Ga. 522, 5 S. E. 769; Southern Exp. Co. v. Wood, 98 Ga. 268, 25 S. E. 436; Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 627, 37 L. ed. 587, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 711; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shea, 66 Ill. 471; Warner v. Western Transp. Co. 5 Robt. 490.

Jaggard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and appellant gave to the St. Louis Express Company, at St. Louis, Missouri, one sewing machine, crated, and one box, for delivery to the defendant at said St. Louis, to be by it transported over its lines and the lines of its connecting carrier or carriers to Minneapolis, Minnesota, and there delivered to a named consignee. The

by the bridge company, and consequently was broken while passing through a river bridge.

And in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Burke, 55 Tex. 323, 40 Am. Rep. 808, it was held that where the shipper of valuable articles practises a fraud on the carrier, either by his acts or omissions fraudulently concealing the value of the article shipped, the carrier is discharged. And to the same effect was the decision in Pacific Exp. Co. v. Pitman, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 628, 71 S. W. 312.

Where the carrier gave notice that he would not be liable beyond a specified value unless the package was received at its true value and paid for accordingly, it was held in Izett v. Mountain, 4 East, 370, that he was not liable for any loss where a package above the stated value had been shipped without notice of its true value being given. And to the same effect were the decisions in Marsh v. Horne, 5 Barn. & C. 322, and Clay v. Willan, 1 H. Bl. 298.

The same rule was followed in Bradley v. Waterhouse, 3 Car. & P. 318, where money was sent done up in a package of tea; in Gibbon v. Paynton, 4 Burr. 2298, where money was concealed in a bag of nails; in Batson v. Donovan, 4 Barn. & Ald. 21, where bank notes were sent done up in an ordinary parcel.

In Sewall v. Allen, 6 Wend. 335, it was held that a steamboat company which was not a common carrier of packages of bank bills was not liable for the loss of such a package, intrusted to the master of one of their boats, where it appeared that he had been forbidden by his employers to carry money, and that the usage was for persons sending money to compensate the masters.

In the following cases it was held that, under the particular facts presented, the carrier would be liable for the actual value of the goods, although the general rule was not expressly denied:

That goods of more value than designated are packed in a box will not release the carrier if the more valuable things are not lost. Hyde v. New York & N. O. S. S. Co. 17 La. Ann. 29.

A wrongful classification of goods by a box was delivered to the defendant, and accepted by it for such shipment, as containing books, was receipted for as books, and was billed and given the rate fixed by the published tariff of the defendant for transportation of books. That box, instead of containing books, only actually contained a few books and many miscellaneous articles of household goods and of personal effects. The aggregate value of said shipment, including said sewing machine and attachments, at the point of shipment, was $175. The value of the sewing machine and attachments was $50, and the value of the books in the box was $5. In said tariff, the articles in the box bore the classification of household goods and personal effects, and carried a rate of 94½ cents per hundred-weight, instead of 63 cents per hundred weight, for books. The articles shipped were lost through what is, for present purposes, the admitted neglect of defendant. Neither the defendant nor any person or persons employed by or connected with it had, at any time before the same became lost and written claim was made by the plaintiff therefor, any knowledge, information, or belief that the said box contained anything more than books. The marking of said box as containing books was done by the said St. Louis Express Company, and without the knowledge of the said plaintiff, and without direction from him. The trial court found as a matter of fact "that plaintiff, through his agent, fraudulently misrepresented the contents of the package shipper, with a view to escape double rates, was held in Rice v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 3 Mo. App. 27, not to disable plaintiffs to maintain an action for the conversion of the goods. But it was held that the defendant was entitled to receive such double rates, and to be credited therefor.

Where a contract containing a stipulation limiting the liability of the carrier was void under a statute, it was held in Lucas v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 112 Iowa, 594, 84 N. W. 673, that, if fraud was practised by the plaintiff in order to secure a cheaper rate of freight, the defendant would not be bound by the rate given, but a void contract procured thereby could by no means lessen the carrier's liability.

No fraud or imposition can be predicated of the acts of a shipper in failing to disclose the contents of a package containing silver coin, where the very appearance of the package indicated that it was not merchandise, and it was addressed to well-known manufacturers of silver, and the carrier did not ask about the contents or value of the package. Gorham Mfg. Co. v. Fargo, 3 Jones & S. 434.

Where there is no agreement or contract as to any limitation on account of loss or damage by reason of any reduction of freight, it was held in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Levi, 18 Ohio C. C. 873, that a mere statement that the value is less than the actual value will not relieve the carrier for any loss or injury due to its own negligence.

If the defendants knew that parties emigrating like the plaintiff were in the habit of packing up valuable articles and money among their household wares, and from such knowledge might infer that this box of the plaintiff's might contain money, it was held in Kuter v. Michigan C. R. Co. 1 Biss. 35, Fed. Cas. No. 7,955, that it was their duty to make inquiry in order to relieve themselves from liability.

Where there was no intention to impose upon the carrier, and it was not claimed that greater diligence would have been used or a larger rate charged if the true character of the goods had been known, it was 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

held in Fassett v. Ruark, 3 La. Ann. 694, that the shipper might recover for the actual value of the goods lost.

Where the carrier did not inquire as to the value of the package and there was no fraud on the part of the shipper, the carrier is liable for the full amount of the loss. Levois v. Gale, 17 La. Ann. 302.

Where the plaintiff shipped certain negatives as "photo goods," and no inquiry or representation was made as to the value of the shipment, it was held in Southern P. R. Co. v. d'Arcais, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 57, 64 S. W. 813, that evidence that, if the true value of the goods had been known, the shipper would have been obliged to pay a higher rate of freight than he did, did not fairly raise an issue of fraud or concealment as to the character and value of the goods.

In Sleat v. Fagg, 5 Barn. & Ald. 342, it was held that the noncommunication of the contents of a package to the carrier, and the directing of it in such a way as to conceal its value, was not such a fraud as to relieve the carrier from liability for its loss, where the carrier sent it by another and more dangerous route than that by which it had contracted to send it. The court distinguished Batson v. Donovan, supra, upon the ground that, in the latter case, the loss was expressly due to the noncommunication of the value; for, had the actual value been made known, the carrier would have exercised greater care.

The question has arisen in a number of cases whether it is the duty of the shipper to reveal the value or the character of the goods; but the general rule is that, in the absence of any other acts on the part of the shipper, intended to deceive the carrier, mere silence as to character and value of the goods does not amount to fraud.

Thus, in New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Fraloff, 100 U. S. 24, 25 L. ed. 531, it was held that, in the absence of inquiry on the part of the carrier, and in the absence of conduct on the part of the shipper misleading the carrier, the court could not, as a matter of law, declare that the mere failure of the shipper, unasked, to disclose the value of his goods, was a fraud upon the containing all the household goods, except the sewing machine stating that they were books." Plaintiff was allowed $55, as damages.

1. The local express company was plaintiff's agent for delivery of the box for shipment and for whatever usually and naturally belonged to the doing of it. Mechem, Agency, § 284. This included the giving of the information necessary to such shipment. The plaintiff was therefore bound by the act of its agent in marking the box as containing books. Armstrong v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 53 Minn. 183, collecting cases at page 190, 54 N. W. 1059.

2. Plaintiff contends that the marking of the box, which was partially true, was a mistake only, and that the trial court was not justified in finding that the plaintiff, through his agent, misrepresented the contents of the box, and was guilty of fraud. It is, however, a settled rule of law that, in the absence of more definite information, the carrier has the right to accept the shipper's marks as to the contents of a package offered for transportation, and is not bound to inquire particularly about them in order to take advantage of a false classification. See Bottum v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 72 S. C. 375, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 773, 110 Am. St. Rep. 610, 51 S. E. 985, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 118, and Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Collins, 77 Ga. 376, 4 Am. St. Rep. 87, 3 S. E. 416. Fraud was made out, although intention to impose on the carrier was not shown. "Fraud may be as carrier which defeated all rights of recovery. And to the same effect was the decision in Muser v. American Exp. Co. 1 Fed. 382.

And in Titchburne v. White, 1 Strange, 145, it was held that a carrier was liable for the loss of a package containing money, where it had made no inquiry as to the contents of the package.

The carrier is bound to make the inquiry as to the value of the box or the articles delivered to him, and the owner must answer at his peril; and if such inquiries are not made, and the article is received for such price for transportation as is asked with reference to its bulk, weight, or external appearance, the carrier is responsible for the loss, whatever may be its value. Gorham Mfg. Co. v. Fargo, supra.

And in Phillips v. Earle, 8 Pick. 182, it was held that the shipper was under no obligations to state the value of the goods if he was not questioned concerning it, but if questions had been asked, any false answer would have been fraudulent and excused the carrier, and if there had been any concealment or deception, the same consequences would have followed. To the same effect was the decision in Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co. v. Bolles, 80 Ill. 473.

The mere failure to disclose the value of the goods is not fraud. G. C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clark, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 459; Texas Exp. Co. v. Scott, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 59.

But in Hayes v. Wells, F. & Co. 23 Cal. 185, 83 Am. Dec. 89, it was held that it was the duty of all persons employing a carrier to deliver letters containing matters of great value to inform the carrier of that fact, and it was not the duty of the carrier to make inquiries concerning the value of the letters delivered to them for carriage. And the Hayes Case was cited with approval and followed in White v. Postal Teleg. & Cable Co. 25 App. D. C. 364, 4 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 767, and in Gilman v. Postal Teleg. Co. 48 Misc. 372, 95 N. Y. Supp. 564, where bank bills were done up in a newspaper, and sent by a messenger 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) boy without any notice to the company of the value of the package.

And in Magnin v. Dinsmore, 62 N. Y. 35, 20 Am. Rep. 442, second appeal in 70 N. Y. 410, 26 Am. Rep. 608, the shipper sought to recover the value of a package of valuable watches and watchkeys, but failed to state the value to the carrier at the time of shipment, and the court accordingly held that the carrier's liability was controlled by the regulation of the company that, where the value was not stated, the liability would be limited to $50. The court said that, although there was no inquiry by the defendant as to the value of the goods, and no artifice to conceal the value or to deceive, the silence of the shipper was a fraud which discharged the carrier from liability beyond $50.

So, in Galt v. Adams Exp. Co. McArth. & M. 124, 48 Am. Rep. 742, it was held that the omission of the shipper to advise the carrier that the actual was greater than the apparent value of the articles shipped does not affect the shipper's rights unless it justifies the carrier in adopting the course of conduct by which the loss occurred.

In a few cases the liability of the carrier has been determined by statute.

Thus, under a statute which held that a common carrier of gold, silver, etc., is not liable for more than $50 for loss or injury of a package of any such articles unless he has notice of the nature of the freight, it was held in Scammon v. Wells, F. & Co. 84 Cal. 311, 24 Pac. 284, that the carrier was not liable beyond the value given by the shipper, although in fact the package was of much greater value.

And in Ocean S. S. Co. v. Way, 90 Ga. 747, 20 L.R.A. 123, 17 S. E. 57, it was held that fans and parasols made of delicate and expensive materials, and fragile in construction, and intended more for ornament than for use, were not clothing, and, under the Federal statute, the carrier was not liable for the loss of the same, unless notice of the value and character of the goods had been given.

effectually practised upon the carrier by silence as by a positive and express misrepresentation. A neglect or failure to disclose the real value of a package, and the nature of its contents, if there be any thing in its form, dimensions, or other outward appearance which is calculated to throw the carrier off his guard, whether so designed or not, will be conduct amounting to a fraud upon him. The intention to impose upon him is not material. It is enough if such is the practical effect of the conduct of the shipper; as, if a box or package, whether designedly or not, is so disguised as to cause it to resemble such a box or package as usually contains articles of little or no value, whereby the carrier is misled; for by such deception the carrier is thrown off his guard, and neglects to give to the package the care and attention which he would have given it, had he known its actual value." Hutchinson, Carr. 3d. ed. § 330. This rule was approved in Bottum v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 773 (72 S. C. 375, 110 Am. St. Rep. 610, 51 S. E. 985, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 118). It was there held that "a misdescription, without fraudulent intent, of a package of pictures as containing glass, in a shipment of household goods, will relieve the carrier from liability for their loss above the value of a package of glass, where the freight rate is much higher on pictures than on glass." And see cases collected at page 776. So, in Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Collins, supra, it was held that, "in an action against a railroad company for the loss of goods shipped by it, defendant's agent testified that, at the time of the shipment, plaintiff's husband, with whom the agreement for shipment was made, stated that, if the goods, were lost, the company would have to pay him $25. The court charged, in substance, that unless it appeared that both the husband and the agent had authority to make such valuation, and actually agreed upon it, it would not be binding upon plaintiff. Held, that the jury, in ascertaining the value of the goods, might properly consider such testimony, and that the charge withdrew it from their consideration and was erroneous." And see J. J. Douglas Co. v. Minnesota Transfer R. Co. 62 Minn. 288, 30 L.R.A. 860, 64 N. W. 899; Southern Exp. Co. v. Wood, 98 Ga. 268, 25 S. E. 436; Humphreys v. Perry, 148 U. S. 627, 37 L. ed. 587, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 711; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shea, 66 Ill. 471; Warner v. Western Transp. Co. 5 Robt. 490.

That in some of these cases there was knowledge on the part of the shipper that his goods were given a rate less than they should have been charged is not material, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) in view of absence of any necessity to show actual intention to defraud. As opposed, plaintiff refers us to Rice v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. 3 Mo. App. 27 (in which an instruction favorable to this position, given at the request of the railroad company, was affirmed on an appeal by the railroad company), and to Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Goetz & B. Mfg. Co. 51 Ill. App. 151. It is certain that the authorities rule this case for defendant. Plaintiff was properly limited in damages to the value of the crated machine and to the value of the books shipped.

NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

LUCIA NAJARIAN, Admr., etc., of Deckeran Najarian, Deceased,

v.

JERSEY CITY, HOBOKEN, & PATERSON STREET RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(— N. J. —, 73 Atl. 527.)

Street railway — accident to pedestrian — negligence — evidence — burden of proof.

1. In a suit brought against a street railroad company to recover for the death of a pedestrian in a street, caused by his being hit by the rear end of a car which left the track because of the "splitting" of a switch, proof of the happening of the acci-

Headnotes by TRENCHARD, J.

Case Note. — Liability for injury to person other than passenger or employee by derailment of street car.

The only case directly in point upon this question which a search has disclosed is Kelly v. United Traction Co. 88 App. Div. 234, 85 N. Y. Supp. 433. It there appeared that deceased, while engaged in laying brick upon a sidewalk, was killed by an electric car which ran off the track and against him; and it was held erroneous to charge the jury that "it was the duty of the defendant to have their car and its apparatus and the roadbed and the rails so constructed and applied that the car would stay on the tracks," since it wholly eliminated from the consideration of the jury the question of the degree of care which the railway company was required to exercise under the circumstances, and practically made it an insurer against injury caused by derailment, regardless of whether such derailment was caused by its negligence or otherwise.

Upon the question of the liability of a street railway company for defects in its tracks or in the street, see the note to Groves v. Louisville R. Co. 52 L.R.A. 448, dent is sufficient to charge the company with negligence, and to place upon it the burden of showing that the injuries resulting in death were not received through any fault on its part.

Trial — negligence — jury.

2. Where the happening of an accident is sufficient to charge a defendant with negligence, and where fair-minded men might honestly differ as to whether the defendant has sustained its burden of showing that the decedent's injuries were not received through any fault on its part, the question of defendant's negligence should be submitted to the jury.

Street railway — accident to pedestrian — contributory negligence.

3. A pedestrian, struck by a street car which left the track, is not guilty of contributory negligence because he was standing in the roadway, when it appears that he was sufficiently distant from the track for the car to have passed him in safety if it had remained upon the track.

(June 14, 1909.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hudson County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of her intestate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William D. Edwards and Edwin F. Smith, for plaintiff in error:

The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur does not apply.

Widmer v. West End Street R. Co. 158 Mass. 49, 32 N. E. 899.

The court should have directed a verdict for defendant upon request.

Alcott v. Public Service Corp. (N. J. L.) 71 Atl. 45.

Messrs. Hartshorne, Insley, & Leake, for defendant in error:

Plaintiff's intestate had a right to stand in the roadway of the street while waiting for the car to pass down the street before him.

Kathmeyer v. Mehl (N. J. L.) 60 Atl. 40.

The fact that the wheels of the car "split" the switch was sufficient, prima facie, to raise a presumption of negligence against the defendant, and the burden rested upon defendant to satisfy the jury that the accident did not happen by negligence of the defendant or its servants.

Bergen County Traction Co. v. Demarest. 62 N. J. L. 755, 72 Am. St. Rep. 685, 42 Atl. 729; Mumma v. Easton & A. R. Co. 73 N. J. L. 653, 65 Atl. 208.

Trenchard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On January 23, 1907, the plaintiff's intestate, Deckran Najarian, was struck and killed by a trolley car of the defendant 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

company. The accident occurred about 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening, and while it was dark. The decedent was walking westward on Angelica street (being on the north side of that street), and stopped, when he came to the corner of that street and Spring street, to allow the trolley car in question to pass before him. The car was going southward on Spring street. A switch was in the track on Spring street north of Angelica street, for the purpose at times of switching cars off eastward into the car barn on Angelica street. The tongue of this switch was usually kept "closed for Angelica street;" that is, it was ordinarily so set that cars traveling south on Spring street would pass over it, and continue southward through that street. The decedent stood in the roadway between the curb of Spring street and the trolley track. The front wheels of the car in question passed over the switch in safety, but the hind wheels took the switch into Angelica street, thereby throwing the rear of the car toward the curb on the east side of Spring street, and against the decedent, injuring him so that he died shortly after. This action was brought in the Hudson county circuit court by the administratrix of the decedent, to recover damages for his death. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and this writ of error brings up for review the judgment entered upon the verdict.

The defendant below assigns error upon the refusal of the trial judge to nonsuit the plaintiff and to direct a verdict for the defendant. We think the motions were properly refused. Both motions were grounded upon (1) want of evidence of negligence of the defendant company; and (2) the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's intestate. With respect to the negligence of the defendant company, we think there was evidence requiring the submission of that question to the jury. It was not necessary for the plaintiff, in order to make out a prima facie case, to prove the cause of the accident. All that she was required to do was to show the existence of negligence on the part of the defendant, which occasioned the injury resulting in death. This she did by proving that the rear of the car left the straight track upon which the front part of it was proceeding, so as to kill the plaintiff's intestate, who was standing in what was normally a place of safety. Ordinarily, proof of the occurrence of an accident will not, of itself, support a conclusion of the defendant's carelessness; but this principle is not of universal application. Where the accident is one which, in the ordinary course of events, would not have happened if proper care had been used by the defendant, res ipso loquitur. Bergen County Traction Co. v. Demarest, 62 N. J. L. 755, 72 Am. St. Rep. 685, 42 Atl. 729; Bahr v. Lombard, 53 N. J. L. 233, 21 Atl. 190, 23 Atl. 167; Sheridan v. Foley, 58 N. J. L. 230, 33 Atl. 484.

In Bergen County Traction Co. v. Demarest, supra, Chief Justice Gummere, speaking for this court, said: "In the ordinary operation of the defendant's railroad its cars would not have left the rails. It is a matter of common knowledge that the roadbed of a street railroad is so built, and the cars so constructed, that when there is no defect in either, and the cars are run with due care, the latter will remain upon the track; and consequently, proof of the derailment of a car, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, justifies the conclusion that it resulted either from improper construction, failure to keep in proper repair, or negligence in operation." In the present case it may likewise be said that common experience teaches that switches are so built, and cars so constructed, that when there is no defect in either, and the switches are prudently operated, and the cars are run with due care, the latter will pass over closed switches in safety. Therefore, proof of the "splitting" of the switch, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, justifies the conclusion that it resulted either from improper construction, failure to keep in proper repair, or negligence in operation of the car or switch, or both. If there were any facts inconsistent with negligence, it was for the defendant to prove them. The motion to nonsuit upon the ground of want of proof of the defendant's negligence was therefore properly denied. We think there was no conclusive rebuttal of such presumption of negligence established by the defendant.

We have pointed out that the switch, the "splitting" of which caused the accident, was supposed to be kept set so that cars would pass over it down Spring street. The front wheels passed safely, but the rear wheels took the switch into Angelica street. Immediately after the accident, and before the car was moved, the tongue of the switch was found "open for Angelica street;" that is, so placed that a car going southward on Spring street would be turned by the tongue of the switch into Angelica street. This movable tongue of the switch (which, according as it is "closed" or "opened," keeps the wheels of the car upon the main track, or shunts them off upon the switch) is 6 feet 9 inches long. It rests in a pocket, and is pivoted at the large end with a pin. The other end or point of the tongue is the part which is moved from right to left for the purpose of opening or closing the switch. The defendant attempted to overcome the presumption of negligence by showing that the switch was of standard type and in good working order. But the testimony shows that the tongue was considerably worn at the point. Moreover, the accident may well have happened from the failure of the defendant's servant to completely close the switch; that is, from his failure to move the point of the tongue until it was in actual contact with the rail of the main track. If it was not so completely closed, the forward wheels might well have passed over, and the rear wheels have taken, the switch, on account of the natural swing of the car from side to side from time to time. The testimony shows that, had the switch been properly closed, it could not have been forced open by the motion of the car wheels in running over it, unless the tongue was defectively loose at the pivot. The motorman says that as he went over the switch, he noticed that it was "set straight to go right on to Spring street." Whether his conclusion was correct, or his inspection imperfect, was, in view of the fact that the switch was found open immediately after the accident, a matter about which fair-minded men might honestly differ. The negligence of the defendant being a jury question, motion for a direction of a verdict upon the ground of want of proof of the defendant's negligence was properly refused.

With respect to the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate, counsel has not pointed out, nor do we perceive, in what respect he was negligent. He was about to cross Spring street, when he saw the car approaching, and stopped, evidently to allow it to pass. He had the right to stand in the roadway of the street where he was standing, while waiting for the car to pass down the street before him. He had no reason to suppose that the forward end of the car would keep on the track and the rear end take the switch, and so make the spot where he stood a place of danger. Kathmeyer v. Mehl (N. J. L.) 60 Atl. 40. The alleged contributory negligence of the deceased was therefore at least a jury question, and the motions to nonsuit and direct a verdict upon that ground were properly refused.

The result is that the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

C. ADELBERT BECKER et al. Appts.,

v.

MAGGIE MCCREA, Appt.,

And

ANNIE BREVOORT EDDY et al., Impleaded, etc., Respts.

(193 N. Y. 423, 86 N. E. 463.)

Limitation of action — redemption from mortgage — possession.

A mortgagee who, with the consent of the mortgagor, takes possession of the property after a judgment of foreclosure, without sale, does not, while merely holding and enjoying the property as his own, hold adversely, within the meaning of a statute giving a right to redeem unless the mortgagee has maintained an adverse possession for twenty years.

(November 17, 1908.)

Case Note. — Is possession of a mortgagee who enters under incomplete or defective foreclosure adverse to mortgagor.

Whether a mortgage is regarded as merely a lien upon the mortgaged land covered thereby, or as a conveyance of the legal title, an equity of redemption exists in favor of the mortgagor, and although the mortgagee enters into possession of the mortgaged premises, the right of redemption still exists, and the mortgagee is merely a resultant or constructive trustee for the mortgagor, and is within the doctrine that a trustee will not be permitted to claim his possession is adverse so long as the trust relation exists. Stout v. Rigney, 46 C. C. A. 459, 107 Fed. 545; Webb v. Winter, 135 Cal. 455, 65 Pac. 1028, 67 Pac. 691; Chickering v. Failes, 26 Ill. 507; Hinkley v. Greene, 52 Ill. 223; Mason v. Ayers, 73 Ill. 121; Gebhard v. Sattler, 40 Iowa, 152; Nash v. Northwest Land Co. 15 N. D. 566, 108 N. W. 792; Mears v. Somers Land Co. (N. D.) 121 N. W. 916; *Robinson v. A mortgagee, to bring himself within the operation of the limitation statute based upon adverse hostile possession under color of title, must, by direct notice to the mortgagor, or some other mode, terminate the trust relation theretofore existing by reason of the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee. Generally the foreclosure of the mortgage and sale of the land thereunder are sufficient to terminate this relation, and will raise the presumption that possession thereafter is adverse and hostile to the mortgagor. Under such circumstances, in the absence of fraud or bad faith, the validity of the foreclosure proceedings is immaterial, so far as affecting the right to rely thereon to show a termination of the trust relation, and a consequent hostile adverse possession under 22 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs and defendant McCrea from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Westchester County in favor of defendants Eddy et al., in an action brought to partition certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

And where there is a continuous, visible, and exclusive possession and occupation of the mortgaged premises under a claim of title based on foreclosure proceedings, it is immaterial whether the foreclosure is valid or otherwise. *Clark v. In Chickering v. Failes, supra, one of the leading cases on this subject, in referring to the question of adverse possession while the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee exists as to the land in question, the court said: "Whilst these several relations exist, the possession and payment of taxes cannot be held to be for the benefit of the occupant, and cannot in good faith be relied upon for hostile purposes against the mortgagor or landlord. To bring themselves within the good faith of this statute, they must first surrender the possession, if it has been obtained, or, as against the mortgagor, notice must be given that payment of taxes is claimed to be in the right of the mortgagee, independent of the mortgage, or the relation must be apparently terminated in some other mode. After a foreclosure or an effort to foreclose the mortgage, by decree or deed which purports to have that effect, the presumption then arises that all acts done in reference to the property are done under a claim of ownership by the mortgagee, and referred to his color of title. If they are Messrs. Davies, Stone, & Auerbach for appellant Maggie McCrea.

Mr. J. Addison Young, with Mr. C. H. Young, for respondents.

Cullen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought for the partition of certain lands in Westchester county, claimed to be owned by the plaintiffs and certain of the defendants as tenants in common. The premises were not in the actual possession of these parties, but were held and occupied by the respondents, the defendants Annie B. Eddy and others. It such as is required by the statute, and for the period of time designated by the statute, they would form a bar to a redemption."

On the same subject, in Nash v. Northwest Land Co. supra, the court said: "A mortgagee in possession may or may not be holding adversely. The only necessary essentials to give rise to that relation are the existence of a mortgage, and the consent by the mortgagor that the mortgagee take or hold possession of the property by reason of the mortgage and as security for the debt. The acknowledgment or recognition of the mortgagor's right, on the part of the mortgagee, when the possession is taken or while it is held, is not essential. So long as the relation continues, the rights and liabilities arising out of it are the same, whether the mortgagee acknowledges the relation or not . . . so long as the mortgagee acknowledges or recognizes the mortgagor's right to the land, the statute of limitations does not run against the latter's remedies . . . and conversely, when the mortgagee in possession denies the mortgagor's rights, the statute is put in motion. Of course, where the mortgagee is permitted to take possession under an agreement on his part to hold in subjection to the mortgagor's rights, such possession is not deemed adverse, so as to set the statute of limitations in motion against the mortgagor, until the mortgagee distinctly disavows his obligations as such, and notice thereof is brought home to the mortgagor. This is so because, until the mortgagor has notice of the repudiation of the agreement, he has the right to presume that the original arrangement continues. Where, however, the mortgagee's possession is adverse from the beginning, and he has never acknowledged any obligation to the mortgagor, there is no ground for the presumption above mentioned, and the act of taking possession not only gives rise to a cause of action in favor of the mortgagor, but also starts the statute 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) of limitations running against such cause of action."

In Stout v. Rigney, supra, holding that a purchaser at an invalid trust sale does not necessarily enter into possession of the property as mortgagee, irrespective of his actual intention, so that he cannot rely on his possession to invoke the statute of limitations in favor of his title, the court said: "The character of the possession . . . whether adverse or otherwise, must be determined from all the facts and circumstances of the case, and particularly with reference to the dominion exercised over the property by the purchaser and by his grantees subsequent to the sale. If the acts done and performed by those in possession were of such a nature as would naturally advise the world that the occupants claimed to be the owners of the fee, and such was their claim in fact, then their possession was adverse . . . nor do we believe it to have been essential, to render their possession adverse, that they should have notified the complainant that they were holding the land adversely, and would dispute her right to redeem, inasmuch as entry was made under a deed which purported to convey an absolute title, and which also professed to foreclose her right to redeem." To the same effect are H. B. Claffin Co. v. Middlesex Bkg. Co. 113 Fed. 958, and Gottlieb v. Thatcher, 2 C. C. A. 278, 4 U. S. App. 616, 51 Fed. 373 (possession of vacant land under foreclosure sale).

Entry into possession under title based upon foreclosure sale ineffective as to one of the owners of the land sold thereunder, because not made a party to the foreclosure proceeding, is nevertheless sufficiently adverse to start in operation the statute of limitations in favor of the mortgagee as against such party. Cox v. Tompkinson, 39 Wash. 70, 80 Pac. 1005. To same effect as to constructive possession of vacant land is Goetter v. Moore (Wash.) 101 Pac. 365.

This doctrine also finds support in Mc- appears that on May 1, 1877, Jane B. Eddy conveyed to Bernard Spaulding the premises in question. From him the appellants deduce their title. It further appears that, contemporaneous with the conveyance to Spaulding, he executed a mortgage of the same premises to said Jane B. Eddy to secure a portion of the purchase money. On July 25, 1878, default having been made in the payment of that mortgage, said Eddy instituted an action in the supreme court for the foreclosure of the same, in which action a judgment of foreclosure and sale was entered on April 22, 1879. No sale was ever had under this judgment, but, some time in the year 1879, said Jane B. Eddy entered into possession of the mortgaged premises and held the same until her death (subsequent to the commencement of this action) in February, 1905, when her title devolved upon the respondents, the executors and trustees of her will. Mrs. Eddy was made a party to the action. The complaint set forth the mortgage, the ignorance of the plaintiffs as to its validity, and charged that the same had been paid or was barred by the statute of limitations. Judgment was demanded that the rights and claims of all the parties to the action be ascertained and determined, that partition of the premises be made, or that a sale of the same be had. The respondents, Mrs. Eddy's executors and trustees (she having, in the meantime, died), answered, claiming to own the premises in fee, and setting up adverse possession in themselves and in their testatrix for more than twenty years. The special term rendered judgment in favor of these last-named defendants, holding that the rights of the plaintiffs and the other defendants were barred by lapse of time. That judgment has been affirmed by the appellate division.

The whole controversy depends upon the character of the possession taken and held by Mrs. Eddy, and on the interpretation to be given to § 379 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The learned trial court found that no part of the mortgage had been paid; and as to the entry and possession of Mrs. Eddy, its findings are as follows: "In the year 1879, the said Jane B. Eddy, with the knowledge and consent of the said Bernard Spaulding and the defendant Maggie McCrea, entered into the open, actual, and visible possession and use of the said premises described in the complaint in this action, and became a mortgagee in possession of said premises." That the said Jane B. Eddy continued in such possession and Caughn v. Young, 85 Miss. 277, 37 So. 839. It appeared in this case, however, that the purchaser of mortgaged land at a trustee's sale notified the grantor in such trust deed that he had purchased, and was holding possession of the land as owner.

In Sutton v. Jenkins, 147 N. C. 11, 60 S. E. 643, the court said that possession of mortgaged premises for the statutory period of time by a purchaser under void foreclosure proceedings tended strongly to prove an indefeasible title.

The same result was reached in Minnesota, although on a different theory. Thus, in Rogers v. Benton, 39 Minn. 39, 12 Am. St. Rep. 613, 38 N. W. 765, it was held that a mortgagee entering into possession of the mortgaged premises under a defective foreclosure proceeding, but claiming title thereunder, which claim was acquiesced in by the mortgagor, who surrendered possession of the premises on demand, was nevertheless a mortgagee in possession. It was, however, held that the right to foreclose and the right to redeem were reciprocal and commensurable, and the right to foreclose having expired, the right to redeem had also expired, and, as a logical result, the mortgagee in possession was vested with an absolute legal title to the mortgaged premises. To the same effect are Jellison v. Halloran, 44 Minn. 199, 46 N. W. 332, and Russell v. H. C. Akeley Lumber Co. 45 Minn. 376, 48 N. W. 3; but this doctrine was disapproved in Backus v. Burke, 63 Minn. 272, 65 N. W. 459, to the extent that it was limited to possession with the consent of the mortgagor. On this point the court said: "How can the statute of limitations run against the mortgagor if it is by his consent or license that the purchaser is in possession? It is a well-settled principle of law that the statute of limitations does not run in favor of an occupant of land in possession by the license or consent of the owner . . . of course, there are cases where the licensee in possession may, by his acts, repudiate his license, and thereafter hold adversely to the licensor. . . . But if such a purchaser at a foreclosure sale cannot be a mortgagee in possession unless he is in with the consent of the mortgagor, he will cease to be a mortgagee in possession, and becomes a mere trespasser, liable to an action of ejectment, as soon as he repudiates his license, and commences to hold adversely. We cannot hold that such is the law. Such a purchaser, entering under color of the foreclosure proceedings, enters adversely, not by the consent of the mortgagor, and continues to hold adversely from the time he enters."

Corby v. Moran, 58 Kan. 278, 49 Pac. 82, illustrates the doctrine that possession by a mortgagee or other purchaser under a foreclosure proceeding must be in good faith and free from fraud, in order to come within the doctrine that possession under a foreclosure-of-mortgage proceeding is adverse to the mortgagor. In this case it was held that possession under a sheriff's deed given in a foreclosure proceeding based upon a judgment which had been previously paid, of which fact the purchaser had notice, did not start in operation the statute of limitations limiting the time within which deeds execut-use of said premises up to the time of the commencement of that action, a period of twenty-five years and upwards, and until the time of her death, as hereinafter found, and continuously cultivated and improved the same, ploughing and planting and raising crops thereon, cutting the meadow, using the timber, building roads and walls thereon, and also built a barn upon the same, and received the fruits and benefits of said premises, and possessed and improved the same as owners are accustomed to possess and improve their estates, and that such possession and use and said acts of ownership by the said Jane B. Eddy were continued, during all said period, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant McCrea, and no claim adverse to such use and occupancy was ever made by said defendant McCrea until the spring of 1904, nor did she at any time, from 1879 to 1904, pay any taxes or assessment on said property, or use or occupy the same."

On these findings it determined as conclusions of law: "(1) That the said Jane B. Eddy, in the year 1879, became and was a mortgagee in possession of said premises. (2) That the possession of said premises by said Jane B. Eddy was, for more than twenty years prior to the commencement of this action, exclusive, hostile, and adverse to the defendant McCrea. (3) That, by reason of such adverse possession by said Jane B. Eddy, the right of plaintiffs and said defendant McCrea to redeem from said mortgage is barred." The findings of fact are conclusive in this court, the affirmance of the appellate division having been unanimous, but the question remains whether those findings support the legal conclusions and the judgment founded thereon. That the possession of Mrs. Eddy was not adverse in the ordinary sense of the term is quite apparent, for she entered with the consent of the owner of the equity, and, as found, became a mortgagee in possession of the premises. Under our statutes, contrary to the common law, a mortgage creates no estate in the land, but is merely a lien on the mortgaged premises. Since his right to recover the premises in ejectment upon default has been abrogated by the statute, one cannot become a mortgagee in possession unless his entry is with the consent of the owner of the equity of redemption, express or implied. Howell v. Leavitt, 95 N. Y. 617; Barson v. Mulligan, 191 N. Y. 306, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 151, 84 N. E. 75. Therefore, when a mortgagee enters into possession with such consent, it is in ed in judicial proceedings may be attacked for irregularities.

It is to be noted that in all of the foregoing cases the mortgagee, or the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, entered into possession under a paper title, based upon a decree or deed purporting to convey the mortgaged premises. In this respect they are distinguishable from BECKER v. MCCREA, wherein the foreclosure proceeding was not prosecuted to a sale of the mortgaged premises, and the mortgagee thereafter entered into possession with the consent of the mortgagor, and became a mortgagee in possession. He therefore was within the doctrine already stated, that, to render his possession adverse, so as to start the operation of the limitation statute in his favor, he must, by some act, clearly disavow and repudiate the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee, and claim to hold as owner in fee. This distinction is also made in Lightcap v. Bradley, 186 Ill. 510, 58 N. E. 221, wherein it was held a purchaser at a foreclosure of a trust deed, who took possession under a certificate of purchase, without, however, having issued to him a court deed of the premises, to which he was entitled upon surrender of the certificate, did not hold adversely to the mortgagor, so as to set in operation the limitation statute based on adverse possession. The court said, in order to obtain the benefit of this statute, it was essential that the purchaser prove a paper title which, on its face, purported to convey title.

This distinction reconciles BECKER v. MCCREA with Shriver v. Shriver, 86 N. Y. 575, wherein the purchaser of land at judicial sale was relieved from carrying out his purchase because a marketable title was not shown by the vendors. The title offered was based on possession, for the statutory period, by a purchaser under a defective foreclosure of mortgage sale. The vendors failed to show adverse possession for the statutory period, because it appeared that the mortgagor had deceased within the period, and it did not appear that his heirs were not under some disability that would toll the statute. It was, however, recognized that such a possession, where no disability existed as to the mortgagor or his representatives or heirs, would be sufficient to establish title by adverse possession. On this point the court said: "The facts of the case make out a continuous, uninterrupted, actual possession, beginning with an entry under claim of exclusive title founded on a written instrument, and so kept up for over twenty years . . . a clear adverse possession for that time makes a title which a purchaser at a judicial sale may not refuse."

In H. B. Clafin Co. v. Middlesex Bkg. Co. supra, wherein the court said that, had the mortgagees taken possession of the premises as mortgagees, without the foreclosure proceeding, their possession would not have been adverse; but where there was a foreclosure, although voidable, and possession was taken under a deed issued under such proceeding, "this was notice to everybody that the possession was under claim of absolute ownership, and not as a mortgagee, and such a repudiation of the trust as sets the statute of limitations in operation."

of $1,000 payable at his death to his wife, Lillie M. Wimberly. The policy provided that the premiums should be paid annually in advance on the 1st day of October, at or before 5 o'clock, and the first premium was paid upon the issuance of the policy. The policy contained this provision: "Policies cease in accordance with their terms if the premiums are not paid on or before the day stipulated therein for such payment, except that a grace of thirty days is allowed for the payment of any premium after the first, provided that with the payment of such premium interest is also paid thereon for the days of grace taken." The 1st day of October, 1905, was Sunday, and the premium which fell due on that day was never paid by the deceased, who died on November 1st of that year. The plaintiff in error contends that the thirty days of grace expired with the 31st day of October, while counsel for defendant in error contends that the thirty days of grace began at the expiration of the 2d day of October and embraced all of the 1st day of November. If there had been no provision for days of grace in the policy, the assured would have had the right to pay the premium on the 2d day of October,—Monday. This proposition of law is not disputed by the plaintiff in error. It is claimed by counsel for the defendant in error that because the day of payment fell upon Sunday, and the assured had the right to pay the premium on Monday, that made Monday the day of maturity, just as if it had been named in the policy, and that the thirty days of grace ran from that day. If the plaintiff in error's contention is correct, it determines this case, and it will be unnecessary for us to pursue the investigation of the other questions presented.

The 1st day of October in the year 1905 being Sunday, if the days of grace had not been allowed by the contract, the assured would have had the right to pay the premium on the following Monday, because the law does not require payment to be made on Sunday. It is contended by the defendant in error, and so held by the honorable court of civil appeals, that this constituted Monday the day for the payment of the premium, and that the thirty days which the contract allowed for the payment of that premium commenced to run at the close of Monday, instead of at the close of Sunday, and therefore the 1st day of November was within the thirty-day limit for the payment of the premium. We are of opinion that the fact that the law granted to the assured the right to pay on Monday did not have the effect to add a day to the thirty days allowed by the contract. The contract prescribes that the premium shall be due on October 1st, but the policy would not be forfeited if paid within thirty days thereafter. The construction placed upon the contract by the court of civil appeals but also one which the other party was not bound to recognize."

In Holbrook Bros. v. Mill Owners' Mut. Ins. Co. 86 Iowa, 255, 53 N. W. 229. under a statute providing that, in computing time where the last day on which an act is to be performed falls on Sunday, the time prescribed shall be extended so as to include the whole of the following Monday, it was held that a payment on Monday satisfied the articles of incorporation of the insurance company, which required the payment of assessments within thirty days from the time the notices of assessments were mailed, the thirtieth day having fallen upon Sunday.

But in National Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Miller, 85 Ky. 88, 2 S. W. 900, where the thirty days of grace after notice of assessment, during which the charter of the association allowed assessments to be paid, fell on Thanksgiving day, it was held that a failure to make the payment on such day forfeited the policy, as insured was not entitled to an additional day. This decision, however, is under a statute in regard to holidays which "makes all days appointed by the President of the United States, or by the governor of the commonwealth, as days of fasting or thanksgiving, holidays, on which all the public offices of this commonwealth may be closed, and shall be treated and considered as Sunday or the Christian Sabbath for all purposes regarding the presenting for payment or acceptance, and of protesting for and giving notice of the dishonor of bills of exchange, bank checks and promissory notes, placed by law upon the footing of bills of exchange," and which provided that, if any of such days named "as holidays shall occur on Sunday, the next day thereafter shall be observed as holiday, but bills of exchange or other paper may be presented for payment or acceptance on the Saturday preceding such holiday, and proceeded on accordingly;" and therefore is in full accord with the foregoing cases, as the court expressly placed the decision upon the ground that there was nothing in the statute prohibiting business transactions on Thanksgiving day or treating that day as a Christian Sabbath, except as to commercial paper, thus impliedly holding that a different result would attend had the day upon which the period for payment of the assessment expired fallen on a Sunday.

As to the rule as to the first and last days in computation of time in general, see subject note to Halbert v. San Saba Springs Land & Live Stock Asso. 49 L.R.A. 193, and case note to State v. Elson, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 686.

As to extension of time in general when last day falls on Sunday, see note to Brown v. Vailes, 14 L.R.A. 120.

would give to the assured thirty-one days from the 1st day of October, instead of thirty, as expressed in the contract. Woolley v. Clements, 11 Ala. 220. In the case cited suit was upon a note to which the law gave three days of grace. The note fell due on Sunday, and was protested on Wednesday. It was contended, as in this case, that the days of grace began to run at midnight of Monday, and that the note was not protestable until Thursday; but the court held that the days of grace were not enlarged by the fact that the note matured on Sunday.

The rule for computation of time under a state of facts like those set out in this case is well settled to be that the day on which an act is to be performed is to be excluded in determining the time when some other thing is to be done thereafter, and that the last day of the time given for the performance of the latter act is to be included in the computation. Hill v. Kerr, 78 Tex. 217, 14 S. W. 566; Lubbock v. Cook, 49 Tex. 100. Applying this rule to the facts of this case, the thirty days grace allowed by the policy of insurance began to run at midnight of Sunday, October 1st, and terminated at midnight of the 31st day of that month, which gave thirty full days from the day on which the payment was expressed to be made, and fulfilled every provision of the contract between the parties. It follows that since Wimberly did not pay the premium at all, and died after the expiration of the time allowed within which to make the payment, the policy was forfeited before his death, and there was no right of recovery as against the insurance company.

It is unnecessary to discuss the other questions which are raised, and it is hereby ordered that the judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and District Court be reversed, and that judgment be here rendered that the defendant in error take nothing by the suit, and that the insurance company go hence without day, and recover of the defendant in error all costs of this proceeding.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

EUGENE HARTNETT, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(— Tex. Crim. App. —, 119 S. W. 855.)

Officer — embezzlement — duty.

1. A police officer assigned to the position of jailer cannot be convicted under a 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

statute providing that if an officer shall convert to his own use money belonging to the county that may come into his custody by virtue of his office, he shall be punished, where he appropriates to his own use money collected from prisoners as fines, if the statute imposes the duty of collecting such fines upon another officer.

Same — estoppel.

2. That one in collecting fines assumes to do so by color of his office does not estop him from denying his authority to do so, in defense of a prosecution against him under a statute providing for punishment of an officer who appropriates to his own use money belonging to the county that has come into his possession by virtue of his office.

Appeal — criminal cause — dismissal.

3. A prosecution under an indictment charging an offense cannot be dismissed by the appellate court because the facts do not support the conviction.

Case Note. — May estoppel to deny authority to receive money alleged to have been embezzled be invoked against public officer charged with embezzlement.

As to embezzlement by persons other than bailees or public officers, as affected by want of authority to receive the money or property in the first instance, see note to Smith v. State, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 531.

Where officer exceeds his authority in receiving money.

There is a difference of opinion as to whether an officer who, without having actual authority to collect money, nevertheless, assuming to have such power, collects money and then converts it, can be punished for embezzlement as a public officer. Some cases hold that by his conduct he is estopped to deny that he has such power.

Thus, the treasurer of an association who received in its name and in its behalf, from the governor of the state, certain money which had been voted by Congress to the association, and sent to the governor, is estopped, in a prosecution for embezzling the money, to assert that the association was not entitled to the money, or that he was not authorized to receive it as treasurer, because it should have been transmitted to the state treasurer and thence by him directly to the defendant, the treasurer of the association. People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 630, 39 Pac. 524.

So, it was held in People v. Robertson, 6 Cal. App. 514, 92 Pac. 408, that, admitting that a deputy assessor acted irregularly in receiving from a mining company a part only of the taxes due from it, he was estopped, in a prosecution for embezzling the money, from denying his authority to receive it, or that he acted as agent of the county in the transaction.

And in State v. Spaulding, 24 Kan. 1,—a APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Jefferson County convicting him of embezzlement. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. J. Duff and Robert A. John for appellant.

Mr. F. J. McCord for the State.

Ramsey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The charging part of the indictment against appellant is in these words: "That Eugene Hartnett, on or about the 3d day of March, one thousand nine hundred and eight (1908), and anterior to the presentment of this indictment, in the county of Jefferson and state of Texas, Eugene Hartnett was then and there a police officer of the incorporated city of Beaumont, which said city was then and there duly and legally incorporated under the laws of Texas, and was then and there acting and serving as such police officer, and as such police officer and by virtue of his said office there had come into his hands and was in his charge, custody, and possession the sum of two hundred and eighty-one dollars and fifty cents, lawful and current money of the United States of America, and of the value of two hundred and eighty-one dollars and fifty cents, a better description of which said money is to the grand jurors unknown, which said money was then and there the property of said incorporated city of Beaumont, and leading case on the question of estoppel,—a conviction of a city clerk for embezzling money received by him for a license was sustained on the ground of estoppel, notwithstanding that under the ordinances it was his duty to issue the license upon production by the licensee of the receipt of the city treasurer showing that the license money had been paid; it appearing that for years it had been the custom, known to the mayor, council, and other city officers, for the licensee to pay the money directly to the clerk, who would thereafter hand it to the treasurer, it not appearing that the city had ever disavowed such assumed authority, or made any effort to recollect license moneys. Brewer, J., remarked that "one who is agent enough to receive money is agent enough to be punished for embezzling it."

So, under a statute providing that if a clerk to any body corporate shall fraudulently embezzle any money delivered to or received or taken into possession by him for and in the name or on account of his master or employment, he shall be deemed to have feloniously stolen it, it is not necessary to show that he had received the money "by virtue of his employment," nor that he had authority to receive it; but it is sufficient if it was received in the name or on account of the master or employer. Denton v. State, 77 Md. 527, 26 Atl. 1022.

But the contrary doctrine is held in many, perhaps most, of the cases, which are set out below.

Thus United States v. Smith, 124 U. S. 525, 31 L. ed. 534, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 595, holds that a clerk of a collector of customs is not by statute charged with the safe-keeping of the public moneys, and therefore cannot be guilty of embezzling the same.

So, a sheriff forbidden by law to collect taxes on unlisted property cannot be convicted of embezzling money so collected, as property belonging to or for the use of the state or any county, since, under the statute, to warrant a conviction of embezzlement the officer must have been rightfully and legally in possession of the money, and must then have misappropriated it, whereas the sheriff in this case must be considered as holding the money in trust for the use of the persons from whom he received it. Com. v. Alexander, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 971, 112 S. W. 586.

A justice of the peace, having no legal right to the possession of public-school money, cannot be convicted of embezzling it, under a statute making punishable embezzlement, by any public officer, agent, or servant, of public money received by virtue of his office, agency, or service, or under color or pretense thereof. State v. Bolin, 110 Mo. 209, 19 S. W. 650.

So, an auditor of public accounts who receives fees in violation of the state Constitution, which forbids him to receive the same, and requires that they be paid in advance to the state treasurer, cannot be convicted of embezzling the same, under a statute providing: "If any officer or other person charged with the collection, receipt, safe-keeping, transfer or disbursement of the public money, or any part thereof, belonging to the state, . . . shall convert to his own use . . . any portion of the public money . . . received, controlled, or held by him for safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement, or in any other way or manner, or for any other purpose . . . every such act shall be deemed and held in law to be an embezzlement." Moore v. State, 53 Neb. 831, 74 N. W. 319.

So, a county auditor not being charged by law with possession and custody of money belonging to the state, an indictment charging him with converting money of the state which came into his possession by virtue of his office and in discharge thereof is bad, under a statute providing for the punishment of any officer or other person charged with collection, receipt, etc., of public money, who converts the same to his own use. State v. Newton, 26 Ohio St. 265.

A similar decision with respect to a deputy county treasurer was rendered in State v. Meyers, 56 Ohio St. 340, 47 N. E. 138.

The legal possession of money in the mint being in the Treasury Department, a clerk to the Treasurer of the mint cannot be convicted of embezzling the same, under a Federal statute applicable to "all officers and the said Eugene Hartnett did then and there unlawfully and fraudulently take, misapply, and convert to his own use the said money, against the peace and dignity of the state."

The indictment so returned against him and the prosecution which ensued, were based on article 103 of our Penal Code of 1895. This article is as follows: "If any officer of any county, city, or town in this state, or any clerk or other person employed by such officer, shall fraudulently take, misapply, or convert to his own use any money, property, or other thing of value, belonging to such county, city, or town, that may have come into his custody or possession by virtue of his office or employment, or shall secrete the same with intent to take, misapply, or convert it to his own use, or shall pay or deliver the same to any person knowing that he is not entitled to receive it, he shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than two nor more than ten years."

Many questions were raised in the court below, which have also been urged in this court, as grounds for reversal of the judgment of conviction. We think the case must be reversed because under the uncontradicted evidence the conviction cannot stand for the reason the moneys appropriated must be public funds owned by the city, and must come into the possession of the officer by virtue of his office, and his duties must be defined by law, and cannot other persons charged by this act or any other act with safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of public moneys." The court said that the statute had "obvious reference to persons intrusted by some act of Congress with the legal possession of public moneys, not to those subordinates who, not having been intrusted with such possession, could be punished for a fraudulent conversion, as felons without any congressional legislation." United States v. Hutchinson, 4 Clark (Pa.) 211.

R. v. Orman, 36 Eng. L. & Eq. 611, held that a servant who had exceeded his written instructions in receiving money might nevertheless be convicted for embezzling the moneys, if he was employed de facto to receive the money; but when a storekeeper of a county jail, whose duties are defined by statute, wrongfully converts money which he is not allowed by law to receive, a conviction for embezzlement will be quashed.

Where officer is one de facto only.

Most of the cases hold that an officer accused of embezzlement cannot defend on the ground that he had no right to receive the money as officer for the reason that his appointment or election was invalid.

Thus, State v. Stone, 40 Iowa, 547, holds that if one holds himself out to be an officer, or acts as an officer de facto, he cannot be heard to object that he is not an officer de jure, because his acting in that office estops him to deny his right to it, even when indicted for embezzlement.

And People v. Sanders, 139 Mich. 442, 102 N. W. 959, held that a deputy of a township treasurer might be convicted for embezzling township funds, even though the treasurer had not lawfully appointed him, for the reason that he had not obtained the consent of his bondsmen, as required by law.

Bartley v. State, 53 Neb. 310, 73 N. W. 744, holds that a state treasurer who has served out his term cannot, when charged with embezzlement, defend on the ground that he never rightfully held the office; since it is immaterial whether he was an officer de jure or de facto.

Fortenberry v. State, 56 Miss. 286, held that one who had been duly elected to an office and had assumed its functions could be convicted of embezzlement, though he had not taken the oath of office.

State v. Heath, 8 Mo. App. 99, held that the relation of agent or servant, within the meaning of a statute making punishable any embezzlement of public moneys by any public officers, agents, and servants, "does not depend on the legal right of the appointing power to receive the money converted, or upon the legal right of the agent to collect it. The relation of trust and confidence between the alleged principal and agent, and a colorable right to appoint or employ the agent or servant, with the acceptance by the latter of the relation, are the essential elements." This case was reversed in 70 Mo. 565, but for a reason not affecting the above principle.

State v. Findley, 101 Mo. 217, 14 S. W. 185, held that it was not a defense to a county collector accused of embezzlement, that he failed to take the oath of office or give bond for the performance of his duties. The court said: "Being an officer de facto he cannot object that he is not an officer de jure."

State v. Mims, 26 Minn. 183, 2 N. W. 494, 683, held that the fact that a county treasurer did not give bonds as required by statute did not prevent his prosecution for embezzling public moneys collected by him as treasurer. The court said: "If he [defendant] assumed the right of making the collections as county treasurer, it does not lie with him, when called upon to account therefor to the state, to object that he had no legal right to do so.

R. v. Borrett, 6 Car. & P. 124, holds that on an indictment for embezzlement against a letter carrier charged as a person employed in the public service of his Majesty, it is not necessary to prove his appointment as a letter carrier, but evidence of his having acted as such is sufficient.

On the trial of a person for embezzling a letter containing a bill of exchange, he being at the time employed under the postoffice, it was held in R. v. Rees, 6 Car. & P. 606, sufbe created by custom or usage. The evidence, in brief, showed that appellant was a policeman in the city of Beaumont, and that he was assigned to the position of jailer, and that the moneys the embezzlement of which is charged herein came into his possession in payment of fines assessed (quite irregularly) against various defendants in the corporation court of Beaumont. There was absolutely no evidence in the record that by law he was authorized to receive such moneys. This authority by law was vested in the city marshal, and he was required to make payments monthly to the city treasurer. While it is possible that appellant might have been indicted and convicted as an employee of the marshal, it is certain that as here charged, where the conviction is sought by reason of misappropriation of funds received by him as an officer and by virtue of his office, under the authorities, a conviction cannot be sustained. This question is, we think, definitely settled beyond serious doubt by the decision of this court in the case of Warwick v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 63, 35 S. W. 386. It was there held in substance that an indictment based upon article 103, Penal Code 1895, will not lie against a county judge for a misapplication or conversion of county school funds, because such funds cannot come into his hands by virtue of his office, and the law does not authorize a county judge, as such officer, to receive county school moneys. The suggestion is made, however, by Judge Henderson, that the court should not be understood as holding that the commissioners' court might not empower the county judge, or any other person, to receive money coming to the county for and on behalf of the county; but in such contingency the money or property would come to such person, not by virtue of his official capacity, but on account of his employment or agency.

A quite similar question came before the supreme court of Missouri and was decided in the case of State v. Bolin, 110 Mo. 209, 19 S. W. 650. Their statute is somewhat similar though rather broader than ours. It is as follows: "If any officer appointed or elected by virtue of the Constitution of this state, or any law thereof, including as well all officers, agents, and servants of incorporated cities and towns, or municipal townships or school districts, as of the state and counties thereof, shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall make way with or secrete any portion of the public moneys, or any valuable security by him received for safe-keeping, disbursement, transfer, or for any other purpose, or which may be in his possession, or over which he may have the supervision, care, or control by virtue of his office, agency, or service or under color or pretense thereof, every such officer, agent, or servant shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than five years." Passing on this statute the supreme court of Missouri say: "No provision of the statute is pointed out or found, which directs or authorizes the public school money of the state or county to be placed in the possession or sufficient to prove that such person acted in the service of the postoffice, and that it was not necessary to go into proof of his appointment.

But the contrary is held in a few cases.

Thus, in Wood v. State, 47 Ark. 488, 1 S. W. 709, a statute provided for punishing every officer, etc., "who has taken an oath of office, as required by law," etc., who should embezzle public funds. It was held that an indictment which failed to allege that defendant had taken an oath of office was fatally defective, though it alleged that he was the duly elected county treasurer, and received the money as such treasurer.

And State v. Flint, 62 Mo. 393, held that an indictment for embezzlement, which merely stated that defendant was the agent of the state and county, was properly quashed when it did not further allege when and how he was appointed and the authority for his appointment.

Estoppel of officer to deny right of public to money embezzled.

State v. Patterson, 66 Kan. 447, 71 Pac. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

860, was an action of embezzlement against a city treasurer for fraudulent conversion of moneys which came into his hands by virtue of his office. It was held to be no defense that he collected the money embezzled from persons engaged in unlawful traffic in intoxicating liquors in the city, under an arrangement between such persons and the city whereby immunity from prosecution was secured to them.

Estoppel of officer to deny right of individual to money embezzled.

State v. Williamson, 118 Mo. 146, 21 L.R.A. 827, 40 Am. St. Rep. 358, 23 S. W. 1054, held that an assignment of unearned salary by a public officer was contrary to public policy, and void, and hence he could not be convicted of embezzling it, although at the time of the assignment he had taken an appointment as agent of the assignee to collect it for the latter, and did collect it by virtue of such assignment, since he was not in fact an agent in collecting the money, the assignment being void.

under the supervision, care, or control of a justice of the peace for safe-keeping, disbursement, transfer, or other purpose; and we are unable to see how he, as a public officer, can be guilty of embezzling funds which never came into his possession, under any authority of law, by virtue of his office. If he had no right to the possession or control of this public money as an officer, he would have no greater right when acting merely under color or pretense of office. We do not think the language of the statute, 'under color or pretense' of an office, can be construed to apply to an officer who, having in fact no right to the custody of public money, obtains the possession of it by falsely representing that he is entitled to its custody by virtue of his office. The statute was only intended to make one acting officially, under color of office only, equally liable for the misappropriation of the public money coming into his possession by virtue of his supposed official right to receive it, as he would have been had the title to his office been perfect."

The doctrine laid down in the Warswick Case, supra, was affirmed by the supreme court of Nebraska in the case of Moore v. State, 53 Neb. 831, 74 N. W. 319, where the matter is exhaustively considered. See also San Luis Obispo County v. Farnum, 108 Cal. 562, 41 Pac. 445. In the Moore Case the court say: "That where an officer receives money which he is not by law authorized to receive, such money is not received by him in his official capacity, and that any duty which he may owe of paying the money is only that which rests upon any debtor or bailee, is established by many cases."

It is suggested in the brief of our learned assistant attorney general that by the circumstances of this case appellant cannot defend on the ground that his acts were not within the limits of his legal authority, and the suggestion is made that appellant is estopped from denying the fact that his act was authorized. This position is not, we believe, sound. In the case of Moore v. State, supra, on this question the supreme court of Nebraska say: "Nor do we think that there is any principle of estoppel whereby the defendant is forbidden to deny that he is within the class against which the penalties of the statute are denounced. For the purposes of this case we need not inquire whether the same rules apply as to estoppel in civil and in criminal cases, or whether a man may ever be estopped to plead the law. The cases cited as applying estoppels are, for the most part, cases where an officer charged by law with the duty of collecting taxes has actually collected them, and then refused to turn them over because illegally levied. There the general duty of collecting the money was imposed by law on the officer. The money was paid. The legality of the tax was a question solely between the public and the taxpayer, and, the latter having voluntarily paid the tax, it was no affair of the collector whether he might have resisted the payment or not. The matter was not one of an estoppel. The issue was merely immaterial. No one could defend a charge of embezzlement as the agent of an individual, on the ground that a third person had paid money which he did not owe and could not have been compelled to pay; but there is a multitude of cases holding that he may defend if he had no authority to receive payment at all. Akin to these cases are those where a foreign corporation is prohibited from doing business except on compliance with certain requirements, and an agent embezzles its funds, and alleges in defense that the principal had no right to make the contracts leading to the collection of the money. This is really a case of an immaterial issue, or, if it be one of estoppel, it is an estoppel to deny the facts giving the principal a right to do business. Where a criminal statute applies only to persons of a certain class, the doing of the acts which the statute forbids does not estop the defendant from denying that he belongs to the class which is alone subjected to the penalties. Yet that is at the last analysis the argument of the state on this branch."

This case is, as we believe, readily distinguishable from the ruling of our supreme court in the case of State v. Brooks, 42 Tex. 62, upon which our assistant attorney general so much relies. It was there held, and correctly, that a deputy sheriff is an officer authorized to collect taxes, and as such is liable to indictment for embezzling money collected by him as taxes. The statute at the time of the prosecution of the case against Brooks was as follows: "If any officer of the government who is by law a receiver or depository of public money, or any clerk or other person employed about the office of such officer, shall fraudulently take or misapply or convert to his own use any part of such public money, or secrete the same with intent to take, misapply, or convert to his own use, or shall pay or deliver the same to any person, knowing that he is not entitled to receive it, he shall be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than two nor more than ten years." The indictment charged Brooks in the language of the statute. Exceptions were presented to the indictment, alleging its insufficiency because, among other reasons, Brooks was not shown to be such an officer of the government as was included in the terms of the statute defining and punishing embezzlement. This motion prevailed in the court below, and an appeal was prosecuted, as was then allowed, by the state to test the sufficiency of the indictment. The argument was made that the deputy sheriff is appointed by the sheriff, and gives bond to him, and not to the state; that the sheriff, on the other hand, is designated by the Constitution and the law as the person to collect taxes; and that the deputy sheriff did not bear such relation to the matter as constituted him under the law an officer charged with this duty. It was held, as stated above, that he was such an officer; and the court called attention to the fact that by law the sheriff was authorized to make appointments of deputies, and that the statute authorizing such appointments provided that every deputy shall have the like authority in regard to collecting taxes, within that portion of the county which may have been allotted to him, which the sheriff would have. Pasch. Dig. art. 7615. It was also pointed out that the statute requires the deputy to take the same oath as required by the sheriff faithfully to discharge the duties required of him (Pasch. Dig. arts. 7608, 7615), and that in case of disability, death, or removal of the sheriff the deputies are required to proceed in the collection of taxes until the vacancy is filled (Pasch. Dig. 7616). It was said: "In various other sections of the law the deputy is recognized as authorized to collect taxes. Pasch. Dig. arts. 7619-7621." It was held that "it is clear that the deputy sheriff has both the actual and legal possession of the taxes which he collects, and is not subject to indictment for theft." In that case it will be observed that the duties of the deputy sheriff were defined and fixed by law. He was authorized to collect taxes, and, in the absence or during the disability of the sheriff, was charged with the duty of so doing. In a sense he took the place of and acted instead of his principal, clothed with his duties and charged with his responsibilities, and this as a matter of statute. These elements are conspicuously wanting in this case, where no ordinance clothed appellant with the authority or placed upon him the responsibility of receiving and collecting fines.

The indictment charges an offense. It follows the language of the statute. As we believe, however, under the law, the facts do not support a conviction. In this attitude of the record, and in view 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of the fact that the indictment does charge an offense against the law, it results that the prosecution cannot be dismissed; but the judgment of conviction is reversed, and the cause remanded for proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

STATE BOARD OF HEALTH

v.

VILLAGE OF ST. JOHNSBURY et al.,
Appts.

(— Vt. —, 73 Atl. 581.)

Action — parties — municipal clerk.

1. The clerk of a municipal corporation is not a proper party to a bill by the state board of health to enforce an order prohibiting the furnishing and use of the municipal water supply for domestic purposes, where he is a mere recording, and not an administrative, officer.

Costs — against state board.

2. Costs should not be awarded against a state board of health upon dismissal of the bill against one improperly made a party to a suit to enforce its order.

Action — parties — municipal trustees.

3. Trustees of a municipality, who have the management and control of its affairs, are proper parties to a bill by the state board of health to enforce its order against Case Note. — Power of state or health authorities to forbid the use of a polluted water supply.

The few cases disclosed by an extended search, in which the question involved is discussed, are, like STATE Bd. OF HEALTH v. ST. JOHNSBURY, based on the fundamental principle of government that the state may require the individual to use his property so that the public health and safety shall be best conserved, and that interference with personal liberty is excusable when reasonably necessary for the protection of the public health, provided the means used and the extent of the interference are reasonably necessary to accomplish that purpose.

Thus, in Com. ex rel. McCormick v. Russell, 172 Pa. 506, 33 Atl. 709, in which a bill was filed by the state, on the relation of a water company, to restrain defendants from polluting a stream above the point where the water company took its supply, the trial court, after finding that the water was wholly unfit for domestic uses or for steam, ordered the company to furnish pure water and granted an injunction against the collection of water rates until pure water should be furnished, but held that relief against the pollution could not be had. In reversing that decree, on the ground that the furnishing and use of the municipal water supply for domestic purposes.

Same — water supply.

4. A village which owns a system of water supply is a proper party to a bill by the state board of health to enforce its order forbidding the furnishing of the supply for domestic purposes.

Water supply — forbidden use — personal liberty.

5. The constitutional right of a citizen to personal liberty is not infringed by an order of the state board of health forbidding him to make use, for drinking purposes, of a polluted water supply.

Action — enforcement of administrative order — hearing.

6. Statutory permission to the court to enforce an order of the state board of health forbidding use of a polluted water supply does not make the order conclusive so as to deprive persons affected thereby of a right to a hearing before the court.

Administrative order — contempt — enforcement.

7. That no method is provided for enforcing an order of a state board of health will not prevent its enforcement by the court, if its order might be of such a character that enforcement of it would result in the enforcement of that of the state board.

Process — service — municipality — trustees.

8. Notice of an order to be obeyed by a municipality served upon its trustees is sufficient notice to it.

Brown v. Denver, 7 Colo. 305, 3 Pac.

the water company was entitled to have its source of water supply protected, the supreme court, in discussing the status of the public as regards the right of the state to regulate a public use such as the furnishing of water to the public, said that the state, in the exercise of its police power, through the exercise of which it asserts its right to inquire into the sufficiency and good faith with which a public use is served, and to correct, through the courts, any defects or abuse in the conduct of the business of gathering or distributing the supply or of securing a quality of the commodity furnished that is suitable for use, could investigate the sufficiency and quality of the water supply, and require the company to meet fairly the public use it had undertaken to serve, or cease to collect charges therefor, and that it could require the company to be diligent in its efforts to procure a sufficient supply of pure water, if it could be had from sources reasonably accessible to its plant, since the existence of civilized society requires that other interests than those of the individual should be reckoned with, and that each person must be held to have surrendered such of his natural rights to civil liberty as could not be asserted consistently with due respect to the rights of others and the public; but that the state could not require the company to relocate its plant or seek a new supply, to reach which would involve an expense greater than its entire capital stock. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

In the somewhat analogous case of State v. Schlemmer, 42 La. Ann. 1166, 10 L.R.A. 135, 8 So. 307, it was held that a city ordinance having for its object the prevention of the use of unwholesome well water in the making of bread for public distribution and consumption could validly require, as a means to that end, the filling up of all wells on premises where such bread was made, as an exercise of the extensive police power which had been delegated by the legislature.

And in Peffer v. Pennsylvania Water Co. 221 Pa. 578, 70 Atl. 870, where a bill was filed by certain consumers on behalf of themselves and others, against a water company, alleging that the water furnished was polluted and unfit for domestic use, a decree directing the company to provide a sufficient supply of reasonably pure and wholesome water, and allowing a reasonable time for compliance, was upheld.

The foregoing cases, while not involving the power of health authorities, fully support the result reached in the St. JOHNSBURY CASE, wherein the board of health was acting under expressly delegated authority. It would seem, however, that the use of a polluted water supply could not, in the absence of such an express delegation of authority, be forbidden or regulated by a board of health or other local authorities, but would, because of constitutional objections, have to be regulated by the state directly.

The authority granted to the state board of health to forbid the furnishing and use for domestic purposes of all water so contaminated, unwholesome, and impure that its use for such domestic purposes is a menace and danger to the public health, is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state, and is not subject to restraint by constitutional provisions for the general protection of the rights of individual life and property.

State v. Schlemmer, 42 La. Ann. 1166, 10 L.R.A. 135, 8 So. 307; Kennedy v. Board of Health, 2 Pa. St. 366.

Rowell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in chancery brought by, and in the names and official capacity of, the persons composing the state board of health, against the village of St. Johnsbury and divers takers of water resident therein, for the enforcement of an order made by the board prohibiting the furnishing and the use of the village water for domestic purposes till such a time. The order was made and issued in July, 1906, and recited that the board found and was of the opinion that the water taken from the Passumpsic river at the point where the village was then taking it, and as supplied by it to the inhabitants thereof by its water system, was so contaminated, unwholesome, and impure that the use of it for domestic purposes endangered the public health; and it prohibited the drawing and the use thereof for said purposes until, in the opinion of the board, the danger ceased. But it expressly permitted the drawing and use for laundry purposes, flushing water-closets, sprinkling lawns, and streets, watering gardens, and for stable purposes. The order was served on the trustees of the village, but not on the village itself, on the school directors and 134 takers, a large number of whom obeyed it, but many did not, and they are defendants. After the bill was brought, the village itself, its newly elected trustees, and its clerk were made defendants. The statute under which the order was made gave the board the general oversight and care of all waters, streams, and ponds used by any cities, towns, villages, or public institutions, or by any water or ice companies in this state as sources of water supply, and of all springs, streams, and water courses tributary thereto; and authorized the board to prohibit any town, city, village, public institution, individual, or water or ice company from using water or ice from any given source whenever, in its opinion, the same was so contaminated, unwholesome, or impure that the use thereof endangered the public health. The statute as it was when the bill was brought, and as it now is, provides that the court of chancery "may" on application therefor by the board enforce any order, rule, or regulation that the board may make under and by virtue thereof. P. S. 5496.

The defendant Elisha May demurs to the bill for that under its allegations the board has no authority to maintain the bill in its own name; that the statute does not provide for notice of a hearing by the board, nor for notice of any action by it to condemn the water; and that it does not allege that any notice was given in these respects. The village, its three trustees who were made defendants after the bill was brought, and Preston E. May, its clerk, jointly demur for want of equity, and because the bill does not charge them nor any of them with any shortcomings nor wrongdoings, nor contain any prayer for relief against them, and because said May is not a proper party. They further demur for substantially the same causes assigned in the demurrer of the defendant Elisha May. The bill discloses no reason for making Preston E. May a party defendant, except that he is clerk. But that is no reason, for he is a mere recording officer, and not an administrative officer. The bill should be dismissed as to him, but without costs, for the orators are acting in their official capacity as state officers, and to make them pay costs would be making the state pay costs, which it does not do in cases distinctively of public concern certainly. But the trustees are proper parties, though not charged with anything amiss, for the bill alleges that they have the management and control of the affairs of the village, including the water system, subject to the ultimate control of the village, and therefore they can be decreed against in their official capacity if need be. North Troy Graded School Dist. v. Troy, 80 Vt. 24, 66 Atl. 1033. And the village is, of course, a proper, if not a necessary, party, for it owns the water system in question. It is objected that the bill should have been brought by the state, and not by the board. But we construe the statute to mean that it may be brought by the board.

It is further objected that the prohibition authorized by the statute must be absolute, and not limited; that no order could lawfully be made by the board in restraint of the personal liberty of the citizen, for, if water was furnished by the village in its mains and taken into the houses, the board had no authority to punish those who used it for domestic purposes; that the owners of the houses had the right to drink it, and their tenants had the same right, even though forbidden by them; that the order cannot be enforced against either, nor can either be dealt with by the court for contempt; that the board could, at most, only stop the village from pumping water into its mains, but that the court cannot effectually enforce the order, even if binding, without notice or opportunity to be heard, nor make the order prayed for until it has heard all the matters in issue; and that the bill does not present any issue that the defendants can answer, and demand a trial de novo as to the fitness of the water for domestic purposes. As to personal liberty, our Bill of Rights declares that government is, or ought to be, instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community, and not for the particular emolument or advantage of any single man, family, or set of men, who are a part only of that community. Closely allied to this fundamental proposition is the further declaration that the people of the state, by their legal representatives, have the sole, inherent, and exclusive right of governing and regulating the internal police of the state. This right the state did not surrender when it became a member of the Union, but retains it still; and that right, to say the least, embraces such reasonable rules and regulations, established directly by legislative enactment, as will protect the public health and the public safety. And the state may invest local or state boards created for administrative purposes with authority in some proper way to safeguard the public health and the public safety. The way in which these results are to be accomplished is within the discretion of the state, provided the powers and functions of the general government are not thereby infringed, nor any constitutional provision of the state nor the United States.

We come now to consider more especially what personal liberty is, as secured by constitutional provision; and on this question we refer to Jacobson v. Massachusetts, 197 U. S. 11, 49 L. ed. 643, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358, 3 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 765, which affirms the legality of compulsory vaccination for the prevention of smallpox. There the plaintiff in error insisted that his liberty was invaded when the commonwealth subjected him to fine and imprisonment for refusing to submit to vaccination; that the compulsory vaccination law was unreasonable, arbitrary, and oppressive, and therefore hostile to the inherent right of every free man to care for his own body and health in such way as to him seemed best; and that the execution of such a law was nothing short of an assault upon his person. But the court said that the liberty secured by the Constitution of the United States to every person within its jurisdiction does not import an absolute right in each person to be at all times and in all circumstances wholly free from restraint; that there are manifold restraints to which every person is necessarily subject for the common good; that on any other basis organized society could not exist with safety to its members; that society based on the principle that every man is a law unto himself would soon be confronted with disorder and anarchy; that real liberty could not exist under the operation of a principle that recognizes the right of each individual person to use his own, whether in respect of his person or his property, regardless of the injury that might be done to others; that that court had more than once recognized it as a fundamental principle, that persons and property are subject to all kinds of restraints and burdens, in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state, of the perfect right of the legislature to do which no question was ever raised, nor on general principles ever can be raised, as far as natural persons are concerned. It is said in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13, that the possession and enjoyment of all rights are subject to such reasonable conditions as may be deemed by the governing author-

Cardwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This litigation arises out of the following state of facts: On the 19th day of August, 1889, Geo. W. Gillespie and wife were the owners in fee simple and in the possession of about 400 acres of land in one boundary, situated in the rich lands, on Clinch river, Tazewell county, Virginia; and by deed of that date they conveyed two parcels of the 400 acres, aggregating about 3 acres, to the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, the granting clause being as follows: "Witnesseth, that, in consideration of the said the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company agreeing to erect and maintain a depot on the land conveyed by this deed, the said George W. Gillespie and Barbara E. Gillespie, his wife, do grant unto the said the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company for depot and railway purposes all those two certain tracts, pieces, or parcels of land, lying in Tazewell county, state of Virginia, situate in the rich lands."

The covenants contained in the deed are general, and in this language:

"And the said George W. Gillespie and Barbara E. Gillespie do covenant that they will warrant generally the property hereby conveyed, that they have the right to convey the said lands to the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, that the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company shall have quiet possession of the said lands free from encumbrances, that they will execute such further assurances of the said lands as may be requisite, and that they have done no act to encumber the said lands."

The Norfolk & Western Railway Company claims and holds, under successive conveyances from the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, the title vested in the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company by the deed of August 19, 1889, and, at the point of the location of the land, the railroad had been built, and the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company and its successor to the title has had possession of the land ever since the deed was made in August, 1889, up to the institution of this suit,—or, as one witness says, "ever since it was staked off."

By deed dated April 14, 1890, Gillespie and wife conveyed the remainder of their boundary of the 400 acres of land to the Tazewell Land & Improvement Company, in which conveyance the 3 acres theretofore conveyed to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company are expressly excepted, but the conveyance, after reciting that "the land company had purchased the land conveyed, and are engaged in laying out in a town, and expect to expend large sums of money in the improvement and building up of said town, relying on the said agreement of the N. & W. Rd. Co. to comply with their said contract, to wit, to erect and maintain a depot on said two pieces of land," contains this clause:

"Now, in consideration of the premises, and for the consideration aforesaid, the parties of the first part hereto do hereby grant, assign, and transfer unto the party of the second part hereto, all their right, title, and interest in and to said contract between themselves and said Norfolk and Western Railroad Company. This assignment and transfer of said contract is without recourse on the parties of the first part."

By deed of June 24, 1904, the Tazewell Land & Improvement Company conveyed to R. W. Shreve the land acquired by it under the said deed from Gillespie and wife, which deed to Shreve contains this clause:

"There is also excepted and reserved from this conveyance any right, title, and interest in 3 acres of land in two parcels, conveyed by George W. Gillespie and wife to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company for depot and railroad purposes, by deed dated the 19th day of August, 1889, . . . but the said party of the first part grants, conveys, assigns, and transfers to said Robert W. Shreve, any right, title, claim, or interest which the said party of the first part now holds under and by virtue of the deed from George W. Gillespie and wife to said company, dated the 14th day of April, 1890. . . ."

There has never been any depot house built on the two lots in question, but there was a section house erected on the lots, and switches and sidings placed on them, and the railway company has never refused to build a depot on the premises, but has repeatedly stated that it would do so as soon as the business at that point (the name of which is Doran) was of such magnitude as to warrant it; and this action of ejectment was brought by R. W. Shreve in 1907 against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to recover the possession of the said two parcels of land.

At the trial of the cause, upon the plea of the general issue, not guilty, both parties agreed to submit the matters of law and fact to the judge of the court for decision; and the court at its December term, 1907, rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, to which judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The learned and exhaustive arguments for both plaintiff in error and defendant in error have taken a very much wider range than our view of the case would require, and we shall not attempt to review the numerous authorities to which we have been cited as bearing upon the questions: First, whether the language and stipulations of the deed of August 19, 1889, from Gillespie and wife to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company, constitute and make a condition subsequent, to be performed by defendant in error; and, second, if such is the true construction of the deed, and that condition subsequent has not been performed, but has been broken, has plaintiff in error the right to recover the land in this his action of ejectment?

In our view of the case the primary and controlling question is whether or not the language of the deed, by clear and unmistakable terms, affixes to the grant in the deed a condition subsequent, upon the breach of which the land and the right of re-entry thereon reverted to the grantors, or whether the language of the deed relating to the consideration is a naked promise, and, at most, only a covenant.

It will be observed that the deed in question does not, as is the usual form, affix to the grant a condition subsequent, but the only language used to indicate an intention to attach a condition to the absolute grant of this land to the grantee is that the grant is "in consideration of the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company agreeing to erect and maintain a depot on the land conveyed. . . ." No time is mentioned when this promise or agreement is to be carried out, nor is there any specification as to character or quality of the depot to be erected and maintained; nor is there expressed a reservation of title to the land in the grantors by reversion upon the breach of the promise or agreement made by the grantee, nor any intimation of the right to re-enter upon the land upon the breach of the promise or agreement to erect or maintain a depot on the premises.

In the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error it is conceded to be too well settled to admit of citation of authority that "conditions subsequent are not favored in law, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) and are construed strictly because they tend to destroy estates; and the vigorous exacting of them is a species summum jus, and in many cases hardly reconcilable with conscience."

It is also recognized that, "in the construction of every instrument where the courts are asked to say whether the language used creates a covenant or a condition, the intention of the parties governs. If the parties to the instrument say upon its face that there is to be forfeiture if its terms are not complied with, then the forfeiture is declared regardless of results; and the converse is equally true."

So, as stated in Union Stockyards Co. v. Nashville Packing Co. 72 C. C. A. 195, 140 Fed. 701, in determining the intention of the parties, and whether the terms of the instrument create a covenant or a condition, it becomes necessary to consider "the language employed, the situation of the parties, their relation to the subject of the transaction, and the object in view."

We have already adverted to the language employed in the deed, and we will now look in that connection to "the situation of the parties, their relation to the subject of the transaction, and the object in view."

The undisputed and pertinent facts to be considered in this connection are that, shortly after the Clinch Valley Division of the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company was completed, there was some indication that a depot would be needed at Doran. The railroad company was looking out for a place to locate the depot when it became necessary to erect it, and Gillespie, under whom plaintiff in error claims, who owned, as stated, about 400 acres of land at that place, conceiving the idea, doubtless, that a town might be laid out and built up there, making a depot at Doran not only desirable, but necessary, offered to give the railroad company a lot of land necessary for the railroad's purposes, if it would erect and maintain a depot there, and the railroad company accepted the proposition, and a deed was drawn to that effect. This is, as counsel for plaintiff in error say, the plain import of the language used in the deed; and they further say "that a depot was not necessary at the time the conveyance was made, and perhaps has not been necessary since, is claimed by the company and established by the record." In other words, Gillespie voluntarily offered to give the land needed for a depot at Doran, and the railroad company accepted the offer; the only binding effect being predicated upon the promise or covenant on the part of the railroad company to build and maintain the depot when the conditions at that point, in the economical and successful operation of the railroad as a public service corporation, required it.

As counsel for plaintiff in error further say, "both parties to the deed knew that railroad companies could only erect depots at those places where the needs of the public required them," and the point at Doran was not an exception to that rule. But, although the loss to Gillespie of the increase in the value of the residue of his 400-acre tract of land, resulting from the public needs not requiring a depot at Doran, may be ever so great, this does not so change the rule of construction of his deed, under which plaintiff in error seeks to maintain this action of ejectment to recover the land conveyed. Neither the language of the deed in question nor the subsequent conveyance of the residue of the 400-acre tract of land indicates an intention on the part of Gillespie that the title to the 3 acres conveyed to the railroad company for a depot site should revert to him in the event that no depot was built thereon. Not only is there no language used in his deed to the railroad company to declare a forfeiture in that event, but, when read in the light of his subsequent conveyance to the land company, in which he expressly excepts therefrom the 3 acres theretofore conveyed to the railroad company, and only assigns to the land company such right, title, or interest as he had "in and to said contract between themselves and the said Norfolk & Western Railroad Company," and this "assignment and transfer" too "without recourse" to the grantors, it cannot be doubted that Gillespie regarded that he only held a covenant on the part of the railroad company to erect and maintain a depot at Doran, and did not consider that the title and possession of the land would revert to him in the event that the public needs did not warrant the erection and maintenance of the depot contemplated. If such was not the construction of the conveyance, as understood by the grantors, it is inconceivable that they would have omitted therefrom language plainly declaring that the title and possession of the land conveyed was to revert to them in the event that a depot was not erected and maintained on the land granted.

Almost the identical question presented here—i. e., the comparative weight and standing to be given in a court of law to a promise or covenant and a condition subsequent—was considered by this court in King v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 99 Va. 625, 39 S. E. 701, and there the stipulations in the conveyance which were the subject of litigation were construed as covenants, and not conditions. The court, speaking through Harrison, J., and after a statement as to the contentions of the parties and the settled rule 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) of law governing in construing the conveyances, said: "We are of opinion that the language employed in the deeds under consideration is apt language to create a fee simple, and that the superadded words under the authorities amount to covenants rather than conditions. The deeds are not voluntary, as contended, but are based upon the benefits to accrue to the reserved property of the grantor by reason of the use of the granted premises as a railroad terminal. Hence they must be interpreted as any other deeds based upon a valuable consideration. The language is to be taken most strongly against the grantor, and most favorably to the grantee."

The features of the conveyance under consideration in that case were stronger in favor of a construction that a condition, and not a covenant, was intended by the contracting parties, than are those contained in the deed we now have under consideration. In fact, the language in the deed before us in apt words creates a fee simple in the land granted, and there are no superadded words declaring, in express terms or by clear implication, or in any terms whatever, that the nonperformance of the promise and agreement of the grantee stated to be the consideration moving the grantors to make the conveyance should operate as a forfeiture of the land, giving the grantors the right to re-enter and possess themselves of it. In such a case, as is also stated in the opinion just cited, the courts will incline to construe the language of the deed as creating only a covenant, and not a condition, thus adopting the more benignant construction upholding the instrument, and leaving the parties to pursue their appropriate remedies for a breach of covenant.

The principles of law adverted to are fully recognized in Lowman v. Crawford, 99 Va. 688, 40 S. E. 17, and in Alexandria & W. R. Co. v. Chew, 27 Gratt. 547, where they are discussed at some length; the opinion saying: "When the grantor seeks to destroy an estate which he himself has created, it must plainly appear that the act is within the very terms of the condition and breach. It is not sufficient to show mischiefs and even losses which might have been provided against, had they been foreseen. The fact that they were not and could not have been anticipated may be a sufficient reason for the failure to provide a remedy; but they cannot justify the courts in so enlarging the operation of the covenant as to make them a ground of forfeiture."

They are discussed, also, by the leading text writers and commentators of the law, and the uniform view taken is in accord with the decided cases mentioned above and to follow. 1 Sharswood & B. Am. Law of Real Prop. pp. 123 et seq.; 4 Kent, Com. 2d ed. pp. 122-129; 2 Minor, Inst. 4th ed. pp. 265, 266; 2 Minor, Real Prop. § 529; 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 970, and notes.

In Greene v. O'Connor, 18 R. I. 56, 19 L.R.A. 262, 25 Atl. 692, the deed conveying land contained these words: "This conveyance is made upon the condition that the said strip of land shall be forever kept open and used as a public highway and for no other purpose." Held to create a covenant, and not a condition subsequent, as claimed by the plaintiff; the opinion saying: "The clause in question is merely a declaration of the purpose for which the land conveyed was to be used and improved, to wit, as a public highway. It contains no language which imports that the grant shall be void in case the purpose for which the land is conveyed is not carried out, nor does it reserve to the grantors and their heirs the right in that event to re-enter on the land and resume possession of it as of their former estate. Moreover, the purpose declared is in its nature general and public, and not one inuring specially to the benefit of the grantors. Such a declaration does not create an estate on condition, but merely imposes a confidence or trust on the land, or raises an implied agreement on the part of the grantee to use the land for the purpose specified."

It is very true that the court in that case quotes the statute governing such conveyances, but that fact does not detract from the force of the discussion of the general principles controlling in determining whether the language used in a conveyance of land should be construed as creating a covenant or a condition subsequent.

In Rawson v. School Dist. No. 5, 7 Allen, 125, 83 Am. Dec. 670, in the opinion by the court, Bigelow, Ch. J., after stating that a deed will not be construed to create an estate on condition, unless language is used which, according to the rules of law eo proprio vigore, imports a condition, or the intent of the grantor to make a conditional estate is otherwise clearly and unequivocally indicated, and that conditions are not to be raised readily by inference or argument, says: "We believe there is no authoritative sanction for the doctrine that a deed is to be construed as a grant on a condition subsequent solely for the reason that it contains a clause declaring the purpose for which it is intended the granted premises shall be used, where such purpose will not inure specially to the benefit of the grantor and his assigns, but is in its nature general and public, and where there are no other words indicating an intent that the grant is to be void if the declared purpose is not fulfilled."

"If it be asked whether the law will give any force to the words in a deed which declare that the grant is made for a specific purpose or to accomplish a particular object, the answer is that they may, if properly expressed, create a confidence or trust, or amount to a covenant or agreement on the part of the grantee. Thus, it is said in Norfolk's Case, 2 Dyer, 138b, that the words 'ea intentione' do not make a condition, but a confidence and trust. See also Parish v. Whitney, 3 Gray, 516, and Newell v. Hill, 2 Met. 180, and cases cited. But, whether this be so or not, the absence of any right or remedy in favor of the grantor under such a grant, to enforce the appropriation of land to the specific purpose for which it was conveyed, will not of itself make that a condition, which is not so framed as to warrant in law that interpretation. An estate cannot be made defeasible on a condition subsequent by construction founded on an argument ab inconvenienti only, or on considerations of supposed hardship, or want of equity."

We are of opinion that the deed under review does not admit of the construction contended for by plaintiff in error, but that its language creates only an agreement or covenant on the part of the grantee, and that the judgment of the circuit court in favor of defendant in error in this action of ejectment is plainly right.

Having taken this view of the case, it is unnecessary to consider the remaining question, whether, upon the breach of a condition subsequent annexed to a grant of land, an assignee of the grantor's right to recover the land can maintain an action of ejectment.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

HAL. W. DEPUE et al., Appts.,
v.

H. W. MILLER et al.

(— W. Va. —, 64 S. E. 740.)

Husband and wife — conveyances between — title.

1. If a husband convey land directly to his wife, and she, in turn, attempt to re-convey it directly to him by executing a deed to him, and after her death he convey it to a third person, and then die, the equitable title is in the heirs of the wife by descent, and the legal title in such third person or his successors in title.

Headnotes by POFFENBARGER, J.

Appeal — demurrer — grounds — decision — presumption.

2. A general demurrer to a bill in equity challenges its sufficiency in all respects, and a decree sustaining such a demurrer is presumed, in the appellate court, to rest upon any sufficient ground disclosed by the bill, even though it was not assigned in writing as a ground of demurrer, while others not well taken were.

Same — correct decision — wrong reason — effect.

3. A sound decree sustaining a demurrer should not be reversed merely because the trial court assigned an erroneous or incorrect reason therefor.

Equity — jurisdiction — equitable title.

4. A purely equitable title cannot be maintained in a court of law, and, for that reason, all relief respecting the same must be sought in a court of equity.

Limitation of actions — equitable right.

5. The statute of limitations never runs against a right, the vindication of which belongs to the exclusive jurisdiction of the equity courts.

Equity — adverse possession — legal estates — recognition.

6. Courts of equity recognize legal estates and titles, and in such courts such titles prevail over equitable ones. A title to land acquired by adverse possession is respected in courts of equity as well as in courts of law.

Same — laches — equitable demand.

7. Laches will bar a purely equitable demand, and the period of delay allowed depends upon the peculiar circumstances of the case.

Same — circumstances barring.

8. If the right of the plaintiff is clear, and not dependent upon oral evidence, and no injury or prejudice to the defendant has resulted from the delay, as by the death of parties, change of conditions, loss of evidence, or the like, the cause of action is not barred by laches, unless the lapse of time and the circumstances are such as to raise a presumption of intent, on the part of the plaintiff, to abandon or relinquish the right.

Same — abandonment of rights.

9. Mere forbearance to compel rendition of a just debt or other right, the existence of which is clear beyond doubt, does not prejudice the party from whom it is due, and it is not inequitable to enforce rendition thereof after long delay; but, if the length of time be long enough in itself, or with the aid of circumstances and conduct, to satisfy the chancellor that the plaintiff had abandoned his right before he brought suit to enforce it, his demand will be regarded as stale and lost by laches.

Same — period of delay.

10. Delay for a period less than twenty years in the assertion of an exclusively equitable demand, fully proven by documentary evidence, under circumstances not in any way operating to the prejudice of the defendants, and tending to negative the inference of intent on the part of the plaintiff to abandon or relinquish the right, will not bar relief.

Same — determining factors.

11. Moral as well as legal considerations, such as ignorance of law or regard for the feelings of relatives, will be considered and given weight in determining whether the plaintiff has abandoned his cause of action; but such considerations do not relieve from, or stay, the statute of limitations, nor excuse delay working prejudice by death of parties, loss of evidence, or other similar circumstances.

Curtesy — land settled on wife.

12. A husband has an estate by the curtesy, after the death of his wife, in lands which he had voluntarily settled upon her, if he did not, in express terms or by plain implication, relinquish such right in the instrument of conveyance.

Same — presumption.

13. As the husband's estate by the curtesy in his wife's real estate is given by the law for reasons of public policy, and not created by contract between the husband and wife, no presumption of intention to preclude it arises from the mere fact of a conveyance from the former to the latter, however it may have been effected.

Equity — multifariousness of bill — facts considered.

14. If, under the circumstances stated in point 1 of this syllabus, the husband, after the death of the wife, has conveyed a portion of the land to persons who have, in turn, conveyed it in separate portions to others, so that it constitutes two tracts

Case Note. — Husband's right of curtesy in land which he settled upon or conveyed to his wife.

The general question of the effect of a conveyance by husband to wife is treated in the note to Barnum v. LeMaster, 69 L.R.A. 353, in which (at page 375) will be found collected the earlier cases involving the particular phase of such general subject here offered for discussion. From the decisions therein cited there would seem to be some conflict upon the question, but the few late cases that can be found agree in holding that a conveyance to the wife by the husband for her sole and separate use will not defeat his right to curtesy upon her death. Re Kaufmann, 142 Fed. 898; Hughes v. Saffell (Ky.) 119 S. W. 804.

And the same rule of law was applied in Williams v. Coffman, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 151, 101 S. W. 919, and the right to curtesy held not to be defeated by an agreement between the husband and wife in settlement of a suit for divorce and alimony brought by her, wherein it was stipulated that the wife was to have full control of certain land and to handle the same as she thought best for the interest of the family, free from the control of the husband.

claimed by different persons, the heirs may assert their rights as to both of such tracts against all the interested parties in a single suit.

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Roane County sustaining a demurrer to the bill in a suit to cancel certain deeds alleged to constitute clouds on title, and for an accounting for timber alleged to have been wrongfully taken. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cunningham & Harper for appellants.

Messrs. Pendleton & Boggess, for appellees:

The plaintiffs had a complete remedy at law by ejectment or unlawful detainer, and equity has no jurisdiction of the matters contained in the bill.

On petition for rehearing.

The conveyance of real estate by a husband direct to his wife, though void in law, is valid in equity, and vests in the wife both the legal and the equitable title to the land, as of her separate estate, in which the husband, the wife being dead, is not entitled to curtesy.

Poffenbarger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the circuit court of Roane county a demurrer to the bill of Hal. W. Depue and others, heirs at law of Henry Depue, was sustained and the bill dismissed. From this decree the plaintiffs have appealed.

The object of the suit is the cancellation of a number of deeds, to clear the alleged title of the plaintiffs from cloud, and obtain an accounting for timber taken from the land. They are out of possession, but the bill proceeds upon the theory of an equitable title only in the plaintiffs, which will not sustain an action at law for the recovery of possession. The facts alleged are substantially as follows: The ancestor being the owner of two tracts of land, the home place, containing 275 acres, and the Ward land, containing 433 acres, made a deed, on the 21st day of December, 1880, by which he conveyed both of said tracts directly to his wife, Anna

B. C. Depue. Thereafter they resided together on the home place, until the death of the wife about July 19, 1889; but on the 25th day of May, 1889, about two months before her death, the wife attempted directly to reconvey all the land back to her husband. In neither transaction was there a conveyance from both husband and wife to a trustee and then a conveyance by the trustee back to one of them. More than two years after the death of the wife, the husband, by deed, dated October 2, 1891, conveyed 103 acres out of the 433-acre tract to Julia A. Bridwell and Walter Bridwell. On the 9th day of June, 1892, the Bridwells conveyed to John C. and Ira S. Bartlett 35¼ acres of the land so conveyed to them. On the residue thereof they executed a deed of trust to Walter Pendleton, trustee, to secure a debt due to H. W. Miller, under which it was sold, Miller purchasing it. On February 23, 1903, the Bartletts conveyed their part of the 103-acre tract and some other land to Sidney Wine, who has possession thereof, while the other is in the possession of Miller. Both tracts have been denuded of their timber by these purchasers. Henry Depue died about the 3d day of January, 1907, and this suit was commenced on the 16th day of February, 1907.

If it shall appear that the plaintiffs have only an equitable title to the land, a court of equity is the only forum in which it can be vindicated, and the bill should have been entertained, unless it is multifarious or relief is barred by laches. No other conceivable grounds of defense appear on its face. If, on the contrary, they have the legal title, giving a right of action at law, they have no standing in a court of equity to recover possession, for they do not need its aid, nor to remove a cloud from the title, because they are out of possession. In order to maintain a bill to remove cloud from title, the plaintiff must have not only the legal title, but possession of the land as well. Mackey v. Maxim, 63 W. Va. 14, 59 S. E. 742; Harr v. Shaffer, 45 W. Va. 709, 31 S. E. 905; Smith v. O'Keefe, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. 353; Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682.

Indubitably, the deed from Henry Depue to his wife vested in her the equitable title to the land (McKenzie v. Ohio River R. Co. 27 W. Va. 306), and the deed from the wife back to the husband was utterly void (Smith v. Vineyard, 58 W. Va. 98, 51 S. E. 871; Austin v. Brown, 37 W. Va. 634, 17 S. E. 207; Cecil v. Clark, 44 W. Va. 659, 30 S. E. 216). Obviously at the date of the death of the wife, she held the equitable title and the husband the legal title. On her death the former went to the plaintiffs by descent. If the legal title remained in the husband until his death, it also passed to them on his death, and, the legal and equitable titles being so united in them, their remedy at law would be clear and adequate; but, as to the land involved here, he conveyed that title to the Bridwells, long before he died. Though he may have had no moral right to do so, he had the power, and did it. Though the conveyance was in violation of the trust, he made it, and his deed passed such title as he had. Atkinson v. Washington & J. College, 54 W. Va. 32, 43, 46 S. E. 253; Patteson v. Horsley, 29 Gratt. 263. This being true, the legal and beneficial estates remained separate after the death of Henry Depue, the former in the hands of the grantees, immediate and remote, and the latter in the hands of the heirs; and we have the situation presented in the case of Blake v. O'Neal, 63 W. Va. 483, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1147, 61 S. E. 410. Not having the legal title, the plaintiffs are utterly unable to obtain standing in a court of law to test the right of possession and title, and are wholly without remedy elsewhere than in a court of equity. In all such cases there is of necessity jurisdiction in equity. Moore v. McNutt, 41 W. Va. 695, 24 S. E. 682; Blake v. O'Neal, supra; Kinports v. Rawson, 36 W. Va. 242, 15 S. E. 66; Swick v. Rease, 62 W. Va. 557, 560, 59 S. E. 510.

Multifariousness charged against the bill would preclude an adjudication on the merits, if sustained; but we are of the opinion that the plaintiffs could properly proceed against both tracts of land in one suit. Their demand as to each is founded upon the same title, and the primary relief sought as to each is the same. The differences relate merely to the parties defendant and the subsidiary or sequential matter of accounting. Moore v. McNutt, supra, has been invoked as a precedent applying the doctrine of multifariousness under the conditions here presented; but there are material differences which comparison will reveal. All the defendants are alike interested in the vital questions presented—title, appropriateness of the remedy, and sufficiency of the bill. In Moore v. McNutt, the titles were strange and hostile. We think Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. 619, 11 L. ed. 402, in which the objection was overruled, is more in accord with this case in its facts, circumstances, and relation of parties.

More than fifteen years elapsed between the date of the deed to the Bridwells and the bringing of this suit, and on this disclosure the defense of laches is asserted here in argument, but was not brought to the attention of the court below by any written assignment thereof as a ground of demurrer. That this defense may be raised in this state by a demurrer has been long since firmly 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) settled. Whittaker v. Southwest Virginia Improv. Co. 34 W. Va. 217, 12 S. E. 507; Hogg, Equity Principles, p. 419; Hogg, Eq. Proc. § 304. Failure to assign laches as a ground of demurrer is made the basis of a contention that it was not passed upon by the trial court. The statutory rule declared in § 29 of chapter 125 of the Code of 1899 (Code 1906, § 3849) would not apply for the reason that certain other grounds were assigned, if it were ever applicable to demurrers in equity; but it affects only demurrers at law. Hays v. Heatherly, 36 W. Va. 613, 619, 15 S. E. 223. No causes of demurrer need be assigned in equity cases. It suffices to say the bill is not sufficient in law. Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. 468. As such a demurrer challenges the sufficiency of the bill, it makes all the reasons available on the hearing. The trial court sustained the demurrer to this bill, because, in its opinion, there is an adequate remedy at law, as we perceive from the terms of the decree, saving to the plaintiffs their right of action at law. While this, as we have indicated, was an erroneous view of the status of the parties, it amounts only to the assignment of an erroneous reason for a correct decree, if the bar of laches exists, which does not vitiate it. If the judgment, decision, or ruling of the trial court is correct on any legal ground, it will be affirmed, although the reasons assigned by the court below are erroneous. Ballard v. Chewning, 49 W. Va. 508, 39 S. E. 170; Easley v. Craddock, 4 Rand. (Va.) 423; Newell v. Wood, 1 Munf. 555; Silsby v. Foote, 14 How. 219, 14 L. ed. 394; Corning v. Troy Iron & Nail Factory, 15 How. 451, 14 L. ed. 768. A correct ruling upon a demurrer will be sustained, though an insufficient reason for it has been stated. Tatum v. Tatum, 111 Ala. 209, 20 So. 341; Sechrist v. Rialto Irrig. Dist. 129 Cal. 640, 62 Pac. 261.

Having concluded, upon the authorities and principles above stated, that the defense of laches was raised by the demurrer, it becomes necessary to determine whether it appears upon the face of the bill. The demand is purely an equitable one. In other words, it is cognizable only in a court of equity as we have stated. The statute of limitations therefore does not apply, and in such cases courts of equity do not recognize, and are not controlled by, the period of limitation fixed by the statute. Newberger v. Wells, 51 W. Va. 624, 42 S. E. 625. Whether relief in equity is precluded by the delay is determined by the court, in such cases, according to equitable rules and principles. Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 594. The bill presents no element of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, respecting the equitable title. They derived that by inheritance from their mother, who was no party to the deed executed to the Bridwells. The defendants contracted with the father alone. An allegation in the bill indicates the existence of an impression or belief, on the part of the plaintiffs, that they had no right of action or remedy at law or in equity until after the death of their father, and, under the principles declared in McNeeley v. South Penn Oil Co. 52 W. Va. 616, 63 L.R.A. 502, 44 S. E. 508, they were not bound to sue until after the death of the father, if he had an estate by the curtesy in the land. Having voluntarily settled the land upon his wife, by the deed executed to her, he had no such estate, as tested by certain Virginia decisions. Sayers v. Wall, 26 Gratt. 354, 21 Am. Rep. 303; Irvine v. Greever, 32 Gratt. 411; Dugger v. Dugger, 84 Va. 130, 4 S. E. 171; Jones v. Jones, 96 Va. 753, 32 S. E. 463; Ratliff v. Ratliff, 102 Va. 887, 47 S. E. 1007. However, none of these decisions are binding upon us, and they are against the great weight of authority throughout the country. In no other state, so far as we have observed, do the courts so hold. There are some decisions construing deeds and wills in which the terms used plainly indicate intention to exclude the husband from curtesy, and give effect to such intent. Rigler v. Cloud, 14 Pa. 361; Stokes v. McKibbin, 13 Pa. 267; McCulloch v. Valentine, 24 Neb. 215, 38 N. W. 854; Pool v. Blakie, 53 Ill. 495. But when there are no such terms in the deed from husband to wife or to a trustee for her separate use, he is not deprived of his curtesy anywhere except in Virginia. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 522; Ogden v. Ogden, 60 Ark. 70, 46 Am. St. Rep. 151, 28 S. W. 796; Deming v. Miles, 35 Neb. 739, 37 Am. St. Rep. 464, 53 N. W. 685; Tremmel v. Kleiboldt, 6 Mo. App. 549, affirmed in 75 Mo. 255; Soltan v. Soltan, 93 Mo. 307, 6 S. W. 95; Meacham v. Bunting, 156 Ill. 586, 28 L.R.A. 618, 47 Am. St. Rep. 239, 41 N. E. 175; Kerr, Real Prop. p. 682, § 860; 12 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1010, 1011.

Curtesy is an estate given by the law for weighty reasons of public policy, not by mere contract. It aids the father in maintaining, caring for, and controlling his children in case of the death of the mother. Such power is given for public as well as private benefit. Believing the general rule more consonant with reason and the principles of law, and better sustained by authority, than that declared by the Virginia court, we adopt it and hold that the grantor in the deed under consideration did not relinquish his curtesy. Reputable courts have held that, under such circumstances as are disclosed here, the remainderman may sue in equity to remove cloud from his title before the expiration of the life estate. Hogan v. Kurtz, 94 U. S. 773, 24 L. ed. 317; Robinson v. Pierce, 118 Ala. 273, 45 L.R.A. 66, 72 Am. St. Rep. 160, 24 So. 984; Wright v. Miller, 8 N. Y. 9, 59 Am. Dec. 438. There may be authority to the contrary; but, granting, for the sake of argument, that the reversioners could have sued in equity to cancel the deed to the Bridwells, as a cloud on their title, their impression that they could not do so was no misapprehension or ignorance respecting any matter of fact, and, though ignorance of law does not excuse anybody's conduct, it bears on the question of intention of the parties, so far as that may be material. They brought their suit promptly after the death of the father. He died in January, 1907, and this suit was brought in February, 1907. The relationship of parents and children existed. The plaintiffs were once infants, we know. When they became adults, the bill does not disclose. They may have been under the disability of infancy during the greater portion, or practically all, of the period of delay. We perceive also that the relation subsisting between them and their father and the defendants may, and most likely did, influence their conduct. No suit could have been instituted by them without involving him. Successful prosecution thereof might have precipitated an action against him for breach of his covenant of warranty. They might have been decidedly averse to involving him in trouble and annoyance, and so delayed action until after his death, without any intention to relinquish their right. It is apparent that all the material facts are not disclosed by the bill. It is equally obvious, considering the allegations of that paper, that no element of estoppel or loss of material evidence exists. The defendants do not appear to have improved the land or expended money on it on the faith of the silence of the plaintiffs; nor does it appear that any change has taken place which made it inequitable upon their part to refrain from assertion of their rights. The right involved is disclosed by documentary evidence. Nothing is dependent upon oral testimony. The vital question is purely legal.

Under these circumstances, many of the principles of the doctrine of laches are inapplicable. The case is one in which the only circumstance relied upon is lapse of time, and this is accompanied by other circumstances tending to negative the existence of any intention to abandon or relinquish the claim. Elements savoring of estoppel or loss of evidence, when they exist, reduce the length of time and apply the bar of laches after the lapse of a very short period. Under some circumstances, delay of only a few months, or even a few weeks, suffices; but these short periods are never adopted in the absence of such or similar circumstances. In the case of Cranmer v. McSwords, 24 W. Va. 594, Judge Snyder made an exhaustive examination of the authorities bearing on this question, and, after having done so, said that when none of these elements—death of parties, loss of evidence, or dependence upon oral testimony for the ascertainment of the rights of the parties—exists, and the court is satisfied that justice can be certainly attained notwithstanding the lapse of time, relief has been granted after a period longer than twenty years. In the syllabus of that case the court said: "If important facts rest upon mere parol testimony, this will be a consideration of much weight; but if upon written or documentary evidence, it will be entitled to very little weight." The same doctrine was enunciated in Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 469. In that case the effect of mere lapse of time, without more, was ascertained and declared. In point 7 of the syllabus the court said: "Lapse of time, when it does not operate as a positive statutory bar, operates in equity as an evidence of assent, acquiescence, or waiver." That proposition was deduced by a very able author from the English decisions. Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 305. Among the cases cited for it is that of Pickering v. Stamford, 2 Ves. Jr. 582, in which heirs were allowed to recover from trustees after a lapse of thirty years. The time and all the circumstances were considered, and, as it was found that nobody had been prejudiced by the delay, the further and vital inquiry was whether it appeared that the plaintiffs intended to relinquish or abandon their right. Like the plaintiffs in this case, they had been under an erroneous impression as to the state of the law. The master of the rolls said: "Upon full consideration I am satisfied that it is impossible, by any fair presumption, to infer that these parties, being cognizant of their rights, slept upon them, or ever intended to relinquish what I must say upon the whole complexion of the case they never knew they had a right to. That is a presumption the circumstances almost afford, for, if they had released, it is impossible not to suppose the trustees, who have kept such accurate accounts, would have had a release from them of this right as well as of their legacies and as well as they had from the heir. The law was very little known. Sir John Strange first determined it about fourteen years after the statute. If before that time parties not knowing the law had permitted the trustees to dispose of the property, I think a court of equity would not have punished them: This will was made seven years afterwards. All the circumstances show the parties did not know it. . . . No jury could, I think, infer that this demand was released. If that is so, the next question is, What inconvenience would arise, that ought to bar. The plaintiffs do not demand the interest already distributed through their default. If the accounts of the personal estate could not be now obtained, and it was impossible to know to what the plaintiffs were entitled, that is a sufficient reason for saying they should not have it, and rob the charity, because they could not tell what belonged to them and what to the charity; but that is unfortunately not the case. Then the only inconvenience will be that the charity will now cease to have the benefit of so much. That is certainly to be lamented, but it will not involve any person in difficulties to be attributed to the neglect of the plaintiffs. Therefore desiring to be understood by no means to give any countenance to these stale demands any more than I did in Hercy v. Dinwoody, 2 Ves. Jr. 87, or Lord Camden in Smith v. Clay, Amb. 645, or Lord Thurlow in Deloraine v. Browne, 3 Bro. Ch. 633, but upon the circumstances that there is nothing inducing great public or private inconvenience, that the accounts are found, and that the trustees are not called on to account for what has been disbursed, I am bound to decide in favor of the plaintiffs."

The whole doctrine of laches, as it is understood and applied in this country, was developed by the English decisions. The opinion just quoted from reviews and analyzes the former decisions rendered by Lords Camden and Thurlow, and clearly points out all the elements of it. It shows that, when nothing appears but lapse of time and circumstances not working prejudice or injury to the defendant in case relief should be granted, the only inquiry is whether, in view of all the facts, the plaintiffs have abandoned or relinquished their right. Substantially this doctrine was stated in Hale v. Hale, 62 W. Va. 609, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 221, 59 S. E. 1056. It is also asserted and applied in Southern R. Co. v. Gregg, 101 Va. 308, 43 S. E. 570, holding as follows: "Laches is only permitted to defeat an acknowledged right on the ground that it affords evidence of the abandonment of the right. The doctrine therefore can have no application to a case where a demand has been continuously asserted and as continuously acknowledged." In Bell v. Wood, 94 Va. 677, 27 S. E. 504, the court said: "Generally, if the sum sought to be recovered is certain, the transaction has not become obscure, and there has been no such loss of evidence as will be likely to produce injustice, a court of equity will not refuse relief lot were devised. Said objections were filed February 7, 1905. On January 26, 1905, all of the children named in the will, except the son Henry Dardis, who had predeceased his father, unmarried, entered into a stipulation to the following effect: "We, the undersigned, being all of the heirs at law and next of kin of the above-named James M. Dardis, deceased, and all being of full age and under no legal disability, having learned that said Dardis having in his lifetime made a last will and testament bearing date November 21, 1904, and having further learned that said last will has been presented and filed with the county judge of Racine county, Wisconsin, for probate, the hearing for which is set for February 7th inst., do hereby consent, stipulate, and agree that, at the time of the making of the said last will and testament, the said James M. Dardis, deceased, was not mentally competent to make the same, being an old man, and, for several years prior to the making of said will, his mental faculties had become impaired, and in justice to the court and to ourselves we make this stipulation and statement. And we further stipulate and agree that in case the probate of said will is refused, either by virtue of this stipulation or otherwise, letters of administration upon the estate of the said James M. Dardis, deceased, may, by the county court for Racine county, be issued to John T. Lee, of Corliss, Racine county, Wisconsin, being the same person named as executor of the said will, hereby releasing and renouncing our and each of our rights to said administration, hereby waiving the publication of any notice therefor, or the running of any time thereon, as required by law and the rules and practice of this court, to the end that, when said administration is granted as aforesaid, it shall have the same force and effect as if done after full publication had been made therefor, and the time had run thereon, as required by law and the rules and practice of this court. It is stipulated and agreed by and between the heirs of the said James M. Dardis, deceased, as aforesaid, that, after all the debts and obligations against said estate are fully satisfied, that any advancement made to any child or children of said deceased shall be deducted and taken from their distributive share of said estate. And it is further stipulated and agreed that Susie Thayer, one of the children of the said James M. Dardis, deceased, shall have and receive from said estate, in addition to her distributive share, the sum of $50, being an advancement made to her tate, and that the trustee could be compelled to execute such settlement.

In Carter v. Owens, 41 Ala. 217, in sustaining the title to a chose in action of the deceased and the right to sue thereon, although received by plaintiff under a settlement of decedent's estate made to prevent the probate of his will, the court said: "All the parties interested or to be affected may as well by agreement divide property where there is a will, without employing the agency of courts, as in case of intestacy. Parties competent to act ought to do that, without the agency of courts, which the courts would ultimately accomplish. To deny them the privilege of so doing would manifest a judicial abhorrence of harmony. By the probate of the will, the claims of heirs and distributees and of the widow would have been subordinated to the directions of the will. This has been accomplished by agreement. There being no debts, the executrix would have had no other duty to perform than to divide the property according to the will. This, too, has been done by agreement of competent parties. All the ends and objects of judicial proceedings have been accomplished by agreement of the parties; and that agreement must be effective."

See also Re McNamara, 154 Mich. 671, 118 N. W. 598, which held that a party to an agreement to induce the executor to discontinue his proceedings to appeal from an order of the probate court denying probate to a will was estopped to question the validity of this agreement.

The court in RE DARDIS cites Syme v. Broughton, 85 N. C. 367; Hutson v. Sawyer, 104 N. C. 1, 10 S. E. 85; Re Young, 123 N. C. 358, 31 S. E. 626, in support of its position. These cases however go only to the extent of holding that the proponent of a will, in order to avoid an adverse judgment and apparently for the purpose of repropounding the will, cannot submit to a nonsuit therein or discontinue the same. In addition to the foregoing cases the following cases also sustain this proposition: St. John's Lodge No. 1 v. Callender, 26 N. C. (4 Ired. L.) 335; Collins v. Collins, 125 N. C. 98, 34 S. E. 195; McMahon v. McMahon, 100 Mo. 97, 13 S. W. 208.

But see Crow v. Blakey, 31 Ala. 728; Re Leonard (N. J.) 47 Atl. 222; Heermans v. Hill, 2 Hun, 409, which hold that a surrogate or probate court has the power to permit the proponent of a will to withdraw it and discontinue the probate proceedings. In Re Leonard, the proponent was allowed to discontinue proceedings after citations had been issued, it appearing that they were void because mistakenly made returnable on a day already past.

The DARDIS CASE finds some support in an obiter statement of the court in Re Carpenter, 127 Cal. 582, 60 Pac. 162, to the effect that the matter of the probate of a will is a proceeding in rem, binding on the whole world, and a few individuals claiming to be the heirs cannot by stipulation determine the controversy.

father during his lifetime, and also shall have and receive, in addition to her distributive share, the sum of $6 per week during the weeks she cared for her said father during his last sickness. This stipulation and agreement is made by all the heirs of the said James M. Dardis, deceased, with full power and knowledge of its contents, and with the intention and desire to settle said estate quickly and amicably, and to avoid litigation, trouble, and expense." On February 7, 1905, they followed this by another stipulation containing many of the provisions of the former, but also stipulating and agreeing that said instrument be disallowed, and the probate thereof by said county court be denied, but giving no reason therefor. This second stipulation had appended to it the following consent by Lee, the proponent: "I, John T. Lee, proponent of the instrument mentioned in the foregoing stipulation and agreement, and the person named therein as executor, do hereby consent to all and singular the terms of said stipulation, and do consent and agree that said instrument may be disallowed, and the probate thereof denied by said county court." Upon the return day of the notice, the subscribing witnesses attended and testified to the making of the will, the obvious sanity of the testator, and his apparent freedom from influence. The county court thereupon admitted the will to probate, adjudged it to be the valid will of the deceased, and appointed Lee executor. From that order, or, rather, the part thereof admitting the will to probate, the daughter Mary Esmond appealed to the circuit court. When the case was reached in circuit court Mary Esmond had died, leaving minor heirs succeeding her. The circuit court tried the subject de novo, no evidence to attack the validity of the will being introduced except said stipulations in circuit court, finding the testator sane and free from undue influence and the formal execution of the will to be in accordance with law, and affirmed the judgment of the county court. From said judgment of affirmance, six of the sons and daughters appeal.

Messrs. Simmons, Nelson, & Walker, for appellants:

All parties to a controversy, being sui juris, can bind themselves by stipulation, either as to the existence of a fact material to such controversy, or as to the judgment to be entered by the court having jurisdiction thereof.

Dodge, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The very earnest contention of appellants that, when all parties to a litigation stipulate or consent to certain action by the court, such stipulation should be carried into effect, is undoubtedly correct as a general proposition, though obviously with some limitations. For example, a court could not be compelled to stultify itself by solemnly adjudging an absurdity or a falsehood because parties stipulated for such act. Independently, however, of whether a court must always solemnly adjudicate a fact agreed on by all parties in interest, doubtless it should give effect to a stipulation so far as it affects the individual rights of the parties thereto. It is also doubtless true that parties to any proceeding, although not all the parties, may by their stipulation or consent preclude themselves individually from setting up any rights in opposition to such stipulation. The trouble, however, with appellants' position in this case is that no stipulation was presented to the court signed by all parties in interest. The probate of a will is a proceeding in rem, to which all the world are in some sense parties. Of course, like any other such proceeding, it also affects specific individuals, and therefore is inter partes as to such individuals. But in addition to its effect upon the rights either of the heirs of the alleged testator or of the legatees, the adjudication of the question whether a given script is or is not the will of the decedent may affect many other rights and interests which cannot be ascertained in advance of such adjudication. True, for example, any will devising real estate takes effect at the death of the testator, and may, at the moment of such death, create actual vested rights qr liens in judgment creditors of the devisee. Scott v. West, 63 Wis. 529, 24 N. W. 161, 25 N. W. 18; Re Langevin, 45 Minn. 429, 47 N. W. 1133. Upon probate of the will there is no opportunity to ascertain whether such rights exist, but the holders of them are parties to the proceeding in the sense that they are bound by the adjudication by virtue of the general publication of notice. Indeed, even more remote rights may exist. General creditors of legatees may have a right to question the bona fides by which such legatees surrender any portion of their property after the right to it becomes vested, and no court in which a litigation to that end might be instituted has any power to pass on the existence and validity of an alleged will; especially would it not have such right after such will had been adjudged no testament by the probate court having that jurisdiction, although proceeding upon a stipulation of certain parties in interest. It is for reasons like these that the courts have uniformly held that the proceeding to probate a will is a proceeding in rem, binding all the world, and in which even public welfare and policy are involved. The view that public interest requires that a valid will be established, independently of the wish of those parties specifically named therein, is evinced by various statutes in this state. By § 4505, Stat. 1898, it is made a crime to conceal or suppress a will by any person, whether with or without the consent of parties therein named. By §§ 3784, 3785, and 3786, Stat. 1898, a positive duty is imposed both upon the county judge as a public officer, upon the person named as executor in any writing purporting to be a will, and, indeed, on any person having custody of such will, to take steps to bring the question of its validity before the proper probate court; and by § 2296, Stat. 1898, the absolute requirement is made that every will of real estate admitted to probate shall, with evidence thereof, be spread upon the public records. All these steps are imposed by law wholly independent of the control of those privately interested. They evince a clear recognition and declaration of the legislature that there is a public policy involved in the establishment of every legally executed will.

Apart from the interest of the public, there is also recognized by the courts an interest and right of the testator to have the directions of his will carried into effect, at least upon some subjects. His right is recognized to direct, at least, the method of management and disposal of his property after his decease, which courts cannot be compelled to disregard to accommodate the wishes of some or even all parties having pecuniary interest in the property. Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 90, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103; Russell v. Wright, 133 Wis. 445, 113 N. W. 644. Whether a will contains any directions of the sort thus protected against modifications by the beneficiaries is a question which can only arise after the probate proceeding is complete and the existence of the will has been established; but, apparently, this will commands a method of sale of the real estate which can be given effect only by its probate.

Counsel for appellants cites us to two decisions apparently holding that a probate court should regard the stipulation of the nominal parties in interest in making its decision: Stringfellow v. Early, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 597, 40 S. W. 871; Lloyd's Estate, 24 Pa. Co. Ct. 567. We cannot approve the reasoning of these cases. They are addressed both of them to the consideration whether an individual who had stipulated could be heard in court in repudiation of his stipulation, and thus were obscured the considerations which we have above suggested of the possible interest of unknown parties and of the existence of a public policy to protect them. The Texas case is based upon a remark in Phillips v. Phillips, 8 Watts, 198, to the effect that the parties in interest before probate might consent to the suppression or destruction of a will, the remark in the latter case being wholly obiter. Whether this might be so in Texas or in Pennsylvania, we think, as already stated, there are declared and obvious reasons of public policy in Wisconsin which preclude such a doctrine. This conclusion seems to be supported by the great weight of authority. Syme v. Broughton, 85 N. C. 367; Hutson v. Sawyer, 104 N. C. 1, 10 S. E. 85; Re Young, 123 N. C. 358, 31 S. E. 626; Allison v. Smith, 16 Mich. 405, 415; People ex rel. Frazer v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 39 Mich. 198; Re Valentine, 93 Wis. 45, 67 N. W. 12; 1 Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, § 228; Gary, Prob. Law, 3d ed. § 194.

We conclude that the stipulation in this case could not control the duty which the probate court owed to the public, and perhaps to the testator, to adjudicate as to the legal existence of the propounded document as a will,—to establish its status. Hence

Judgment affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied May 8, 1908.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

L. V. RIPLEY, Respt.,

v.

SAGE LAND & IMPROVEMENT COMPANY, Appt.

(138 Wis. 304, 119 N. W. 108.)

Account — delay — fault of attorney.

1. One to whom an account is rendered which contains an excessive interest charge on moneys advanced by the other party thereto, together with a tender of the cash balance, cannot avoid the effect of delay in repudiating the account by placing it in the hands of an attorney for adjustment, if the latter does not proceed in due time.

Same — estoppel.

2. One who accepts and retains, for a long period without objection, an account rendered, together with the balance shown to be due thereon, irrevocably assents to the account so that he cannot subsequently take steps to falsify it.

Case Note. — Conclusiveness of stated or settled account containing inaccuracy or error in method of mathematical calculation.

It will be observed that, although RIPLEY v. SAGE LAND & IMPROV. CO. involves an account stated, this note has been extended so as to include cases of settled accounts. Although it is conceded that there may be a practical difference between the two, the line of distinction cannot be determined by a perusal of the subjoined cases. Difficulty has also been experienced in keeping strictly to the line of mathematical errors. Probably there is ground for confining the note to cases in which the error or mistake was ascertainable from an inspection of the account; but some liberality has been exercised in including cases that do not fall within limitation, but are very close to the line.

There is little dissent from the proposition that the retention without objection of an account rendered constitutes an implied admission of its correctness and raises an implied promise to pay. This admission, however, is not conclusive, and the parties are not necessarily precluded from showing fraud or errors. So, too, one who expressly assents to or pays the balance of an account may, nevertheless, show, in some circumstances, that there is fraud or error. The subject of inquiry here is whether mathematical inaccuracy or error of method is such an er-

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Eau Claire County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to falsify an account. Reversed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

This is an appeal from the circuit court for Eau Claire county from a judgment for $1,420.25 in favor of plaintiff. Under date of September 17, 1888, H. W. Sage & Company wrote the plaintiff as follows: "Yours 12th received. We will take and pay for such portions of 6,500 acres you describe as you may select after examination, on the basis proposed by you, i. e., you to examine and locate, attend to paying taxes, if required, and protect from trespass; we to pay for the land (to be located in the name of H. W. S.), and furnish money for taxes till we sell the lands, and when sold to give you one half the net profits, over and above cost, taxes, necessary expenses of handling, and annual interest at 7 per cent. We presume you will be back at Eau Claire with minutes of the lands when you receive this letter; and you can either wire us the amount of cash you will need, and we will send you bk. drafts for it, or, if equally convenient, you may draw on us at sight, and this shall be your authority to draw on us enough to pay for the land up to 6,500 acres, at 10s. per acre." This proposition was accepted by the plaintiff, who thereupon proceeded to examine lands then owned by the United States and make cash entries of such lands as he considered right or mistake as will warrant the opening of the account.

Inaccurate computations.

It is the rule that ordinarily a stated or settled account may be attacked for mere inaccuracy of computations. An error of this kind, it would seem, is one purely of fact, and therefore constitutes ground of relief.

Thus, mistake in adding a column of figures in the settlement of an account will entitle one who paid the balance therein shown to be due from him to recover from the other the amount of such error. Hanson v. Jones, 20 Mo. App. 595.

So, too, errors in addition and subtraction in a dissolution settlement between partners may be readjusted on a bill to open the settlement. Mayo v. Bosson, 6 Ohio, 525.

And belief of both parties in the accuracy of the computations in an account which contained an error in addition is such a mutual mistake of fact as will support an action for the amount of the error, although payment of the balance was made and a receipt in full given. Downey v. McGinn, 1 N. Y. City Ct. Rep. 478.

The vendor of barrel headings who retains without objection for six months the vendee's account and payment of the amount thereby shown to be due, based on errors of the latter's inspector in counting and computing the number furnished, is not thereby estopped to show such errors, in his action for the amount claimed to be due, provided the discrepancy is so great as not reasonably to be accounted for by mere error in the exercise of honest judgment in sorting and matching. Standard Oil Co. v. Van Etten, 107 U. S. 325, 27 L. ed. 319, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 178.

And persons who held the first series of stock of a building and loan association, with whom settlement has been made, may maintain a bill for an accounting, upon the ground that the settlement was based on erroneous computations as to the date of maturity of the stock and as to the distribution of profits among the different series. Banks-ville Mutual Bldg. & L. Asso.'s Appeal, 1 Sadler (Pa.) 338, 2 Atl. 859.

A statement and settlement after the purchase of, and payment for, inventoried stock and fixtures, made by the agents of the vendor and purchaser in adjustment of errors in the inventory, should, where the agents' examination was obviously made in a haphazard manner, be disregarded as an account stated or settlement, so that the vendor may recover for approximately one hundred mathematical errors in extensions and footings in the inventory, of which the statement adjusted only about fifty or sixty. Mine & S. Supply Co. v. Creel (Tex. Civ. App.) 79 S. W. 67.

At the trial of the case of Grace v. Newbre, 31 Wis. 19, the lower court permitted the plaintiff to surcharge a stated account for an error in footing, and on appeal it was held that one who thus opens an account should be held to corrections of the account for errors against the defendant.

Error of method or basis.

Some errors of this kind are, it would seem, in the nature of mistakes of law, while it is possible that others may arise from mistake of fact. No cases have been found that make an express distinction on this ground, although one has been found to allude to the fact of a mistake of law. The contrary results of the various cases may, partially at least, be accounted for by differentiation of facts.

The charging by an agent of commissions for the sale of lands in addition to commissions on amounts collected is not ground for falsifying or surcharging the settled account of the agent, where the charges were made apparently in pursuance of agreement, and especially where twenty years have elapsed since the settlement of the account and the death of the principal. Philips v. Belden, 2 Edw. Ch. 1.

And one who engaged to conduct a certain department of a store for a share of the profits, and who has accepted the yearly statements of profits as well as payment of his share thereof, cannot, especially after the lapse of a considerable period of time, maintain a bill to open the annual accounts and to compel an

it desirable to purchase. Some 2,840 acres of land were entered, but a portion of the entries were canceled by the government. Practically all of the lands were entered in October, 1888. Thereafter moneys were received from various sources by the defendant or its predecessor, during the year 1893, the business and property of H. W. Sage & Company having been merged in a corporation known as the "Sage Land & Improvement Company." The amounts of money so received did not, at any time down to May 1, 1902, equal the accrued interest on moneys advanced by the defendant and its predecessor under the contract. At that time a sale of 1,720 acres was made to the J. L. Gates Land Company for $5,020. On June 5, 1902, a sale of the remaining 520 acres was made for $1,980 net. The entries as to 520 acres were canceled. On November 12, 1902, after all the lands had been sold, the defendant forwarded from Albany, New York, to the plaintiff, a statement showing the condition of its account with plaintiff as claimed by it. Such statement showed that the plaintiff's share of the net profits at this date amounted to $114.97. A check for this amount was inclosed, and the statement showed that this check covered the balance due. The only matter between the parties then unsettled related to a claim for a refund from the government amounting to $650 for canceled entries. The plaintiff acknowledged receipt of the statement without making any objection thereto, and retained and used the accounting, upon the ground that his employers did not include in the accounts the time and cash discounts for goods purchased for the department, where he always had access to the firm books and never claimed the discounts, and where it is established that it is not customary in mercantile circles to regard discounts as profits. Barlow v. Platt, 133 App. Div. 364, 117 N. Y. Supp. 235.

And while an account should not be opened generally after the lapse of sixteen years, the court should, on a bill for an accounting of a partnership business of foreign trade, and after the lapse of such a time, order the re-statement of the account for errors which it is satisfied should be corrected, and should direct that, instead of a statement of each adventure separately without vouchers or details, the account be stated in the form of annual accounts, where the partnership agreement provided for annual accounts, and where the violation of such agreement resulted in gross error in the interest account. Ogden v. Astor, 4 Sandf. 311.

And an electric lighting company whose accountant renders monthly statements to a consumer on an erroneous basis of the amount of electricity recorded by the meter may, although the monthly statements amount to accounts stated, recover a balance still due, upon the ground that the meter was of a type known as "Constant 3," which records only one third of the current consumed. Allegheny County Light Co. v. Thomas, 31 Pa. Super. Ct. 102.

Interest, generally.

A charge of interest computed at a rate greater than the conventional rate, in a statement of account, is conclusive on the debtor if his conduct has been such as to make the statement an account stated. Savage v. Aiken, 21 Neb. 605, 33 N. W. 241.

So, too, one giving his written assent to an account against him cannot thereafter contest it upon the ground that it contains excessive charges of interest, where the rate is not unlawful. Lalande v. Breaux, 5 La. Ann. 505.

And the fact that interest in an account stated is computed at a rate which, though not illegal, is unenforceable except under a written contract, constitutes no defense to an action on the account. Marye v. Strouse, 6 Sawy. 204, 5 Fed. 483.

And where the rate is likewise legal but unenforceable, the additional fact that the debtor did not know the rate is not, where it could have been ascertained by simple computation, a defense to notes given in settlement of the account. Porter v. Price, 26 C. C. A. 70, 49 U. S. App. 295, 80 Fed. 655.

And where an account between parties is stated and agreed upon, and, upon the basis of this settlement, real estate is transferred at a fixed value in partial discharge of the indebtedness, the account will not, in the absence of fraud, be opened because of errors in the calculation of interest. Maguire v. Filley, 9 Mo. App. 580.

On the other hand, a statement of account by the state auditor showing the amount due from the county for taxes collected becomes, where the county retains it without objection, at most, only an account stated, which the county, as respondent in mandamus to compel payment of the balance, may attack upon the ground of computation of interest on the bids for lands sold for taxes in a manner that gave the state double interest. Stevens v. Saginaw County, 62 Mich. 579, 29 N. W. 492.

And where one party to a stated account has been permitted to falsify certain charges therein, the other party will be permitted to open it to reduce an excessive charge of interest. Higginson v. Fabre, 3 Desauss. Eq. 89.

An agreement between parties as to the amount due from one to the other was held in Town v. Wood, 37 Ill. 512, not to be conclusive if it was founded on error in regard to the items or in the computation of interest.

And it was held in Tennent v. Dewees, 7 Pa. 305, that a settled account in which the amount due for advances under a trust deed was agreed upon could be corrected for errors in charging interest from a date prior to that on which the advances were made. See also Ogden v. Astor, supra.

ever, alleges that there was no such settlement and payment of his claim, because the defendant erroneously charged an excessive amount for interest on the sums advanced by it in payment of the lands purchased, and thereby erroneously reduced the amount due him as his share of the net profits on the purchase and sale of the lands. He admits that, within a short time after receipt of the account and money as payment of the balance due him on the account, he was informed of this state of the account so rendered by the defendant. It appears that not until August 1905, a period of two years and nine months, did he give defendant any notice of this alleged overcharge in the account rendered by defendant, or make any claim for any sum as due him above the $114.97 so accepted by him. He testifies that he examined the account critically shortly after he received it and the money, and after he had acknowledged receipt thereof, that he did not offer to return the money, nor did he then inform the defendant that he repudiated the account as incorrect; but that after such examination he took legal advice regarding the right of the defendant under the contract to compute the interest as it did, and some time thereafter was informed that the defendant had illegally compounded the interest, and that he thereupon instructed his counsel to take the necessary steps to have the account corrected and to demand payment of the amount still due him. No steps were, however, taken by him or his counsel for a period of nearly three years. The duty to take the necessary steps to enforce collection of any additional sum due him rested on him, and he cannot be relieved by placing it in the control of De Alton S. Thomas, his attorney. He must be held to have sanctioned inaction by his attorney, for under the circumstances the attorney's delinquency cannot explain or justify plaintiff's silence for so long a time. Under this state of the facts the question is whether plaintiff's conduct in the matter amounts to a settlement and acceptance of the account, and precludes him from opening it at this late day.

It is urged by plaintiff that he in fact never assented to a settlement and payment of the account, and hence his conduct in the matter does not warrant the conclusion that the account became stated and paid. This contention omits consideration of the account as rendered, his acceptance of the amount tendered as payment of the whole amount due him, his long silence respecting the matter, and his failure to bring it to defendant's notice. Under the circumstances such acquiescence furnishes a good basis for the inference that he assented to the settlement defendant proposed by the account rendered. Such assent is as irrevocable as if he had expressly given it. Plaintiff was in duty bound to give defendant notice of his disapproval of the account quiescence for two years after paying the balance of an account containing usurious items precluded the debtor from avoiding the balance by means of a bill for an accounting.

In Louisiana a statute of this kind apparently governs several decisions, although express reference to it is not made in all of them.

The reception without objection of mercantile accounts rendered from time to time was held in Allen v. Nettles, 30 La. Ann. 788, 2 So. 602, to preclude the debtor or his representative from showing in an action for the balance in the last account, that interest was charged at an excessive rate and was computed by compounding in each successive account, the statutory period of one year having elapsed, and the settlement being equivalent to payment.

The foregoing case was regarded in Flower v. O'Bannon, 43 La. Ann. 1042, 10 So. 376, as conclusive against the right of a debtor to make similar objections in a similar action, where he had received frequent statements of account without objection, and with requests for indulgence, and promises to pay.

And it was held in Dannenmann v. Charlton, 113 La. 276, 36 So. 965, that the transferee of pledged chattels could not, as 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

against the pledgee and after the lapse of a year, object to usurious items in a settlement entered into between the pledgee and the pledgee who had made payment on the balance agreed upon as due.

The makers of a mortgage note were held in Carruth v. Carter, 26 La. Ann. 331, not to be entitled, in an action thereon, to set up usury, where, after several payments were made thereon, they entered into a settlement with the payee and acknowledged in writing that the sum claimed was due. In this case the court said that usury was no defense under the laws of Louisiana, and it may perhaps be properly assumed that the statutory period had elapsed.

And it was held in Flower v. Millaudon, 19 La. 186, that, where an account had been settled and the debtor had paid the balance in cash or its equivalent, he could not open the account in a suit for final settlement and to recover a balance, on the ground that the amount of the balance paid included excessive commissions and usurious interest. In this case more than one year had elapsed since the settlement.

Of course, where a settlement is effected by compromise or arbitration, its conclusiveness rests in considerations that are not a pertinent subject of inquiry herein.

within a reasonable time. It devolved on him to exercise reasonable diligence, to give proper attention to the transaction, and repudiate the account, if he desired to avoid the effect of the settlement and payment of the account proposed by defendant. He did not act with reasonable diligence and vigilance to repudiate it, and his conduct permits of but one reasonable inference, namely, that he assented to the settlement, and accepted the money tendered by defendant as payment of the balance due him. The effect of plaintiff's conduct is declared by the court in the case of Rose v. Bradley, 91 Wis. 619, 65 N. W. 509, where the force of the silence of a party, after having received a statement of the account against him from another, was considered. It is there said: "If such other keeps the account, and fails to object within a reasonable time, the facts raise a presumption or inference of acquiescence. That is all. Such presumption or inference is more or less strong according to circumstances. The neglect to return or object may be for such a length of time as to render such presumption conclusive on the question of acquiescence, so as to make an account stated." The following cases are illustrative of this principle, which we find controls this case against plaintiff's contention: Pabst Brewing Co. v. Milwaukee, 126 Wis. 110, 105 N. W. 563; Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 116 Wis. 392, 67 L.R.A. 705, 89 N. W. 538, 92 N. W. 246; Voss v. Northwestern Nat. L. Ins. Co. 137 Wis. 492, 118 N. W. 212. Since, then, the account was settled and paid, no ground is shown for opening it and allowing plaintiff to charge defendant any additional sum as due him. No fraud or mistake is claimed. Under the circumstances principle and public policy demand that, when the account was settled and adjusted, it became conclusive on the parties. Martin v. Beckwith, 4 Wis. 219; Klauber v. Wright, 52 Wis. 303, 8 N. W. 893; Continental Nat. Bank v. McGeoch, 92 Wis. 286, 66 N. W. 606.

We are led to the conclusion that the court erroneously opened a stated account, and that the complaint should have been dismissed.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to award judgment dismissing the complaint.

Barnes, J. dissenting:

The contract between the parties was plain and unambiguous. Under it the defendant had no right whatever to compound interest. Its counsel does not claim or argue that it had such right. The defendant suffered no loss, wrong, or injury by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to object to the statement of the account as rendered. It does not claim any injury by reason of such failure. There was no controversy between the parties, before or at the time of the remittance, as to what amount was due. It was a mere matter of mathematical calculation, under a plain contract, to ascertain it. By reason of its erroneous and unlawful computation of interest, the defendant retained moneys that belonged to the plaintiff, and which, in the exercise of good faith and common honesty, it was bound to pay him. Plaintiff and defendant and its predecessor had a large number of business transactions amounting to large sums of money, and covering a period of over twenty years. They appeared to trust each other mutually. Statements were rendered from time to time; and, whenever anything was found incorrect in them, it was rectified, regardless of when the error was discovered. The plaintiff handed the statement here involved to his attorney shortly after it was received, to secure his opinion on the correctness of the computation of interest, and to collect the balance due him, if any. In view of the course the parties pursued in their dealings, it is particularly harsh and inequitable to foreclose the plaintiff from asserting his rights. The check sent plaintiff did not in itself purport to be in full of account. If it did so purport, it would make no difference. A receipt in full, when it is not in fact a payment in full, can always be contradicted. This is elementary law. Prairie Grove Cheese Mfg. Co. v. Luder, 115 Wis. 20, 27, 89 N. W. 138, 90 N. W. 1085; Weidner v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. 130 Wis. 10, 15, 110 N. W. 246. The plaintiff had a right to accept the check and to treat it as payment on account. The amount of money represented by it, and more, was due him. This $114.97, with another small payment made on account of moneys refunded on canceled entries, represented the earnings of a large amount of labor expended by plaintiff during a period of fourteen years. The payment was delayed for several months after it should have been made.

The court holds that, by accepting the check and retaining the account without telling the defendant that he was not willing to accept less than was due, the plaintiff cannot recover. The defendant should know as well as the plaintiff that it had not paid according to its contract. But, whether the plaintiff was chargeable with legal acumen superior to that of the defendant or not, I think, he should be permitted to recover.

Whether the transaction be considered from the standpoint of estoppel, of waiver, of accord and satisfaction, of an account stated, of acquiescence, of abandonment, or of a settlement, it still involves the question, Did plaintiff, by his failure to object to the accuracy of the account rendered, deprive himself of the right to collect what was justly his due? The rendering of an account and its retention without objection, after the lapse of time become an account stated and a strong proof of its correctness. Engfer v. Roemer, 71 Wis. 11, 36 N. W. 618. A charge that, where one man makes out an itemized statement of his accounts with another, and mails or hands it to such other, and it is retained without objection, this is in law a settlement is incorrect. The act is not a settlement. Such facts "raise a presumption or inference of acquiescence. That is all. Such presumption or inference is more or less strong according to circumstances. The neglect to return or object may be for such a length of time as to render such presumption conclusive on the question of acquiescence so as to make an account stated." Rose v. Bradley, 91 Wis. 619, 623, 65 N. W. 509. The cases of Cobb v. Arundell, 26 Wis. 553, and Ryan Drug Co. v. Hvambasahl, 92 Wis. 62, 65 N. W. 873, hold that the sending of a statement of account by one party, and its retention by the other without objection thereto, make an account stated. Less than two months ago this court said: "It is quite uniformly held that, when a demand in the form of a bill or account is delivered to the debtor, his conduct, with reference thereto may be significant, and his failure to object within a reasonable time be construed prima facie as an admission that such bill or account is correct; not at all conclusive either on the fact of admission or on the fact of correctness, but prima facie subject to be overcome by other evidence." Jones v. De Muth, 137 Wis. 120, 118 N. W. 542, 543. But an account stated is only prima facie evidence that the balance struck is correct. Jefferson County v. Jones, 19 Wis. 51. While the incorrectness of a stated account may be shown, the evidence to surcharge it should be clear and satisfactory. Wilson v. Runkel, 38 Wis. 526; Marsh v. Case, 30 Wis. 531; Hoyt v. McLaughlin, 52 Wis. 280, 8 N. W. 889; Hill v. Durand, 58 Wis. 160, 15 N. W. 390. One of the late expressions of the court as to the effect of stating an account is that it is "only prima facie evidence of the correctness of the balance, and not conclusive upon it," and unless such balance is struck as the result of mutual concessions and a compromise, or the acts in reference thereto create an estoppel in pais, it "may be impeached for mistake or error in law or in fact with respect to the items included in it." Segelke & K. Mfg. Co. v. Vincent, 135 Wis. 237, 115 N. W. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

806. In many other jurisdictions the receipt and retention of an account without comment is only prima facie evidence of assent to the correctness thereof. 1 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 371, and cases cited. Even a settlement deliberately made may be set aside on clear proof of fraud or mistake. Klauber v. Wright, 52 Wis. 303, 8 N. W. 893; Hill v. Durand, supra. The contract here furnishes proof conclusive that a mistake of law was made in stating this account, if it was stated, or in making the settlement, if one was made, unless we assume that it was the purpose of the plaintiff to give something to the defendant that did not belong to it, and that it was the purpose of the defendant to cheat the plaintiff out of something that belonged to him.

It would seem clear from the foregoing authorities that the failure of the plaintiff to object to the account did not preclude him from showing that it was erroneous. At best it was evidence tending to show assent on his part as to its correctness. But if the transaction amounted to stating an account, still the stated account was not conclusive. The fact that any weight at all should be given such retention proceeds upon the theory of an implied assent or admission that the contents of the paper are correct because not demurred to. Many courts hold that such action is no evidence of consent; others that it is weak evidence. The doctrine seems to have originated at the trial of Horne Tooke for treason (25 How. St. Tr. 120), where treasonable letters found in his possession were offered in evidence against him, on the theory that the receipt and retention of such letters by him without protest or objection to their contents was tantamount to an approval of such contents. Defendant's objection to the letters was not wanting in logic. The accused stated that he was afraid he was guilty of blasphemy, as well as of treason, under the ruling of the court admitting the letters; that he received many curious letters that he did not answer, and that among them were some from a man named Oliver Overall, who "endeavored to prove to me that he was God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. . . . He proved it from the Old Testament; in the first place that he was God the Father, because God is Overall, that is, God over all. He proved he was God the Son from the New Testament—Verily, verily, I am He; that is Veral I, Veral I, I am He. Now, if these letters written to me, which I from curiosity have preserved, but upon which I have taken no step, and to which I have given no answer, are produced against me, I do not know what may become of me." To which the chief justice replied: "If you can treat all the letters that have been found upon you with as much success as you have these letters of your correspondent, you will have no great reason for apprehension." The English court did not hold that the receipt and retention of this letter without protest would furnish proof conclusive of the crime of blasphemy.

The evolutionary progress of the law on the subject under consideration has led to the following results: (1) Receipt and retention of a statement of account without protest raise a presumption of assent to its correctness; (2) after the lapse of an indeterminate period, if the silence is continued, the statement so furnished automatically becomes an account stated; and (3) after the lapse of another indeterminate period, the account so stated automatically becomes conclusive of the rights of the parties. The last proposition is the result of the decision in this case, and it is with this that I particularly dissent.

The cases of Bostwick v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 116 Wis. 392, 67 L.R.A. 705, 89 N. W. 538, 92 N. W. 246, and Pabst Brewing Co. v. Milwaukee, 126 Wis. 110, 105 N. W. 563, rest upon an entirely different principle from that involved in this case, and I do not think they are authority for the decision here made.

Dodge and Kerwin, JJ.: We concur in the foregoing dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Barnes.

Petition for rehearing denied.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

E. G. MIDDLEKAMP, Plff. in Err.,
v.

BESSEMER IRRIGATING DITCH COMPANY.

(— Colo. —, 103 Pac. 280.)

Nuisance — irrigation ditch — seepage.

1. Seepage to the injury of neighboring property from an irrigation ditch constructed under authority of law, in the ordinary and usual manner, cannot be regarded as making the ditch a nuisance, for which successive actions can be brought until it is abated.

Limitation of actions — seepage — injury.

2. The statute of limitations begins to run against a cause of action for injuries to neighboring land by seepage from an irrigation ditch constructed under statutory authority, in the usual and ordinary manner, from the date the lands are first visibly affected and injured by seepage which, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

together with its continuance from the same source, caused the injury for which the action was brought, and it is immaterial that the injury increases with the passage of time.

Nuisance — irrigation ditch — condition.

3. That seepage from an irrigation ditch may be prevented by fluming or cementing the portions where the seepage occurs does not render the ditch, without such protection, a nuisance to neighboring property.

(Steele, Ch. J., and Musser and White, JJ., dissent.)

ERROR to the District Court for Pueblo County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's lands, alleged to have been caused by seepage from defendant's irrigation ditch. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McCorkle & Teller and E. E. Hubbell for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Waldron & Thompson, for defendant in error:

Defendant is not liable for injuries to the plaintiff's property, except where the injury is the result of some fault or negligence on its part.

Sapp, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 379, which deals with the general question when a right of action accrues for an injury to real estate from a cause not immediately effective.

It will be observed that the holding of the court in MIDDLEKAMP v. BESSEMER IRRIGATING DITCH CO., that the injuries to neighboring land by seepage from an irrigation ditch constructed under statutory authority in the usual and ordinary manner constitute but one cause of action, against which the statute of limitations begins to run from the date the lands are first visibly affected and injured by seepage, is similar to the holding of the Iowa cases set out in the above-named notes, which also have held that, in case of a permanent structure, the consequent injuries from which are not immediately ascertainable, the statute of limitations begins to run from the first injury.

ute of limitations begins to run from the first injury.

Even if the defendant's canal was, in the first instance, negligently constructed, nevertheless, the ditch being a permanent structure, the right of action of the plaintiff would at least begin from the date that percolating waters first made their appearance upon his property, and all damages, past, present, and prospective, would be then recoverable in one suit, as the statutes of limitations would begin to run from the date that any damage first became appreciable.

Hill, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this action judgment was upon the pleadings. The plaintiff in error, being plaintiff in the court below, in his complaint filed April 11, 1900, alleged, in substance, the corporate capacity of the defendant; plaintiff's ownership July 24, 1894, and ever since, of certain lands (describing them) of alleged high value; the defendant's ownership of the Bessemer irrigating ditch, by which it diverts large quantities of water from the Arkansas river, and distributes it along and under said ditch for irrigation and domestic purposes; that his lands are on the south side of the Arkansas river, about 10 miles below the headgate of said ditch; that said ditch is constructed down the south side of the Arkansas river valley, upon the high ground, to a point several miles below the lands of plaintiff; that said ditch, where it passes the lands of plaintiff, is constructed in loose, porous soil, underlain by a bed of shale extending from the line of said ditch to the plaintiff's land; that both the surface of the land and bed of shale underneath, intervening between defendant's ditch and plaintiff's land, have a general slope from the ditch to plaintiff's land; that continuously, at all seasons of every year since August, 1894, the defendant has diverted a large volume of water from the Arkansas river through said canal, and that, by reason of the loose, gravelly soil through which said ditch is constructed, large volumes of water have escaped continuously since August, 1894, from said ditch, through the bottom and sides thereof, by seepage and percolation, and are carried along the bed of shale above referred to, which, by natural means, finds its way to the lands of plaintiff and adjacent lands, and is discharged thereon; that said seepage water is charged with alkali, and destroys and renders worthless the lands of plaintiff for agricultural and other purposes; that the amount of seepage water discharged on plaintiff's land, as aforesaid, independent of the alkali, is sufficient to drown and render worthless the plaintiff's land, to his damage, etc. A general and special demurrer was filed to this complaint, challenging its sufficiency as to stating any cause of action, together with sundry other points therein raised, which was overruled. Thereafter, an answer containing, first, a general denial, followed by ten separate and distinct special defenses, was filed, to which special defenses demurrers were interposed and sustained except as to the third and fourth, to which the demurrers were overruled; the plaintiff elected to stand by his demurrer. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff brings the case here upon error for review.

Able arguments, including many citations of authorities, have been presented and carefully considered upon the many vexatious and very important questions raised and discussed, and which are of general interest in this state, but most of which can be eliminated by basing our decision upon the ruling of the court below in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the fourth separate and special defense, which was, in substance, as follows: That this action is barred by the statute of limitations in this, to wit: That this action was not commenced until after the expiration of six years subsequent to the accruing of the right to sue, if any, for the injuries complained of, because said ditch was originally lawfully constructed and completed in 1889 for the conveyance of water for irrigating purposes; that said ditch was a lawful structure, carefully and properly built, by due warrant and authority of law, for the purpose of conveying water to be used for the irrigating of lands lying contiguous or near to the same, and belonging to individual stockholders of either the defendant company or its predecessors in interest; that said ditch was designed, intended, and has always continued, to be a permanent structure since its completion for the purposes aforesaid, and that water was conveyed into and conducted along said ditch by the predecessors in interest of defendant and by defendant since it acquired the ownership of said ditch, and that the use of said ditch, as aforesaid, began in the year 1889, and has been continuously maintained and used for the conveyance of water ever since said year; that, more than six years prior to the commencement of this suit, the lands of the plaintiff were, to a considerable extent, visibly affected and injured by percolating waters, which percolating waters came from the same sources and were produced by the same cause which caused and produced any and all percolating waters that have appeared upon said lands thereafter, and up to the time of the commencement of this suit; and, for more than six years prior to the commencement of this suit, the plaintiff, or his predecessors in interest, had actual notice and knowledge that their said lands were being continuously injured by percolating waters coming from the same source and produced from the same cause that they now assert in this suit is attributable to waters escaping by percolation from defendant's said ditch. Wherefore defendant avers that the plaintiff's cause of action herein, if it did not accrue at the time of the final completion of said ditch in the year 1889, did accrue when perceptible injury was caused to said premises by said percolating waters, which perceptible injury began and continued for more than seven years prior to the commencement of this suit, and the said plaintiff then and there had the same, if not superior, sources and means of information and knowledge touching the probable extent of the increased future damages which said lands might sustain by reason of the possible or probable augmentation of said percolating waters from year to year thereafter upon said premises, and defendant therefore says that, the injuries complained of being in part sustained and perceptible for more than six years prior to the commencement of this action, this suit is therefore barred by the statute of limitations, etc. And without passing upon the questions of the liability of canal companies in all such cases, or deciding whether, in the absence of allegations of negligence in the construction and operation of canals, a complaint states a cause of action for remote or consequential damages occasioned by waters seeping therefrom, but assuming, for the purposes of this case, as is assumed by this defense (which invokes the statute of limitations), that the complaint states a cause of action, it then presents for our determination the question as to when, if at all, a cause of action accrues and the statute begins to run upon account of damages occasioned by waters continuously seeping from an irrigation ditch which was properly built, being operated by due warrant of law, which was designed, has continued, and is intended, to be a permanent structure always, and with no direct allegation of negligence as to the manner of its operation.

In his original brief it is admitted by plaintiff in error that no negligence was alleged in the complaint, and it is claimed none need be; while in a supplemental brief filed later, counsel have taken a somewhat different position, wherein they contend the allegation of the construction of the canal through loose, porous soil, and its operation through such soil, resulting in continuous seepage, is a sufficient allegation of negligence itself, and they contend that under the 15th section of the Bill of Rights, which declares that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation, and under the provisions of our statutes which impose certain duties in the construction and maintenance of irrigation ditches, the allegation of seepage and the damage resulting therefrom is all that is necessary to be alleged. It is further claimed the operation of the canal, so long as it continues to seep, regardless of the degree of care exercised in its construction and want of negligence in its operation, constitutes a continuous nuisance, giving rise to a new cause of action each successive day until the seepage shall be abated, and that plaintiff would have the right to bring successive suits. It is further urged, if this position is not accepted, and we should hold only one suit can be maintained, that, regardless of the period of time the injury has continued, the seepage constitutes a continuous nuisance, and plaintiff is entitled to recover in this suit for all injury inflicted during the six years next preceding the institution of his action; and in their brief counsel state: "What, then, is the cause of action set up in the complaint? It is not that the ditch was constructed, nor, primarily, that it was improperly constructed; but that defendant has permitted it to be, during nearly six years last past, in such a condition as to allow the escape of water. . . . That is the offense,—the improper use of a lawful structure,—the neglect of defendant to discharge its duty to stop the seepage. . . . Such being the ground of complaint, there was, as in all cases of a continuing nuisance, a new cause of action each day. Every day that passed in which the defendant neglected to flume or otherwise improve that portion of the ditch at which this leakage occurred . . . witnessed a wrong for which a recovery is allowed by law. The constant wetting of the land is the nuisance, and its cause is the porous condition of the walls and bottom of the ditch, left thus by defendant's fault. This wrong has no necessary connection with the location and construction of the ditch." With this line of argument we cannot agree, and think the criticism to be offered is more applicable to the basis upon which it is assumed than to the argument itself, for we cannot conceive how the seepage has no connection with the location and construction of the ditch, including its future operation, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

and we think those matters the very essence of the cause of the injury. The pleadings here show this ditch was constructed in the ordinary and usual manner. The seepage is a necessary result, caused by the character of the land through which the canal was, and of necessity had to be, constructed. The seepage will therefore continue, and the same injury result from it, as long as the ditch is used without change from any cause but human labor. The cause of the injury being permanent, therefore, the injury itself is permanent. As a general rule, it is held a cause of action for a wrongful act, whether negligent or wilful, or for the breach of a contract or duty, accrues immediately upon the happening of the wrongful act or the breach, even though the actual damages resulting therefrom may not accrue until some time afterwards; and the statute, therefore, begins to run upon the occurrence of the act or the breach complained of, and not from the time of the damage resulting therefrom. 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 200; Ipswich Mills v. Essex County, 108 Mass. 363; Frankle v. Jackson (C. C.) 30 Fed. 398; Roulston v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1507, 54 S. W. 2; Louisville & N. R. St. Rep. 722, 50 Atl. 255; Van Orsdol v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 470, 9 N. W. 379. But in cases of waters escaping by percolation and seepage from irrigation ditches, owing to the uncertainty of its course and extent, the length of time required after the construction and operation of such properties for it to develop as to its uncertain course and slow stage of career under the ground depending upon the conditions of the earth through which it must pass, the lay of the land, and all other elements tending to make uncertain its future location and extent, at least, until it commences to show its results at certain places, we do not think the rule laid down by the above cases would make a practical, equitable, or fair test as to the time when a cause of action for damages in this class of any state or territory where irrigation is necessary. The injury here complained of is a continuing one. The waters which caused the damage one year are not entirely the same as those which cause or continue the injury the following year. It is occasioned by new waters continuously seeping, and it is common knowledge that, where such seepage waters can and have been cut off and cease to continue, by the construction of drainage canals or otherwise, the lands injured will, in time, drain themselves and be restored to their natural condition and again become productive. Hence the theory that where the lands are only partially destroyed by seepage one day, month, or year, although all affected (as admitted by the pleadings in this case), the continuance of the seepage causes the damage to increase from year to year until it causes the total destruction of the land, so far as productiveness is concerned, and, for that reason a suit could be brought at any time and recovery had for that per cent or portion of the damages accruing within the six-year limit, would be to allow the plaintiff to bring an action upon the continuance of the same cause which originally started, continued to cause, and increased the same damages barred by the statute. Seepage, when it commences to affect land, usually gradually increases in quantity upon the lands affected, not necessarily because there is an increase in its escape from the canal, but from the fact that it travels slowly under the ground, is being supplied faster than it can escape through the earth underneath, and often reaches places where it cannot travel or escape nearly so fast as it is being supplied, the result of which causes it to accumulate at such places and it is then forced to the surface of the earth, in such cases causing the total destruction of the land, so far as agricultural purposes are concerned. But to say that a suit could be brought at any time for the per cent of damage caused during the six years next preceding the date of the bringing of the action can only be to hold that a new cause of action had accrued, and where no change has taken place in the manner of the operation of the ditch, by its enlargement or otherwise, and where nothing different has been done or happened to create them, and is inconsistent with any reasons supported by any line of authorities which we have been able to find, except those holding the continuance of the injury creates a new cause of action, for which successive suits can be brought from day to day. In this case, when the plaintiff's lands were first visibly affected and injured by these seepage waters, he had a cause of action against the defendant, not only for the damage then inflicted, but for all future damages which might be sustained by reason of the continuance of the seepage, including its prospective augmentation (except those caused by acts of negligence in the future maintenance of the canal other than as claimed by the pleadings in this case, relating to its location, construction, and operation through certain kinds of earth), and such an action could have been upon the assumption of the permanent maintenance of the canal in its then present condition for all time, and we think it would be in conflict with the great weight of authorities and inconsistent with sound reasoning to hold that such a cause of action is susceptible of division, and, if permissible, would be impracticable in its operation to permit of the splitting of this kind of a cause of action, which would be impossible to divide accurately, and we do not think it was intended that they should be excluded from the operation of the statute of limitations.

Another reason why a rule of this kind would not be equitable or just is it would allow the owner of the land to select any time when the value of his property was the highest to bring his suit, and such actions could be brought a great many years after the damage had first commenced, and after the land had greatly enhanced in value, often upon account of the construction and operation of the very ditch which, in years to come, it would be claimed was the cause of the damage, and after the water therefrom had made the real value to the land; and, again, such a ruling would be to open the doors of the courts of this state to hundreds of such cases, where, for many years gone by, it has been assumed and accepted as the settled law within this jurisdiction that no cause of action could, at this late date, be maintained upon account of such continuous seepage, and such a rule would leave no method or test by which the investors of capital in such enterprises could ever ascertain as to the ultimate extent of their liability upon account of such enterprise, and would thus tend to prevent the development of the state along the lines upon which its principal prosperity must depend. It is contended the decision of our court of appeals in the case of Consolidated Home Supply Ditch & Reservoir Co. v. Hamlin, 6 Colo. App. 341, 40 Pac. 582, is conclusive here, and should be followed; and counsel say the court there lays down four propositions of law, all of which are strictly in accord with their contention here. We have given that case very careful consideration, and are unable to entirely harmonize it within itself. The action was for damages occasioned to lands by seepage from two irrigation ditches running through the land. The first opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Reed, who appears to have reached four conclusions as follows: "1st. That the court did not err in its application of the statute of limitations in restricting it to the six years preceding the bringing of the action. 2d. That, the injury being one that could not be foreseen nor the damage estimated, no cause of action arose from the construction of the ditch, such act being lawful, and a cause or causes of action only arose subsequently, in which damage to the time of the bringing of suit only could be recovered. 3d. That the nuisance or trespass was continuous, and, the subsequent damage continually being incurred, that the ditch company were liable until the nuisance was abated and the cause of damage removed. 4th. That successive suits might be brought and maintained for the damages sustained subsequent to the former recovery." The opinion on rehearing, delivered by Mr. Justice Thomson, expressly repudiates the last three conclusions reached by Mr. Justice Reed, in which he (Thomson) held that all damages resulting from the operation of the ditch were recoverable in one action; that the ditches in question were necessary, the country required them, and it is presumed they will be maintained for an indefinite period; that the seepage was a necessary result of the character of the land, and will therefore continue and the same injury result from it so long as the ditches are used. The causes of the injury being permanent, the injury itself is permanent, and the verdict must be assumed to include the entire damage sustained, so the plaintiff would be entitled to no further action by reason of a continuance of the nuisance. Mr. Justice Reed remaining silent upon rehearing, we presume he consented thereto and changed his mind as to most of the conclusions reached in the original opinion. His conclusions upon the statute of limitations do not appear to have received special consideration upon rehearing, unless modified by the ruling that only one action could be maintained; but in that case (not like this) the plea raising it was replied to by general denial, it was made an issue and evidence submitted, and the court instructed the only damage the jury could consider in any event are damages that accrued within the six years, and the record shows, as stated by Mr. Justice Reed, "although the seepage commenced in 1885, there was but a comparatively small amount of land injured or destroyed until 1889." Suit was brought August 17, 1892, which extended its time back to August 17, 1886, and under the evidence and instructions we cannot say that any recovery was allowed for lands affected prior to the six-year period, and think the records of that case tend to show 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that no damages were allowed for such lands, but only for those to which the injury commenced within that time; the trend of that case being to make the dividing line as to the lands affected, which were only two or three acres prior to the six-year limit, and we are not prepared to say (which is not necessary to determine here) that conditions might not arise where a tract of land owned by one person shows signs of injury by seepage upon one portion or subdivision only at one time, and upon another portion or subdivision at a later period, that suit might not be brought for damages occasioned to that particular tract or subdivision last affected, and that such an action could not be held to be barred by the statute of limitations on account of the injury sustained to the first portion or subdivision of the farm, for which a right of action had become barred on account of its having been so visibly affected and injured prior to the six-year period, and we will not say now that in all cases this could be termed a division of the plaintiff's case; but we have not such a case here to determine. In this case it will be noted the plaintiff elected to treat his cause of action and land as a whole, in that he makes no distinction as to the dates of the destruction of the different portions of the entire tract. The plaintiff states all his lands were so destroyed, etc., during a certain period, and the special defense accepts this condition as stated, and applies the statute to the entire tract as a whole, stating that the lands for which the damage is complained of were so visibly affected, etc., for more than six years prior to the bringing of the action. Other cases cited are not applicable to conditions existing in the construction and operation of an irrigation ditch. The case of Wright v. Ulrich, 40 Colo. 437, 91 Pac. 43, involved the construction of a slaughterhouse where one operated had been burned,—clearly an abatable common-law nuisance.

The case of Power v. Munger, 3 C. C. A. 253, 10 U. S. App. 289, 52 Fed. 705, was an action for negligence resulting in the setting out of fires by a locomotive. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Biggs, 52 Ark. 240, 6 L.R.A. 804, 20 Am. St. Rep. 174, 12 S. W. 331, was the negligent construction of a railway embankment which caused the injury; the dictum being that its maintenance was a common-law nuisance which could be abated, which cited in support of this view Wood on Nuisances, § 865, upon the subject of continuing common-law nuisance. The case of Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 23 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177, does not sustain the position contended for. The case of Valley R. Co. v. Franz, 43 Ohio St. 623, 4 N. E. 88, involved the improper construction of a dam which caused the lands of plaintiff to be washed away, the defendant company having promised from time to time to remedy the defect, but failed, and its default in this behalf was deemed an important element in continuing the liability. The case of Sulless v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 74 Iowa, 659, 7 Am. St. Rep. 501, 38 N. W. 545, recognizes the statute of limitations begins to run from the time the first overflow occurred, which is in line with former decisions in that state. The case of Drake v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 302, 50 Am. Rep. 746, 19 N. W. 215, was for damages caused by the construction of an embankment without proper ditches and culverts, which afterwards were made and were successful until obstructed, and the Iowa court there held the statute did not apply for a later injury to a former one, where it was not continuous, but distinguished it from Powers v. Council Bluffs, 45 Iowa, 652, 24 Am. Rep. 792, which sustains our position here. The case of Bare v. Hoffman, 79 Pa. 73, 21 Am. Rep. 42, concerned a common-law nuisance susceptible of improvement, and the gist of the reasoning there was the presumption would be that necessary steps would be taken to prevent a recurrence of the injury complained of, and, not having been done, the second action might be brought. In Danielly v. Cheeves, 94 Ga. 263, 21 S. E. 524, it was also held, as stated by the court, "the plaintiff has a right to assume it will be abated." Wabash County v. Pearson, 120 Ind. 426, 16 Am. St. Rep. 325, 22 N. E. 134, involved the maintenance of a bridge, where the court held the cause of action did not accrue until the accident happened, although the bridge had been thus constructed for thirteen years. The case of Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Standen, 22 Neb. 343, 35 N. W. 183, was where a bridge caused the overflow, which might or might not ever occur again. The same principle is announced in Clark v. Dyer, 81 Tex. 339, 16 S. W. 1061. The case of Hill v. Empire State-Idaho Min. & Developing Co. (C. C.) 158 Fed. 881, was for damages to lands occasioned by the discharge from reduction works of large quantities of waste material containing poisonous matter into a stream, which, in time of high water, were carried down the stream, obstructed it in places, and caused the overflow of the lands complained of, as the court there states, "due to the operation of a lawful enterprise in an unlawful or careless manner," being a case, not for continuing damages, but for such as might or might not again occur, as stated in the opinion: "It was only by reason of the intervening agency of high water, the effect of which was uncertain and contingent, that the defendant's acts indirectly resulted in the injury to plaintiffs' land." The cases of Cumberland & O. Canal Corp. v. Hitchings, 65 Me. 140, and Van Hoozier v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 70 Mo. 145, both admit the rule is well settled, where injury to land occasioned by the commission of a nuisance is of such a permanent character that it goes to the entire value of the estate, recovery for the whole should be had in a single suit, and no other action could be maintained; but distinguish from where, by reason of the diversion of a stream of running water, the plaintiff's land is overflowed and his crops injured, and hold, as such injury does not go to the entire value of the estate, but, being of yearly recurrence, is susceptible of periodical apportionment. This, evidently, upon the theory that there may or may not be floods, and hence may or may not be damages during the season, which would not apply to the seepage from a canal. The case of Reed v. State, 108 N. Y. 407, 15 N. E. 735, is a case of admitted negligence in the construction of a dam across the stream and valley, forming a reservoir wherein the water arose about 30 feet, and where the court held the engineers were guilty of gross negligence in its construction and in not taking proper precaution for its maintenance, and the decision in that case was not on the theory of the permanent appropriation of the land flooded. After summing up most of the above and sundry other authorities, in their reply brief counsel for plaintiff in error state: "The other cases cited all discuss improvements which are permanent, and properly hold that when the structure itself is permanent, and is the cause of injury, the injury is permanent, and all damages are to be recovered in one action, the right to which accrued with the beginning of the injury. With this law we have no controversy." We think this law clearly applicable here for the reasons hereinbefore stated, as well as those given in the cases cited sustaining this position. This structure and irrigation canal is itself permanent, and, when used for the purposes for which it was authorized and is intended, it is the cause of the injury. The injury is permanent, and, in the language of Mr. Justice Thomson in the Home Supply Co. Case, supra, the ditch in question was necessary to render the land through which it passes productive, the country required it, and it is presumed it will be maintained for an indefinite period of time. The pleading is, it was constructed in the ordinary and usual manner, and, the seepage a necessary result of the character of the land, the seepage will, therefore, continue, and the same injury result from it, as long as the ditch is used. The cause of the injury is permanent, and the injury itself is permanent.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

WEST PRATT COAL COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

N. P. DORMAN et al.

(— Ala. —, 49 So. 849.)

Limitation of action—mining operation—injury.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run against a cause of action for injury to the surface by mining operations until some actual mischief has been done to it, regardless of when the mining was done.

(May 20, 1909.)

Case Note. — When does statute of limitations commence to run against action for injury to surface by mining operations or other excavations.

For references to other notes discussing the question as to when the statute of limitations begins to run against actions for injury to property, the immediate cause of which may have been set in motion more than the statutory period before the bringing of the suit, see the note to Middlekamp v. Bessemer Irrigating Co. ante, 795.

So far as the cases are concerned which deal with applicability of the statute of limitations to actions for injury to the surface caused by mining operations or other excavations, the great weight of authority is to the effect that a cause of action does not arise until some actual mischief has been done, from which time the statute of limitations begins to run, regardless of when the mining or other excavating was done. WEST PRATT COAL CO. v. DORMAN; Ludlow v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 Lans. 128; Church of the Holy Communion v. Paterson Extension R. Co. 66 N. J. L. 218, 55 L.R.A. 81, 49 Atl. 1030; Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Sampson (Ala.) 48 So. 493; Backhouse v. Bonomi, 9 H. L. Cas. 503; Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 127; Crumbie v. Wallsend Local Board [1891] 1 Q. B. 503; Simon v. Nance, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 480, 100 S. W. 1038 (construction of ditch which was permitted to become so enlarged as to deprive adjoining land of lateral support); Smith v. Seattle, 18 Wash. 484, 63 Am. St. Rep. 910, 51 Pac. 1057 (removing of soil in street, to subsequent injury of adjoining property).

The leading case, of course, on this question, is Backhouse v. Bonomi, supra, which 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Walker County in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for injury to the surface of plaintiffs' lands, alleged to have been caused by the removal of the subjacent support therefrom in mining operations. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bankhead & Bankhead for appellant.

Mr. L. D. Gray for appellees.

Sayre, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellees recovered judgment against the appellant in an action on the case for damages alleged to have been caused by the appellant (defendant) in mining coal beneath the surface of appellees' (plaintiffs') lot at Horse creek in such manner that the subjacent support of the same was impaired and the upper soil caused to crack open and settle down. There was evidence tending to show that coal had been mined under the lot by a former owner of the underlying is sufficiently reviewed and quoted in WEST PRATT COAL CO. v. DORMAN.

In Ludlow v. Hudson River R. Co. supra, it was held that where an excavation is made by a railroad company in such a negligent manner that an adjoining property owner's land afterward caves away, the cause of action for damages does not accrue until the caving away of the land takes place. The court said: "The damages did not exist, and had not been incurred, when the work was done, or within six years thereafter. If an action had been brought before they had actually been sustained, the amount of recovery would have depended upon mere probabilities and the wildest conjecture. The consequential injury had not happened until the land of the plaintiff slid away, and hence no action could be maintained for the damages arising in consequence thereof. . . . The act which caused the injury ultimately was, when it was done, no trespass, or any innovation upon the plaintiff's rights, and there was no cause of action until the injury happened."

And, of course, where the interference with the enjoyment of the land is considered the cause of action, rather than the interference with the right of support, a new cause of action arises with every subsidence. Church of the Holy Communion v. Paterson Extension R. Co. supra (continued settling of church walls because of insufficiency of a retaining wall built by a railroad company when constructing its tracks in a cut alongside the property); Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell, supra, overruling Lamb v. Walker, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. 389 (mining of coal resulting in a subsidence and a second subsidence more than the statutory period after ceasing of opera-minerals several years before suit brought, and that, both before and after the point of time one year before suit brought, defendant had mined coal there. The settling down of plaintiffs' lot occurred less than one year before the commencement of the suit. The single question raised by the record and argument of counsel is whether the trial court erred in refusing to defendant charges which put forward the proposition that if the coal the removal of which left the upper soil without proper support, and so caused its subsidence, was removed more than one year before the commencement of the suit, the plaintiffs could not recover.

The plaintiffs owned the surface; the defendant, the underlying minerals. The right to mine is servient to the right of the owner of the surface to have it perpetually sustained in its natural state—no question as to the right to have buildings sustained is involved—by adequate supports. Williams v. Gibson, 84 Ala. 228, 5 Am. St. Rep. 368, 4 So. 350. The owner of the upper soil is entitled as of common right to support from subjacent strata, independent of the negligence of the owner of the minerals in working his mine. Humphries v. Brogden, 12 Q. B. 739. So that the charge of negligence to be found in some of the counts neither added to nor detracted from tions); Crumbie v. Wallsend Local Board, supra (continuous subsidence of house as the result of improper filling of sewer).

This was also the view of Chief Justice Cockburn in the dissenting opinion of Lamb v. Walker, supra, which case was overruled in the Colliery Case.

Lord FitzGerald in Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell, L. R. 11 App. Cas. 151, said: "There was a complete cause of action in 1868, in respect of which compensation was given, but there was a liability to further disturbance. The defendants permitted the state of things to continue without taking any steps to prevent the occurrence of any future injury. A fresh subsidence took place, causing a new and further disturbance of the plaintiff's enjoyment, which gave him a new and distinct cause of action."

In Sloss-Sheffield Steel & I. Co. v. Sampson, supra, where an action was brought for damages caused by operations in mining coal under the plaintiff's lands, causing the surface to crack, and destroying a well and diminishing the value of the real estate, it was said: "While there is a difference as to the commencement of the running of the statute of limitations between cases where the act complained of was unlawful in itself and those where the act was lawful and the damage claimed is consequential, yet, where the injury is continuing or recurring, the rule in each case is that damages can be recovered only for the injury occurring within the period of limitation."

In Crumbie v. Wallsend Local Board, supra, it was contended that there is a distinction between a case where the subsidence is continuous, and it is impossible really to distinguish between the damage at one period and another, and a case such as the Colliery Case, where the subsidences occur by fits and starts, that is, successive, independent subsidences. Lord Esher, however, said that the suggested distinction was too fine.

In Roberts v. Read, 16 East, 215, although the general highway act directed that actions against any persons for anything done or acted in pursuance thereof should be commenced within three months, and not afterwards, it was held that for 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the undermining of a wall adjoining a highway an action on the case for the consequential damage was not barred until after three months after the falling of the wall, the court saying that if the action had been trespass, the action must have been brought within three months after the act of trespass complained of.

The only case of importance holding to the contrary is Noonan v. Pardee, 200 Pa. 474, 55 L.R.A. 410, 86 Am. St. Rep. 722, 50 Atl. 255, where it was held that the cause of action for an injury as the result of the subsidence of the surface over a mine arises at the time of the removal of the support, and not at the time of the resulting subsidence. The court said: "In this case the right of action arose when the mine operator failed to furnish sufficient support. That may have been more than six years before suit brought, or it may not. It may have been partly due to mining before and partly to mining afterwards; in which latter case the action would not be barred. If wholly due to the removal of coal six years before suit brought, and failure then to leave sufficient support, the action would be barred. The date of the 'cave-in' and partial destruction of the house is not the date of the cause of action, that was only the consequence of a previous cause, whether one month or twenty years before. It is argued that in some cases the surface owner could not know, by the most careful observation, whether the mine owner had neglected his duty within six years. We answer, that is only one of the incidents attending the purchase of land over coal mines. It is not improbable that this risk enters largely into the commercial value of all like surface land in that region. But, however this may be, we hold that the miner is not forever answerable for even his own default. Further, in no case is he answerable for the default of his predecessor before his possession. Neither equity nor law demands that any greater burden should be placed upon him than that indicated. Any heavier one would encourage the purchase of surface over coal mines for speculation in future lawsuits. We cannot concur in the argument of appellant's counsel that plaintiffs could have had no cause of the cause of action stated. Under the evidence it was open, perhaps, to the jury to find that the mining which caused the cracking and settling down of plaintiffs' lot had been done by the defendant more than one year before suit brought. If such was the case, when did the statute of limitations begin to run? In Roundtree v. Brantley, 34 Ala. 544, 73 Am. Dec. 470, Polly v. McCall, 37 Ala. 20, and Savannah, A. & M. R. Co. v. Buford, 106 Ala. 303, 17 So. 395, after recognizing the principle of a class of cases in which parties are allowed to maintain suit before any actual injury is done, for the reason that wherever there is a wrong there must be a remedy, and plain-action antedating their deed. By their conveyance, there passed to them all the rights of their grantor. If the cause of the injury was within six years, although at the date of the deed the damage was not susceptible of computation, yet afterwards became so by the subsidence of the surface, their right to sue was then fixed,—a right which, from the nature of the case, could not have had more than a doubtful existence before the actual damage occurred." In this case authority was also cited to sustain the argument that the right to sue does not fall to the owner who is in possession, when the result demonstrates the cause of action arose before the date of his deed. The court, however, after recognizing the applicability of that rule in cases of damages arising from the exercise of eminent domain by turnpike and railroad companies, in refusing to recognize the applicability of the rule in this case, used language which it would seem it might with equal grace have used on the question of the statute of limitations, and which would necessarily have led to a different conclusion. The court, in this connection, said: "when the right to sufficient support has been violated, the cause of action, it is true, arises; but the owner in possession when the consequences follow is the one who suffers. There may, in the interval, have been several owners, none of whom sustained damage except the last. He alone has the right to sue, because to him only has passed the right to enforce by suit the collection of a damage occurring during his possession. Until they actually occur, no one can tell when they will occur, or that they ever will. Each grantee has the right to presume that the subjacent owner has performed his legal duty; and the price, while probably somewhat depreciated by the possible risk, is not fixed on a presumption that his land will subside because of any special failure in duty on the part of him who has taken out the coal." But see the review of this case in WEST PRATT COAL CO. v. DORMAN.

In Nicklin v. Williams, 10 Exch. 259, it seems to have been held that the cause of action for injuries to property caused by the subsidence of the soil as the result of tiff must at least be entitled to nominal damages, and that otherwise the adverse user might ripen into a title by lapse of time before there was any actual damage, it was determined that an interference with the natural flow of water by a structure on the land of an adjoining owner, causing an injurious reflux of water, confers a right of action whenever the injury actually occurs; and in the last-named case it was said: "The roadbed and embankment are permanent and continuous structures; and if their erection had given the plaintiff a cause of action, and then all the damage which could have resulted had resulted, the statute of limitations would have com-mining was the original injury of withdrawing support. This case, however, was, in effect, at least, overruled in the Colliery Case.

In Houston Waterworks v. Kennedy, 70 Tex. 233, 8 S. W. 36, the court, distinguishing between an act as in that case, wrongful in itself, for which an action might have been maintained as soon as the tort was committed, and an act lawful in itself, for the injuries subsequently resulting from which a cause of action does not accrue until the injury is sustained, held that where the foundation of a house was cut through without the owner's knowledge, for the purpose of putting in a water pipe, causing the house afterwards to settle and the walls to crack, the owner's cause of action accrued at the time the foundation was cut through, and not at the time the damage became apparent.

In Griffin v. Drainage Commission, 110 La. 839, 34 So. 799, where an owner of property abutting on a street sought to recover damages for the gradual settling and injuring of his house, which commenced contemporaneously with the building of a drainage canal in close proximity thereto, and continued over a period of several years, it was held that under a statute declaring that prescription runs from the time the damage is sustained, the statute of limitations commenced to run at the time of the digging of the trench or canal, and that, not having shown what part of the damage was sustained after the period fixed for prescription, the owner of the building himself being in possession, he was precluded from recovering damages by bringing suit more than one year after the digging of the trench. In a syllabus by the court, the holding of this case was set out as follows: "Where the damage resulting from a wrongful act itself (noncontinuing) is continuing and progressive, the party whose property is damaged cannot postpone bringing an action for the same until after the full extent of the damage has been sustained, and then sue for the whole damage. If he does so, the claim for the portion of the damage which he sustained one year prior to the bringing of the action will have been prescribed."

menced to run from the time of their completion. But if the thing complained of is not necessarily injurious, or is not an invasion of the rights of another, of itself affording no cause of action, then whatever of legal injury may result from it furnishes a cause of action accruing when the injury occurs, and then the statute of limitations commences to run."

These cases went upon the theory that the injuries complained of had causal origin in the maintenance of a nuisance, and it was considered by them that the injurious consequences resulting from the nuisance, rather than the act which produced the nuisance, was the cause of action. "Nuisance, nooumentum, or annoyance, signifies anything that worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage . . . and private nuisances, which are the objects of our present consideration, and may be defined: Anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands tenements, or hereditaments of another." 3 Bl. Com. 216. "The remedies by suit are: (1) By action on the case for damages, in which the party injured shall only recover a satisfaction for the injury sustained, but cannot thereby remove the nuisance. Indeed, every continuance of a nuisance is held to be a fresh one." Id. 220. "Anything constructed on a person's premises, which of itself, or by its intended use, directly injures a neighbor in the proper use and enjoyment of his property, is a nuisance." Grady v. Wolsner, 46 Ala. 381, 7 Am. Rep. 593; Hundley v. Harrison, 123 Ala. 292, 26 So. 294; Richards v. Daugherty, 133 Ala. 569, 31 So. 934. The idea of nuisance receives a somewhat extended application in Sutherland on Damages, where it is said: "An actionable nuisance may be anything wrongfully done or permitted which injures or annoys another in the enjoyment of his legal rights. It may be created by an affirmative act causing annoyance and damage, or by neglect of some duty of prevention." § 1035.

The facts of the case under consideration constitute the plaintiffs' cause of offense a nuisance, and meet the conditions laid down as for the maintenance of an action on the case whenever the injury may actually occur. The structure was in its nature permanent and continuous, but its damnifying effects did not occur until after the lapse of time; and it is a matter of practical importance, though perhaps not touching the principal involved, that they may not be known until they do occur. Perhaps a more accurate use of language, without varying legal effect, would describe the first cause of plaintiff's injury as the destruction of a structure upon which the plaintiffs had a legal right to depend for the support of their land. It may be likened to a hole dug near to one's land, which, after a while and under the influence of the seasons, permits his land to slough away from time to time. The damages complained of flowed as consequences from a nuisance. In the leading case of Backhouse v. Bonomi, 9 H. L. Cas. 503, plaintiffs' lot and the house upon it had been caused to settle by excavation of the underlying strata. In the House of Lords, Lord Chancellor Westbury said: "I think it is abundantly clear, upon both principle and upon authority, that when the enjoyment of the house is interfered with by the actual occurrence of the mischief, the cause of action then arises, and that the action may then be maintained." Upon the same occasion Lord Cranworth observed: "I think the error in the view which has sometimes been taken upon this subject is this: It has been supposed that the right of the party whose land is interfered with is a right to what is called 'the pillars,' or the support. In truth, his right is a right to the ordinary enjoyment of his land; and till that ordinary enjoyment is interfered with, he has nothing of which to complain. That seems to be the principle upon which this case ought to be disposed of." 16 Eng. Rul. Cas. 215. See also Church of the Holy Communion v. Paterson Extension R. Co. 66 N. J. L. 218, 55 L.R.A. 81, 49 Atl. 1030. These cases, and the analogy afforded by our own cases, supra, seem to leave no room for doubt that the statute of limitation will not begin to run in an action of the sort here involved until some actual mischief has been done to the upper soil.

Appellant urges upon our consideration the case of Noonan v. Pardee, 200 Pa. 474, 55 L.R.A. 410, 86 Am. St. Rep. 722, 50 Atl. 255. For precedent that case contents itself with a reference to an earlier decision of Backhouse v. Bonomi, supra, which was overruled on appeal in those decisions from which we have quoted, as it had been in the Exchequer Chamber. For conclusion it holds that "the miner is not forever answerable for even his own default,"—an argument ab inconvenienti, which seems too easily to outweigh the inconveniences which must result to the owners of the upper soil from such a ruling. Without attaching too much importance to the argument from inconvenience as making for one conclusion or another, we quote the remarks of Mr. Justice Willes, when deciding Bonomi v. Backhouse in Exchequer Chamber: "The contention . . . on behalf of the defendant is that the action must be brought within six years after the excavation is made, and that it is immaterial whether any actual damage has occurred or not. The jury, ac-

According to this view, would have, therefore, to decide upon the speculative question whether any damage was likely to arise; and it might well be that in many cases they would, upon the evidence of mineral surveyors and engineers, find that no damage was likely to occur, when the most serious injury afterwards might in fact occur, and in others find and give large sums of money for apprehended damage which in point of fact never might arise. This is certainly not a state of law to be desired." El. Bl. & El. 655.

In line with the authorities noted above, and the reasons upon which they proceed, we hold that a cause of action accrues to the owner of the upper soil when the failure of support by the underlying strata, through causes put into operation by mining them, interferes with the utility and enjoyment of the superincumbent soil.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

ABRAM POOLE et al.

v.

CITY OF LAKE FOREST, Impleaded, etc., Appellant.

(238 Ill. 305, 87 N. E. 320.)

Dedication — plat — shore.

1. The strip of land between the bluff and the water's edge is not dedicated to the public by leaving it blank when platting into lots, streets, and parks, the land on top of the bluff, and stating in the plat that the lake-front lots extend only to the top of the bluff.

Prescription — shore — public use.

2. The mere use by the public of a strip of lake shore for picnics, strolling, pleasure driving, and hauling sand, will not, no matter how long continued, vest in it the right to continue such use, where the use was not confined to a well-defined line of travel.

Taxation — failure to list — effect.

3. Mere failure to list shore property for taxation does not vest title thereto in the public.

Real property — possession — shore.

4. Possession of shore property is established by evidence of the exercise over it of such acts of ownership as might reasonably be expected in view of the nature and situation of the premises.

(February 19, 1909.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Lake County in complainants' favor in a suit to quiet title to certain real property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. David Fales and Smoot & Eyer for appellants.

Messrs. Henry N. Tuttle and Hamlin & Boyden, for appellees:

A blank space on a plat, which is not designated as any street, alley, or other public ground, does not show a dedication, and does not sustain a city's claim of a common-law dedication, where there is no proof of intention by the grantor to dedicate the land to public use, and an acceptance thereof by the public for such use.

Birge v. Centralia, 218 Ill. 503, 75 N. E. 1035; Chicago v. Drexel, 141 Ill. 89, Case Note. — Leaving blank in plat as a dedication.

This note is, in the main, confined to cases where the space in question was left absolutely blank; a few analogous cases have, however, been included.

It is a general rule that, in order to show a dedication, it must clearly appear that the owner intended to give the land to the public. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law p. 60.

Whether or not a dedication results from leaving a blank, therefore, is a question of intention; and this intention is largely determined by the surrounding circumstances. In each case the question is one of fact.

Words are held not necessary to a dedication if the intent can be gathered from other sources. The court in Rowan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 246, said: "We do not understand any of the cases as requiring that words shall be upon the map or plan of a town, expressing the objects and purposes of the different spaces and divisions appearing on its face, unless the case Wood v. Mansell, 3 Blackf. 125 be regarded as going thus far. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Such words as mere names could not operate as grants per se, but only as explanations of the map. Where, from the position and relations of any open space upon the map, it might be doubtful for what use it was intended, or whether it was to be public or private, a word designating its character would be useful, and might be necessary. But when, from the position and relations of any open space in the town, it is apparent that it was intended to be public property, or for the public use, the dedication of such space to the public is as perfect as if the name or purpose were indicated by a written word; and after the sale of lots, made under such dedication, it can neither be revoked nor limited in its extent, on the ground of a supposed excess of the dedication beyond the requirements of the public. The proprietor will have lost all power over the subject, and the only power of the court is to ascertain and establish the fact and extent of the dedication.

Where this intention is not clearly shown, however, by the accompanying circumstances, leaving a space blank will not work a Vernon v. Young*, 124 Iowa, 517, 100 N. W. 694 (lot inclosed and separated by lines from all streets, held not street, although it did not conform to written description of lots).

In Ruch v. Rock Island, 5 Biss. 95, Fed. Cas. No. 12,105, it was held that the fact that one block on a town plat appeared unsubdivided and blank did not alone constitute a dedication, but a statement at the taxes were paid thereon by reason of such nonassessment, does not change the character of the property from a private to a public nature.

The acceptance of a plat by municipal authorities is not necessarily an acceptance as public property of all the streets and alleys that may be shown upon the plat.

Russell v. Chicago & M. Electric R. Co.; Reichert Mill. Co. v. Freeburg; and Chicago v. Drexel,—supra.

No right accrues to the city of Lake Forest from the fact that sand or gravel has been taken from the beach for many years past.

Littlefield v. Maxwell, 31 Me. 134, 50 Am. Dec. 653.

Vickers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill filed by Abram Poole and others to quiet their title and to remove as a cloud therefrom the claim of the city of Lake Forest to a parcel of land located between the east line of lots 30 and 31 and the western shore of Lake Michigan. In 1857 the trustees of the Lake Forest Association, being possessed, as trustees, of sundry lands in townships 43 and 44 in Lake county, bordering on Lake Michigan, made a subdivision of said lands into a town fronting on Lake Michigan. They divided time by the owners that it was to be a public square was held to create a dedication.

And in Elliot v. Atlantic City, 149 Fed. 849, where originally the line of a street had been drawn for a certain width, and later a line had been drawn through the center, apparently adding one half the space to the adjacent lots, it was held that but half the original width of the street was dedicated for the public use.

In Steinauer v. Tell City, 146 Ind. 490, 45 N. E. 1056, where a town plat did not separate a small triangular lot at the intersection of two streets from the streets, it was held that the owner might file a corrected plat two years later, reserving the lot, no other evidence being introduced showing that he intended to dedicate the space.

But, as before stated, where the intention to dedicate is clearly shown, this effect will be given although the space in question contains no words indicating the purpose for which it was intended.

Thus, the court in East Birmingham Realty Co. v. Birmingham Mach. & Foundry Co. (Ala.) 49 So. 448 said: "In other words, that, though a map or plat does not designate eo nomine the street, highway, or alley space in the area plotted, such designation may as certainly appear from the situation created by the relative location of blank spaces and lots or blocks, and from the purpose to which the lots or blocks are expected to be devoted, and from the lines and courses indicated by the map, as they relate to lines of the subdivisions made."

And in Baker v. Barry, 22 R. I. 471, 48 Atl. 795, a blank space of 10 feet, left at the rear of two tiers of lots backing each other, was held to be dedicated as a public way, where the lots were bounded by a gangway. The court said: "Spaces left unmarked on a plat may show a dedication for a street or gangway when taken in connection with declarations of the owner or with user. 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 60, note 3, and cases cited. Such intent becomes conclusive when embodied in a deed by reference to the space as a gangway or street. The layout on the plat, the reference to it as a gangway in the deed of the trustees soon after, the continued reference to it in deeds since, and the subsequent use of it, give ample proof of the dedication of the strip as a gangway. Had the strip been named as a street, there could have been no question as to its dedication. But the purpose of the strip is just as evident as though the owner had written on it, 'This is for a gangway.'"

In the following cases an intention to dedicate was found, notwithstanding the fact that the spaces were unmarked: Oswald v. Grenet, 22 Tex. 94 (triangular lot so situated that building thereon would obstruct view of blocks); East Birmingham Realty Co. v. Birmingham Mach. & Foundry Co. supra (long space between manufacturing blocks, evidently intended for railway facilities); Arnold v. Weiker, 55 Kan. 510, 40 Pac. 901 (strip evidently intended to give access to station, and so situated that, if it was not intended as public way, some lots would have no way of ingress or egress); Webb v. Demopolis, 95 Ala. 116, 21 L.R.A. 62, 13 So. 289 (open space between street and river front on plat of town located especially because of waterway advantages); Coe College v. Cedar Rapids (Iowa) 87 N. W. 444 (space marked off in same manner as other streets, although width and name omitted); Uniontown v. Berry, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1692, 72 S. W. 295 (land lying between street and river, where boundary of village included land to low-water mark); Ingraham v. Brown, 231 Ill. 256, 83 N. E. 156 (figures "138" marked on margin of blank space running between blocks in plat held to indicate street of that width); Davies v. Epstein, 77 Ark. 221, 92 S. W. 19; Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet. 498, 8 L. ed. 477 (street along river held to extend to river, where there was no line showing width of street; the court intimated that it would be otherwise if a limit had been fixed and a space left between the river and street); Thompson v. Maloney, 199 Ill. 276, 93 Am. St. Rep. 133, 65 N. E. 236 (plat with lot and blocks containing unmarked spaces fairly indicating that such spaces were intended as streets);

the lands into lots for private ownership, and into streets, lanes, alleys, and parks for public use. The plat made by said trustees is the original map of the city of Lake Forest. This plat shows a frontage of the city on Lake Michigan of more than 13,000 feet. The shore or beach of Lake Michigan opposite the city of Lake Forest consists of a sloping, sandy beach, extending from the water line back for a distance of from a few feet to about 150 feet to an abrupt bluff, which is from 50 to 75 feet higher than the high point of the said beach below. By the plat made it is stated that all lots fronting on the lake should only extend to the top of the bluff. Lake avenue is laid out on top of the bluff, and parallels the shore of Lake Michigan practically from the northern to the southern limits of the city. At some points Lake avenue is far enough from the crest of the bluff to allow a tier of lots, which are platted, fronting on Lake avenue on the west and extending to the bluff on the east. Such lots were platted north from Deerpath avenue and south from Rosemary avenue. Between these points no lots were platted between the lake and Lake avenue, and the open space left between the water line and the avenue is designated as Forest Park. There are, however, no words on the map indicating what the beach strip north of the north line of Forest Park and south of the south line of the said park was intended to be used for. Lots 30 and 31 are located between the bluff and Lake avenue, and are a considerable distance north from the north end of Forest Park. Lots 30 and 31 were purchased by Abram Poole in 1880. Upon these lots Poole constructed a residence, which has been used and occupied by him and his family, either as a summer residence or as a permanent residence, all of the time since the residence was completed. Abram Poole testifies that, when he first purchased this property, he supposed that lots 30 and 31 extended to the water's edge. Under the belief that he was the owner of the beach strip east of his lots, Poole exercised acts of ownership over the premises down to the lake shore. He shored up the northeast corner of lot 30, built a bath house down near the water's edge, and used the land as his own from the time he acquired the title to lots 30 and 31. The trustees of the Lake Forest Association conveyed the beach strip in question to the trustees of Lake Forest University. On October 29, 1894, it having been discovered that Poole had no deed to the shore strip east of his lots, the trustees of Lake Forest University executed a quit-

Eastman, 21 Minn. 509 (land appearing as continuation of street, affording only street access to lots, although a cul-de-sac); Princeville v. Auten, 77 Ill. 325 (blank square in village plat acquiesced in as public park); Parrish v. Stephens, 1 Or. 60 (space of varying width between blocks and river on plat, where spaces were laid off as streets, but not so marked); Buschmann v. St. Louis, 121 Mo. 523, 26 S. W. 637 (space between lots and river exact width of public wharf existing, which would leave lots with no public front if otherwise construed); Yates v. Judd, 18 Wis. 119 (part of tract delineated as portion of river not inclosed within boundary line of lots); Alves v. Henderson, 16 B. Mon. 131 (space between river and lots fronting toward river); Miller v. Indianapolis, 123 Ind. 196, 24 N. E. 228 (strip extending through entire width of tract, with lots abutting on both sides); De Armas v. New Orleans, 5 La. 132; Lafayette v. Holland, 18 La. 286; New Orleans v. Hopkins, 13 La. 331 (space between street and levee, where long use shown); Municipality No. 2 v. Palfrey, 7 La. Ann. 497 (lot not separated from street, or subdivided for sale, and used for long period by public); Sanborn v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 16 Wis. 20 (surveyor's figures so placed as to leave small triangular space unused and terminate street which was obviously intended to be continued); Porter claim deed conveying all right, title, and interest in and to the premises in controversy in this suit to Abram Poole. After obtaining this deed, Poole continued to exercise acts of ownership over the premises, and expended considerable money thereon for timbers to keep the bank from raveling down, and on the northeast corner he placed heavy timbers to keep waves from encroaching on the bluff, and did other work, such as setting out trees along the bluff, putting in tile drains down the bluff to prevent washing, and hauling a large quantity of dirt from other places and tamping it into the bluff. He made improvements more or less valuable every year during the twenty-seven years that he has had possession of the premises in question.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the title to the premises in question is in the Pooles. The trustees of Lake Forest University were made parties to this suit, but they make no claim to the premises. They have been defaulted and the bill taken as confessed against them. The city of Lake Forest claims that the beach strip in question was dedicated to the public in 1857 by the trustees of the Lake Forest Association. The city also claims that, if there was no valid dedication of the premises to the public, the public has acquired an easement in the premises by continuous adverse use for more than twenty years. The court below found against the city of Lake Forest, and entered a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill. This appeal is prosecuted to reverse that decree by the city of Lake Forest.

The contention of appellant, that the beach strip opposite lots 30 and 31, and other lots similarly situated, was dedicated to the public by the trustees of the Lake Forest Association, is largely based upon the statement in the plat that the lake-front lots extended only to the top of the bluff, and that the space between the top of the bluff and the water line is left without any indication on the plat that it was intended for private ownership. The space upon the plat where the premises in question are located is neither platted as lots or as a street, alley, or public grounds. The fact that the plat recited that lake-front lots extend only to the bluff, and that the space between the bluff and the water line is left unplatted, is relied on by appellant as evidence of an intention on the part of the original owners to dedicate these premises to the public. The mere leaving of a blank upon the plat, without any designation of its purpose, cannot be held sufficient proof of an intention of the owner to dedicate

v. Carpenter, 39 Fla. 14, 21 So. 788 (spaces between blocks and lots, forming no part thereof, and indicating land for streets); Rowan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 232 (space between street and river, where town extended to river).

In Schmitt v. San Francisco, 100 Cal. 302, 34 Pac. 961, a cul-de-sac appearing by lines, but without other designation, was held an offer to dedicate, but the owner was allowed to revoke his offer, where no sale with reference thereto had been made.

In Davies v. Epstein, supra, the court said: "It is inconceivable that the owner intended to lay out a town on the banks of navigable water, and parallel the bank with a street, and at the same time entirely cut it off from access by the public. This is contrary to reason, and to the obvious intention of the owner in selecting the site for the town. Under such circumstances a presumption necessarily arises of a dedication that will give the public access to the water."

And the court in Rowan v. Portland, supra said: "We come to the inquiry whether, upon the face of the map or plan of the town of Portland, the slip or space between Water and Front streets and the river is designated as having been intended and appropriated for public use. . . . That the town extended to the Ohio river, leaving no space between the town and the water, is a position which, in our opinion, does not admit of question. There is no line dividing or separating the town from the river. And, if there were, it should rather be presumed that the space between such line and the river was thus discriminated for the purpose of showing that it was intended for some use of the town different from that of the ordinary streets and public grounds . . . than that a town located upon the bank of such a river, and at a point selected for its commercial advantages, should be wholly shut out from free and common access to the river. The unreasonableness of this latter presumption has been more than once declared by this court, and the fact that a town is laid off upon the bank of a navigable river has been held to be sufficient evidence of its extending to the water, unless a contrary intention is manifestly indicated. . . . We are of opinion that the fair and necessary inference from the face of the map is that the entire slip along the whole front of the town (with the exception before referred to) was left open for the public use, and was intended to be and remain a common or public ground, affording free access from all parts of the town to all parts of the river in front of it; and that this access was given, not merely for the use of the water for ordinary domestic purposes, but for the use of the river as a great highway of commerce, and for the enjoyment and security of all the advantages which the location of the town upon such a river, and at a point eligible for the anchoring or mooring of vessels and for the deposit and landing or shipment of merchandise, was calculated to afford."

the premises represented by such blank or undesignated space to public use.

In Chicago v. Drexel, 141 Ill. 89, 30 N. E. 774, certain premises were platted along the lake shore in the town of Lake View as an addition to said town. On the plat a strip was left between the platted blocks and the shore line of Lake Michigan. Nothing was placed upon the plat to indicate the intention to devote said space to public use, and it was held that said plat did not amount to an offer to dedicate said strip to the town of Lake View as a public street, nor show a dedication. To establish a dedication, it should clearly appear that the owner intended to give the land to the public. It is not enough to show that it is not intended for private use. The particular use for which the land was intended must plainly appear. A situation very similar to that presented in the Drexel Case was again before this court in Mason v. Chicago, 183 Ill. 351, 45 N. E. 567, and the doctrine of the Drexel Case was reaffirmed; and in the more recent case of Birge v. Centralia, 218 Ill. 503, 75 N. E. 1035, this court again reaffirmed the doctrine of the Drexel Case, and there held that the mere making of a plat leaving certain parts of the premises without any designation of the use to which they were to be put was not sufficient evidence of an intention to dedicate such premises to the public. In our opinion these cases are conclusive against appellant's contention that the plat operated as a dedication of these premises to the public. There is nothing on the face of the plat offered in evidence in this case from which an intention to dedicate the premises in question to the public can be claimed. If the trustees of the Lake Forest Association had desired to dedicate this beach strip to the public for a highway or a park along the beach, it is reasonable to suppose that they would have so designated it upon the plat. It will be seen by reference to the plat itself that Mayflower park, University park, Academy park, and Forest park are all clearly designated upon the face of the plat. Forest Park extends from Lake avenue to the shore of Lake Michigan, but it does not extend north so as to embrace the shore strip east of the platted lots between Lake avenue and the bluff. In 1875 the trustees of the Lake Forest Association made a conveyance to Lake Forest University of the entire shore strip, except that part of it immediately adjacent to Forest park. This act of the trustees of Lake Forest Association is inconsistent with an intention on their part to dedicate this strip to the public. It may well be that the trustees of the Lake Forest Association had not fully determined what disposition to make of the beach strip when the plat was made and recorded. It may be that it was reserved with the intention to ultimately dedicate it to the public should the future needs of the city make such course desirable. Whatever may have been the original purpose, the fact remains that the Lake Forest Association conveyed this beach strip to the Lake Forest University, and the trustees of the university conveyed it to the present owners. The evidence in this record being wholly insufficient to establish a dedication or an offer by the owners to dedicate the premises to the public, it is unnecessary to consider the question whether there has been an acceptance of such offer by the public.

It is contended, however, by appellant, that, independently of the question of a dedication of the lots in question, the right to use them for public purposes has become vested in the city of Lake Forest by prescription, and that for this reason the decree of the court below should be reversed. The evidence in support of this contention shows that the strip in question was used, to some extent, for the purpose of picnics, fishing, bathing, and other similar purposes. People from the village and elsewhere walked on the beach occasionally on Sundays and sometimes in the evenings. There is some evidence that occasionally a carriage would be seen driving along the beach. The principal use, however, that was made of the strip was by teamsters hauling sand from the beach. There was no road or street over the premises, and persons who went there drove or walked indiscriminately, wherever they saw proper to go. The city of Lake Forest never expended any money or labor in the construction or maintenance of the premises, either as a street or park. The evidence simply shows that the owner of these premises, whose residence was on the bluff above, acquiesced in the use of this beach by the public so long as such use did not interfere with his own rights. The evidence shows that the owner obtained an injunction against teamsters, and stopped them from hauling sand across these premises. These premises were uninclosed, and persons passing up and down the lake shore under the bluff, either for purposes of pleasure or business, would necessarily cross over the premises in question; but it is not contended that the travel was extensive, nor was it confined to any particular well-defined line. In Elliott on Roads and Streets, 2d ed. § 176, it is said: "The public cannot acquire a prescriptive right to pass over land generally, and, where a highway is claimed by prescription, a certain and well-defined line of travel must be shown."

This rule has been approved as the law of this state. Bethel v. Pruett, 215 Ill. 162, 74 N. E. 111.

Appellant points out the fact that the beach strip in question had never been listed for taxation, and that no taxes have been paid thereon by anyone, and contends that this fact proves that the premises in question were regarded as public property. The law does not demand the forfeiture of title simply because the owner of property does not cause it to be listed for taxation. The utmost that can be claimed by appellant from this circumstance is that the failure of the public authorities and the owner to have the premises listed and taxed is an evidentiary fact, tending to prove that the premises were regarded as public property. This fact, while entitled to consideration and due weight, is not conclusive upon the owner. As bearing upon this branch of the case, appellant cites and relies upon the case of Owen v. Brookport, 208 Ill. 35, 69 N. E. 952, where this court had under consideration the question whether a strip of land in front of the village of Brookport, and between the front tier of lots and the Ohio river, had been dedicated to the public as a street or highway. In front of a tier of lots fronting toward the Ohio river was an open space of ground marked on the plat "Water street," and the question involved was whether Water street extended to the water's edge or to the top of the bank only. In that case, as in the one at bar, the strip of land in question had not been listed for taxation by the persons who set up title against the public. The action was a proceeding in chancery for partition, and upon an appeal to this court the facts were, of course, open for consideration. In discussing the evidence in its bearing upon the question at issue, attention is called to the failure of the claimant to have the premises listed for taxation. All that is there said, however, upon this point, must be regarded merely as the conclusion of the court upon a question of fact. It is true that the conclusion there reached was that the locus in quo was a street, but the decision did not rest alone upon the failure to list the land in question for taxation. Other evidence, not necessary to recapitulate here, was in the record of that case, which satisfactorily showed an intention to dedicate the premises to the public, and that the same were accepted and used by the public for nearly half a century before the suit was brought. There are no rules of law laid down in that case that conflict with the conclusions we have reached in the case at bar.

Appellant finally contends that the averment in the bill that the appellees were in possession of the strip of land in question is not sustained by the proofs. We cannot assent to this contention. Appellees were in actual possession, at least, of that portion of the premises occupied by the bath house. They were claiming under a paper title which described accurately the premises involved in this suit. Where a party is in the actual possession of a part of a tract or a piece of land, claiming to be the owner of all of it, the paper title under which he claims is evidence of the extent of his possession. Aside from this, we think that the evidence sufficiently shows that appellees were in the actual possession of all of the premises. The evidence shows that such acts of ownership were exercised over this property as might reasonably be expected in view of the nature and situation of the premises. This is all that the law requires in this regard.

Finding no error in the record, the decree of the Circuit Court of Lake County is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE A. MILLER et al., Appts.,

v.

CITY OF DES MOINES et al.

(— Iowa, —, 122 N. W. 226.)

Municipal authority — union labor.

1. A municipal corporation has no power to require its work to be performed only by union labor.

Same — public contracts — discrimination.

2. A municipality, in letting contracts for public printing, cannot discriminate in favor of union labor.

Municipality — illegal contract — taxpayers' relief — insignificant amount.

3. That the amount involved in a municipal contract in the letting of which discrimination is made in favor of union labor is insignificant as compared with the city's

Case Note. — Right of municipality or other public body to discriminate in favor of organized labor.

The doctrine of MILLER v. DES MOINES represents the consensus of judicial opinion on the question as to the right of public bodies to discriminate in favor of union labor. The cases are as follows:

In Holden v. Alton, 179 Ill. 318, 58 N. E. 556, where an ordinance passed in pursuance of a provision of the incorporation act required that all municipal printing should be let to the lowest bidder, an ordinance restricting awards of contracts for such printing to union shops was held illegal, as tending to create a monopoly, and as imposing an additional burden on taxpayers.

And in Marshall & B. Co. v. Nashville, 109 Tenn. 495, 71 S. W. 815, where the munic-revenue or its ability to pay does not prevent the granting of relief to complaining taxpayers against performance of the contract.

Same — right to relief.

4. A taxpayer of a municipality may maintain an action to test the validity of contracts awarded upon bids, where only those of persons employing union labor were considered.

Illegal contract — performance — return of price.

5. One who has performed public printing under a contract void because the municipality discriminated in favor of union labor in awarding it will not be compelled to return money already received therefor, where the price was not unreasonable and the suit is in equity, not begun until the time arrived for performing the contract, and no preliminary injunction was asked, while the nisi prius court upheld the validity of the contract, so that the performance could not, for a time, have been avoided.

(July 2, 1909.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County dismissing a bill filed to restrain the performance of an alleged illegal contract for public printing. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bowen, Bremner, & Alberson, and Parrish & Dowell, for appellants:

A taxpayer may bring an action to prevent misappropriation of public funds.

ipal charter required that contracts for goods and supplies furnished the city must be let to the lowest responsible bidders, an ordinance requiring the union label on city printing was held void, in that it conflicted with the spirit and purpose of the charter, constituted class legislation, was arbitrarily discriminatory in its character, and contrary to public policy in that it stifled competition and fostered monopoly, and in that it violated the 14th Amendment by depriving those not using the union label of their "liberty" and the equal protection of the law in pursuing their vocation of printing.

And in Atlanta v. Stein, 111 Ga. 789, 51 L.R.A. 335, 36 S. E. 933, a case on all fours with MILLER v. DES MOINES, an ordinance requiring the union label of the Allied Printing Trades Council on all city printing was held void, as tending to encourage monopoly and defeat competition, notwithstanding there was no charter requirement that printing contracts should be let to the lowest bidder.

In Adams v. Brennan, 177 Ill. 194, 42 L.R.A. 718, 69 Am. St. Rep. 222, 52 N. E. 314, which is quoted from with approval in the MILLER CASE, it was held that a stipulation that none but union labor should be employed by the contractor cannot be lawfully made in a contract for repairs to school buildings by a public corporation such as a board of education, as it constitutes a discrimination between different classes of citizens, and is of such a nature as to restrict competition, and to increase the cost of the work.

And in Lewis v. Board of Education, 139 Mich. 306, 102 N. W. 756, following Holden v. Alton, supra, it was held that the board of education of a municipal corporation has no power to require contractors respecting public buildings to employ union labor exclusively.

And in Fiske v. People, 188 Ill. 206, 52 L.R.A. 291, 58 N. E. 985, an ordinance giving a monopoly to union labor on city contracts by providing that all such contracts shall contain a stipulation that none but union labor will be employed was held void, as making an unconstitutional discrimination between different classes of citizens, and both 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

cause it lays down a rule which restricts competition, and tends to increase the cost of work.

And Paterson Chronicle Co. v. Paterson, 66 N. J. L. 129, 48 Atl. 589, reaches the same conclusion through a similar course of reasoning.

In Davenport v. Walker, 57 App. Div. 221, 68 N. Y. Supp. 161, a requirement in a contract made by a board of supervisors for the construction of a public building, that the contractor should employ no workmen "except members of some trades organization, when practical," was held to be against public policy, as tending to waste the public money without justifiable cause.

In State ex rel. Robert Mitchell Furniture Co. v. Toole, 28 Mont. 22, 55 L.R.A. 644, 91 Am. St. Rep. 386, 66 Pac. 496, the court held that a valid contract for public supplies cannot be let upon a bid tendered pursuant to an advertisement limiting the right to bid to persons employing, or who will in the future employ, union labor only.

And a requirement by a board of supervisors advertising for bids for the printing of its journal, that the Allied Printing Trades Council label must be used by the printer, was held unlawful, as tending to create a monopoly by restricting competition to a special class of printers, in People ex rel. John Single Paper Co. v. Edgcomb, 112 App. Div. 604, 98 N. Y. Supp. 965.

In Grey v. People, 194 Ill. 486, 62 N. E. 894, it was held that the existence of a union labor ordinance did not invalidate an assessment for public improvement, where it did not appear that the contract for the improvement contained a union labor clause, or that such ordinance was enforced in any manner in the contract for work, since, as such ordinance was void, it must be presumed, in the absence of proof, that it was so treated by the municipal authorities.

The foregoing cases should not be confused with those which involve the right of an individual to discriminate in favor of organized labor, as that class of cases stands upon an entirely different footing. See State ex rel. Robert Mitchell Furniture Co. v. Toole, supra.

Littler v. Jayne, 124 Ill. 123, 16 N. E. 374; Inge v. Board of Public Works, 135 Ala. 187, 93 Am. St. Rep. 20, 33 So. 678; Patterson v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 96 Minn. 9, 104 N. W. 566; Atlanta v. Stein, 111 Ga. 789, 51 L.R.A. 335, 36 S. E. 932; Adams v. Brennan, 177 Ill. 194, 42 L.R.A. 718, 69 Am. St. Rep. 222, 52 N. E. 314; Anderson v. Orient F. Ins. Co. 88 Iowa, 579, 55 N. W. 348; Goetzman v. Whitaker, 81 Iowa, 527, 46 N. W. 1058; Snyder v. Foster, 77 Iowa, 640, 42 N. W. 506; Collins v. Davis, 57 Iowa, 256, 10 N. A taxpayer may bring an action to enjoin the carrying out of the provisions of an illegal contract for public work, notwithstanding that he was a bidder for the work contracted for.

Holden v. Alton, 179 Ill. 318, 53 N. E. 556.

An ordinance requiring the use of the Allied Printing Trades Council or union label on all printed matter furnished the city is void as class legislation.

State v. Garbroski, 111 Iowa, 496, 56 L.R.A. 570, 82 Am. St. Rep. 524, 82 N. W. 959; State ex rel. Bump v. Omaha & C. B. R. & Bridge Co. 113 Iowa, 30, 52 L.R.A. 315, 86 Am. St. Rep. 357, 84 N. W. 983; Pacific Junction v. Dyer, 64 Iowa, 38, 19 N. W. 862; Marshall & B. Co. v. Nashville, 109 Tenn. 495, 71 S. W. 815; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064; Adams v. Brennan, supra.

Such an ordinance is repugnant to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Marshall & B. Co. v. Nashville, supra.

Such an ordinance is unreasonable, discriminatory, vicious, and against public policy.

Marshall & B. Co. v. Nashville, supra.

Such an ordinance tends to create a monopoly and restrict competition.

Lewis v. Board of Education, 139 Mich. 306, 102 N. W. 756; Atlanta v. Stein, supra; Marshall & B. Co. v. Nashville, 109 Tenn. 496, 71 S. W. 815; Fishburn v. Chicago, 171 Ill. 338, 39 L.R.A. 482, 63 Am. St. Rep. 236, 49 N. E. 532; Adams v. Brennan, supra.

The ordinance and contract thereunder are void because they throw upon the taxpayers an increased burden by increasing the cost of printing.

Holden v. Alton and Adams v. Brennan, supra.

The refusal of a city council to exercise, after an investigation, a discretion based on facts, which refusal will result in a misap- 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

propriation of the public funds, constitutes a legal fraud on the taxpayers.

Atlanta v. Stein, supra; Holden v. Alton, supra.

In exercising its discretion as to who is the lowest responsible bidder, the city council cannot act arbitrarily and give to its action any legal effect; it must make a determination based upon some facts tending to show that the lower bids are not the bids of responsible bidders.

People ex rel. Coughlin v. Gleason, 121 N. Y. 631, 25 N. E. 4; State, McGovern, Prosecutor, v. Board of Public Works, 57 N. J. L. 580, 31 Atl. 613; Inge v. Board of Public Works, supra.

The fact that some of the councilmen thought their action was for the benefit of the public cannot afford a justification for limiting competition among bidders, or a justification for requiring such bidders to abandon the right to contract with whomsoever they choose for the performance of the work.

Adams v. Brennan, supra.

The contract for the printing of the city's proceedings and statements of expenses is illegal and void, in that the council, in awarding the contract, did not exercise its untrammelled judgment and honest discretion, but was controlled by an illegal ordinance.

Goddard v. Lowell, 179 Mass. 496, 61 N. E. 53; Atlanta v. Stein and Adams v. Brennan, supra.

The fact that the work or portions of it under the contract has been done and paid for does not affect the power of the court to compel restitution.

Holden v. Alton, supra.

Messrs. William H. Bally, C. O. Holly, and W. E. Miller for appellees.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ordinance No. 452 of the city of Des Moines, passed December 17, 1888, and amended April 17, 1899, enacts and establishes certain regulations concerning supplies procured or purchased for the use of the city. So far as is material to this case said ordinance is in the following words:

"Advertising for Supplies. Section 1. The city clerk is hereby required to advertise in at least two newspapers published in the city of Des Moines for three weeks, two insertions each week, for bids for furnishing all supplies of every kind for the several departments of the city not required to be advertised for by the board of public works. Whenever such supplies, together with the printed matter required to be advertised for by the board of public works, includes printed stationery, printed blanks, printed reports, or other printed matter, the same shall have printed thereon the Allied Printing Trades Council label.

"Statement of Supplies Needed. Sec. 2. Each officer or board in charge of any department shall furnish and file in the city clerk's office, thirty days before the first day of each fiscal year, a sworn, detailed statement of the supplies necessary for his or their department during the next fiscal year.

"Penalties. Sec. 3. Any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be subject to a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $10."

On December 19, 1899, an ordinance, No. 1060, was enacted, providing that all proceedings, ordinances, and resolutions of the city council shall be published in pamphlet form, under such regulations as may be imposed by the council. It was also further provided that the contract for the production of such pamphlets shall be let to the lowest bidder after a period of advertising for proposals. On July 18, 1906, ordinance No. 1383 was passed, amending § 3 of ordinance 1060, to make the same read as follows: "The city clerk shall each year, at the time of advertising for bids for supplies, advertise by two insertions in each of two daily papers for sealed proposals for publishing said pamphlets for the next year. Said bids, when received, shall be submitted to the council at their first meeting after bids are received, the contract shall be made with the lowest responsible bidder, but the council may reject all bids and direct the clerk to advertise for new proposals; each bid shall be accompanied by a certified check in the sum of $50, payable to the order of the treasurer, as security that the bidder will enter into contract for doing the work, and give the bond required. The contract shall be prepared by the solicitor and executed by the mayor on behalf of the city, and shall be accompanied by a bond in the penalty of $500, with a corporate surety, conditioned for the faithful performance of the contract. Said contract and bond shall be filed with the city clerk, but the city shall not be bound thereby until the contract and sureties in the bond have been approved by the city council. All ordinances and parts of ordinances inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

Pursuant to the terms of the last-mentioned ordinance the city clerk advertised for proposals for the work of publishing the council proceedings for the year beginning April 1, 1908. Responding to this call, bids were tendered by eight different firms or companies doing business as job printers in the city of Des Moines, as follows:

Bischoff Bros.	$1.12	per page
Welch Printing Company..	1.01	" "
Iowa Printing Company...	.97	" "
Register & Leader Company	.95	" "
Kenyon Printing Company	.93	" "
Homestead Company92	" "
G. A. Miller Printing Company89½	" "
Globe Publishing Company	.89	" "

On May 14, 1908, the council voted to award the work to the Register & Leader Company, and directed the mayor to enter into a contract with said company on the terms of its bid. The contract was executed accordingly on or about the date last mentioned, and the printing of the council proceedings for the fiscal year has been done by the Register & Leader job office under the terms of said agreement. On May 16, 1908, this action was instituted. The plaintiffs are taxpayers in Des Moines, and are severally engaged in business as job printers in said city. The mayor, the city auditor, clerk, and treasurer, and the Register & Leader Company are impleaded with the city as defendants. The petition alleges that, of the eight bidders for the work of printing the council proceedings, as hereinbefore shown, the four whose bids were lower than the bid of the Register & Leader Company conducted what is known as nonunion offices,—that is, the said bidders did not employ exclusively what is known as "union labor,"—and for that reason none of them was authorized to mark its work with the "union label," for which reason, as they allege, the city council wrongfully, and without authority of law, excluded the bids of such nonunion competitors from consideration in awarding the contracts, and awarded it to the Register & Leader Company, not because it was the lowest responsible bidder in fact, but because it was the lowest bidder among the union offices competing for the job. The petition proceeds to aver that each of the nonunion bidders is the proprietor of a well-established job printing business, with an office well supplied with all facilities to do good work of the kind required, and was and is at all times ready, able, and willing to do such work. Each is also alleged to be pecuniarily responsible, able to provide the bond required by the ordinances, and is in all respects as able and as well qualified to do and perform said work as are any of the competing union offices, save only in the right to attest their printed matter by the use of the union label. Plaintiffs also allege that ordinance No. 452, as amended by No. 966, is void and of no effect, as an attempt to authorize an unlawful discrimination between bidders of equal qualification and merit, thereby unreasonably restricting competition among bidders, and imposing undue burdens upon the taxpayers of the city. They allege that the council did follow and observe the provisions of said void ordinance in letting the contract in question, whereby the contract, as made, calls for an expenditure of the public funds largely in excess of the sum which would have been required had it been let to the lowest responsible bidder, as in law and in right it should have been. On this showing it is asked that a decree be entered adjudging said ordinance No. 452 to be void, and that the city, its council and officers, be enjoined from carrying out the contract made with the Register & Leader Company, and from issuing or paying any warrants upon the city treasury for work done under said contract, and for general relief. Answering the petition, the defendants say that the contract was let to the Register & Leader Company because it was the lowest responsible bidder for the work; that the use of the union label is a guaranty of the character of the work to which it is attached, and of the skill and labor employed therein, and that said label is copyrighted, but the use thereof is free to all persons who comply with certain reasonable conditions. They also deny that plaintiffs have any such interest in the matter of said contract for printing the council proceedings as enables them to maintain this action, and allege that the difference in expenditure between the cost of the printing at the contract price and the cost computed on the basis of the lowest bid therefor is only about $120,—a merely nominal sum as compared with the taxable value of property within the city,—and that it is therefore impossible that plaintiffs should be irreparably injured because of the alleged wrong or irregularity in the manner of letting the contract. They also deny each and every allegation of the petition imputing to them any wrongful or unlawful act or purpose in the consideration of the bids or in awarding the work to the successful competitor. No preliminary injunction was issued, and some six months after the commencement of this action, plaintiffs filed an amendment to their petition, alleging that, during all the time since the filing of the petition, the city and the Register & Leader Company have been carrying out the contract made as aforesaid, in that, in compensation of the work so done, the city has paid the said company considerable sums of money, for a return of which judgment is demanded. The Register & Leader Company answer these complaints by alleging that it was duly adjudged by the council to be the lowest bidder, and that no consideration other than the amount and character of the work and the price to be paid entered into or was considered in awarding to it the contract; that relying on said contract, and carrying out its terms in good faith, it has performed the work demanded by the city, and received its pay therefor, and that the price paid is reasonable and just. It also avers that the use of the union label on the printing done was not considered or in any manner referred to in the bid of said company, or in the contract entered into between it and the city for the said work. All the defendants aver that ordinance No. 452 was repealed by implication in enacting ordinance No. 1383.

1. The controversy presented by this appeal is complicated by very few disputes of fact, while the questions of law involved, though not entirely easy of solution, are not difficult to state. The fact with which we are at this time principally concerned has reference to the manner and method pursued by the city council in passing upon the proposals tendered by the several bidders already named, and the considerations upon which the award was made. The evidence is undisputed that, with the possible exception of one, each of the bidders whose offer was lower than that of the Register & Leader Company was amply able, ready, and willing to accept the contract on the basis of their several bids, and to perform the same promptly in an efficient and workmanlike manner. Nor is there any claim that the sufficiency of their qualifications in this respect was unknown to any member of the council. They were well-known proprietors of job printing offices in the city, or, if not well known, there is not the slightest evidence of any attempt on the part of any member of the council to inquire into the facts, and ascertain whether they or any of them could perform the work if awarded the contract. The council at the time in question consisted of a mayor and four members, as follows: Mayor A. J. Mathis and Councilmen McVicar, Ash, Hamery, and Schramm. Of these, the first four were called as witnesses by the plaintiff, and, upon being interrogated as to the awarding of the contract and the reasons controlling the same, Mayor Mathis, after saying that he speaks only for himself, proceeds as follows: "I investigated far enough to know that, at the time this resolution was passed, that the company the contract was awarded to used the union label in accordance with the ordinance passed some years ago. That was as far as I went when I determined that the Register & Leader Company was the lowest bidder who used the union label. In addition to that I was fully satisfied that they

the award was made adjudicated and determined as a protection to themselves and to the public against similar irregularities in the future. That end is attained by our decision as already announced. Without, therefore, attempting to define what rights at law, if any, the city may have with respect to so much of the contract compensation, if any, as remains unpaid, the record as it stands does not call for equitable interference. For the reasons stated, the decision of the district court dismissing plaintiffs' demand for judgment against the contractor is affirmed, and in all other respects reversed. Decree will be entered in this court at the option of the appellants, exercised within thirty days; otherwise, the cause will be remanded to the trial court for decree not inconsistent with the views here expressed.

Reversed in part. Affirmed in part.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE'S STATE BANK OF MICHIGAN VALLEY et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

G. W. BROWN.

(— Kan. —, 103 Pac. 102.)

Sale — cash — default — right to reclaim — jury.

1. When a bargain is completed for the sale of specific personal property for cash, and delivery is made, if the buyer fails to pay the price promptly the seller has a right, as between the parties or against an attaching creditor, to reclaim the property, which is not lost by delay to assert it, unless an intention on his part is shown that the title should pass absolutely; and whether that is the case is ordinarily a question of fact, to be determined in view of all the circumstances.

Same — laches — effect.

2. In an action for conversion, the evidence tended to show these facts: A farmer residing some miles from a town delivered wheat to a buyer there, with the understanding that it was to be paid for at once. He received therefor a check on a local bank, which he took home with him, it being after banking hours. He did not present the check until his next trip to town, between two and three weeks later, when payment was refused. The buyer had no funds on deposit when the check was drawn, but had an arrangement with the bank, under which it paid his checks and took bills of lading on the shipment of grain as security. A week after the issuance of the check, the buyer became insolvent, and the bank attached the wheat. After the dishonor of the check, the seller sued the bank for the value of the wheat. Held, that his failure to make an earlier presentment of the check did not conclusively show a waiver of his right to reclaim the wheat.

(July 3, 1909.)

ERROR to the District Court for Osage County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the conversion of certain grain sold on a condition which had not been complied with. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. B. Crum and O. B. Hartley, for plaintiffs in error:

The title to the wheat levied on by the defendant bank passed from the seller to the buyer.

Note. — The early cases passing upon the question of delay in attempting to regain property obtained under agreement to pay therefor on delivery, as waiver of that condition, will be found gathered in the note to Frech v. Lewis, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 948, referred to by the court in PEOPLE'S STATE BANK v. BROWN.

A search has disclosed but one case in addition to those dealt with in the opinion, which has passed upon the question since the writing of that note.

In Victor Safe & Lock Co. v. Texas State Trust Co. (Tex.) 104 S. W. 1040, affirming (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 1049, a safe was sold, to be paid for on delivery; payment was not made as agreed; and several drafts were drawn, which were returned unpaid; letters relative to payment passed between the parties for a year, when the purchaser became insolvent. It was held, in an action to recover possession, that the vendor by his acts had waived his right to reclaim the property.

Mason, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

G. W. Brown sold and delivered some wheat to the Quenemo Mill & Elevator Company, and received therefor the company's check on the People's State Bank of Michigan Valley, situated in the same town. He carried the check home with him,—a distance of some 8 miles,—having received it after banking hours. Between two and three weeks later he took the check to Ot-tawa, where he did his banking; this being the first time since receiving it that he had been to either town. The check was then, in due course of business, presented to the drawee for payment, which was refused. When it was drawn, the elevator company had no funds on deposit, but had an arrangement with the bank by which its checks given for wheat were to be paid, the grain to be shipped, and the bill of lading turned over to the bank. The bank paid checks under this arrangement as they were presented, until about August 28th, when the company became insolvent, and the practice was discontinued. The bank then sued the company, and attached the wheat referred to, with other property. About September 19th Brown demanded of the bank either the payment of the check or the return of the wheat, and, receiving neither, on October 17th brought action against it for conversion. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant prosecutes error upon the sole ground that the evidence, the substance of which has been stated, showed conclusively that the title to the wheat had passed to the elevator company.

It was, of course, competent for Brown and the elevator company to make any agreement they saw fit as to when the absolute title to the wheat should pass; but, in the absence of anything to indicate the contrary, the transaction between them must be taken to have been the ordinary one of the sale of specific personal property for cash, delivery being made in the expectation of immediate payment. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1095, note 10. In such a case the 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) failure of the buyer to pay the purchase price authorizes the seller to reclaim the property. "Where the sale is for cash, payment, it is said, must precede the transfer of title." 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1052. See notes to the paragraph from which the sentence quoted is taken, including those found in the supplements. In these notes, cases are cited having a contrary tendency; but, so far as they are irreconcilable with the proposition stated, they are out of harmony with what is now the established doctrine on the subject. It is true that, as a matter of theory, a consistent and logical argument can be made to support the view, which is thus expressed in a recent textbook (Williston, Sales, § 346): "If after bargaining for a cash sale the seller subsequently voluntarily delivers to the buyer the goods with the intent that the buyer may immediately use them as his own [i. e., not for inspection or a similar purpose], and without insisting upon contemporaneous payment, this action is absolutely inconsistent with the original bargain. Such a delivery is not only evidence of the waiver of the condition of cash payment; it should be conclusive evidence."

But as a practical necessity, to avoid the inconvenience of requiring the seller of an article to keep one hand upon it until with the other he grasps the currency tendered in payment, there must be some relaxation of this rule. Delivery and payment, as a practical matter, cannot be absolutely simultaneous. Some slight interval between the two acts is inevitable, and the criterion upon which the courts have agreed with substantial unanimity is that such interval does not conclusively prove a total abandonment of title and the right of possession by the seller, unless under all the circumstances of the case it in fact shows that result to have been intended. Some ingenuity has been exercised, with doubtful profit, in defining the character of the right remaining in the seller after a delivery and before payment, where there is no purpose to give credit. Whether it is more properly described as a lien, a retention of title, or an option to rescind the contract, is not very important so far as affects the solution of the problem presented here. It is a right of the seller to repossess himself of the goods if the buyer fails in the performance of the agreement on his part which was intended to be contemporaneous with the delivery. It is a peculiar right, growing out of a peculiar situation, and it is not necessary to give it a name the use of which might seem to decide controversies growing out of other relations. This right has long been recognized in Kansas (Daugherty v. Fowler, 44 Kan. 628, 10 L.R.A. 314, 25 Pac.

40), and is now generally acknowledged elsewhere. "It may be stated, as a general rule fully established by the cases, that, if goods are sold on condition to be performed immediately, and the vendor makes an actual delivery upon the faith that the condition will be immediately performed, and demands such performance with reasonable speed, and it is refused, no property in the goods passes to the purchaser, but that he simply holds them in trust for the vendor until such payment is made or waived." 120 Am. St. Rep. 869, note.

The fact that Brown accepted a check did not imply an extension of credit, or preclude the exercise of the right of reclamation in the case of its nonpayment upon timely presentation. Hodgson v. Barrett, 33 Ohio St. 63, 31 Am. Rep. 527; National Bank v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 44 Minn. 224, 9 L.R.A. 263, 20 Am. St. Rep. 566, 46 N. W. 342, 560; Johnson-Brinkman Commission Co. v. Central Bank, 116 Mo. 558, 38 Am. St. Rep. 615, 22 S. W. 813; Hall v. Missouri P. R. Co. 50 Mo. App. 179; Mathews v. Cowan, 59 Ill. 341; Canadian Bank v. McCrea, 106 Ill. 281; Peoria & P. U. R. Co. v. Buckley, 114 Ill. 337, 2 N. E. 179; Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Pope, 122 Ga. 577, 50 S. E. 374. The fact that the check might have been paid if it had reached the bank within a week from its date did not convert its acceptance by Brown into a payment. That would have been the result if payment had been prevented by the failure of the bank in the meantime, but such effect follows only where loss is occasioned to the drawer. 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 572; Mordis v. Kennedy, 23 Kan. 408, 33 Am. Rep. 169; Brown v. Schintz, 202 Ill. 509, 67 N. E. 172; Manitoba Mortg. & Invest. Co. v. Weiss, 18 S. D. 459, 112 Am. St. Rep. 799, 101 N. W. 37, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 858. The elevator company had no funds in the bank, and therefore was not injured by the delay in the presentation of the check. The bank as an attaching creditor was not a purchaser in good faith, and was entitled to none of the peculiar rights growing out of that relation. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 705, note. On the other hand, it had the same standing as any other creditor. It had committed no wrong; and, if the title to the wheat had actually passed absolutely to the elevator company, there was no reason why it might not seize it to satisfy its claim against that company. So far there is no room for a substantial difference of opinion. But the real question upon which the affirmation or reversal of the case must turn is this: Did the delay of Brown to present the check for between two and three weeks, as a matter of law, amount to a waiver, or afford conclusive proof of a waiver, of his right to reclaim the wheat, thereby causing the elevator company's title to become absolute? This question must be determined upon principles entirely different from those involved under similar circumstances, where the rights of innocent purchasers have intervened. There the question presented is one of equitable estoppel, and delay is important as tending to mislead others to their prejudice. Here the question is one of evidence, and delay is important as tending to show an intention that title should pass. Equitable considerations are not involved. True, it seems but fair and just that the plaintiff should have either his wheat or his money, but the same would be true if he had sold it on credit, and the buyer had failed to pay at the promised time. In neither case could he maintain replevin if the title had actually passed from him.

It is said in the introduction to a note to McIver v. Williamson-Halsell-Frazier Co. bearing upon the subject under consideration, in 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 697: "The authorities are agreed on the proposition, that, as between the immediate parties to a cash sale, the title does not pass until payment, even though there is a delivery of the goods by the seller to the buyer, unless the circumstances of such delivery are such as to show an intentional waiver by the seller of payment as a condition precedent to the passing of title. This question is generally said to be one of fact, to be determined by a jury." The cases are also collected and reviewed in notes in 120 Am. St. Rep. 864, and in 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 948, in the latter of which it is said: "The decisions upon this point depend largely upon the facts and circumstances of each case. The question is: Did the vendor act within a reasonable time, to recover possession of the property; that is, within such a time as, taken in connection with other facts and circumstances, shows an intention to retain title until the condition of payment has been complied with?"

The case annotated (Frech v. Lewis, 218 Pa. 141, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 948, 120 Am. St. Rep. 864, 67 Atl. 45, 11 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 545) contains this strong statement of the requirement that the seller who wishes to assert the right of reclamation must act promptly: "The settled doctrine of our cases is to the effect that, where the contract of sale provides for payment of the purchase price on delivery of the articles sold, and the seller delivers the goods, but the buyer fails to pay, the right of property does not pass to the buyer with the possession, but remains with the seller, who may at this option reclaim the goods. In some jurisdictions the right of property is held to pass with the delivery, unless at the time the right to retake is expressly declared by the seller. We have not gone so far. Our cases proceed on the theory that until payment has been made, or waived, the contract remains executory, and that delivery in such case is not a completion of the contract, except as an intention to so regard it is expressly declared, or can fairly be inferred from the circumstances attending. Possession, however, having passed, and the buyer of the act of the seller having been invested with the indicia of ownership, the policy of our law requires that this situation—the possession in one and the right of property in another—shall continue no longer than is necessary to enable the seller to recover the goods with which he has parted. The law gives the seller the right in such case to reclaim his goods, but he must do so promptly; otherwise he will be held to have waived his right, and can only thereafter look to the buyer for the price. The question the present case suggests is, When does this inference of waiver arise? Our authorities admit of but one answer: Except when delayed by trick or artifice, the assertion of the right to reclaim the property must follow immediately upon the buyer's default. This does not mean that the seller must eo instante begin legal proceedings to recover the goods; but it does mean that the seller, when he discovers that his delivery is not followed by payment, as he had the right to expect, is at once put to his election whether he will waive the condition as to payment, and allow the delivery to become absolute, or retake property, and that he is to allow no unnecessary delay in making his choice. The object of the law is not to multiply his remedies because of his disappointment. He may not continue to hold his right to the goods, and at the same time hold the buyer as his creditor; one or the other he must relinquish, and do it promptly, or the law will forfeit his right to elect. Continued acquiescence in the buyer's possession of the goods will be taken as a choice on his part to regard the delivery as absolute, notwithstanding the buyer's default. The policy of the law, in requiring promptitude in the assertion of continued ownership of the goods, could easily be vindicated were it necessary. It answers every purpose here to show that the law requires it. . . . These cases, and others that might be cited, following the lead of Leedom v. Philips, 1 Yeates, 527, all hold that the duty is upon the seller, if he would retain his right to the property, to proceed promptly; and we know of no case in which a contrary doctrine is asserted. In some cases the expression, 'within a reasonable time,' is used where the right to reclaim is referred to; but this expression suggests no departure from the rule as declared in Leedom v. Philips, supra. By reasonable time is to be understood such promptitude as the situation of the parties and the circumstances of the case will allow. It never means an indulgence in unnecessary delay, or in a delay occasioned by the vain hope and fruitless effort to obtain the money from the defaulting buyer. When the delay is to be accounted for by the latter consideration, it is accepted as an acquiescence in the delivery and the acceptance of the buyer as a debtor." This language is applicable to the facts here presented only so far as, in a general way, it argues the necessity of prompt action, for the giving of the check introduces a new element, and the situation does not arise of the vendee's failure to keep his agreement to pay being necessarily brought at once to the attention of the vendor. It illustrates, however, that the intention of the seller, although a question of fact, is determined by standards definitely fixed by law, one of them being that his conduct must be consistent throughout. In that case the vendor delayed for two months and a half to assert title to the property sold, in the meantime making repeated efforts to collect the purchase price.

In Smith v. Dennie, 6 Pick. 262, 17 Am. Dec. 368, merchandise was sold with the understanding that the vendee was to give an indorsed note. Delivery was made, and the vendor neglected for eight days to demand the note. Then a creditor of the vendee attached the property, and the vendor replevined it. The court held a verdict for the plaintiff in the replevin case to be against the evidence, saying: "Eight days passed between the delivery of the goods and any call for the indorsed note, nor was any intimation made of the security to be given, when the goods were delivered by the clerk, who does not appear to have been informed by the vendor of the terms of the sale. The latter, however, must be presumed to have known the next day that they had been delivered, and yet he did not send for the note, or give any manner of notice that it was required, until the attachment took place, eight days after the sale. We are apprehensive that to establish the right to reclaim under such circumstances would widen the door for fraudulent contrivances, and that afterthoughts respecting conditions will spring up to intercept attaching creditors when the sale was really unconditional, or at least when the vendor has thought his condition of so little importance as to be willing to abandon it and trust to the credit of the purchaser. We are of opinion that the verdict is against the evidence, for there was nothing in the case from which an intention to hold on upon the condition can be inferred, no declaration at the time, which, though not necessary, is important, and no call for security until it was forgotten or abandoned, and, perhaps, never would have been recurred to if the goods had not been attached." But in the opinion it was also said: "The vendor certainly had a right, the day after, to insist upon his indorsed note, or to rescind the bargain and reclaim the goods. If so, why not two days or three, and if so, the time which elapses is a mere fact, from which the jury may infer the intention. Circumstances of business and engagement may account for the delay; and, if they do, the right to security or to reclaim the goods, unless sold as before mentioned, is not impaired."

To say that the seller is required to reclaim his goods immediately, or as soon as possible, or even without any unnecessary delay, would be to overstep the rule derivable from the authorities; the requirement is that he must act with reasonable promptness. In Daugherty v. Fowler, 44 Kan. 628, 10 L.R.A. 314, 25 Pac. 40, this was the test proposed. In Paulson v. Lyon, 26 Utah, 438, 73 Pac. 510, a delay of over a month was held not to be fatal. With a single exception the checks, the nonpayment of which gave rise to the litigation in the cases already referred to, were presented with absolute promptness, so that the question here involved did not arise. The exceptional case is Hodgson v. Barrett, 33 Ohio St. 63, 31 Am. Rep. 527. There a barge of coal was sold and delivered, the transaction taking place at Cincinnati, where the vendors, who were residents of Pittsburgh, were represented by agents. A check on a Cincinnati bank was given to the agents, who sent it to their principals at Pittsburgh, where it was banked, reaching Cincinnati four days later, and being dishonored. In the meantime the vendees, whose deposit was less than the amount of the check when it was drawn, had failed, and the coal had been levied upon by their creditors. The vendors brought replevin for it, and were sustained in their action, the court saying: "No such delay is shown as would manifest an election not to rescind; nor does it appear that Haubold & Son [the vendors] were in any way injured thereby. It ought not, therefore, to affect the right of plaintiffs to treat the supposed payment by check as a nullity, and wholly to avoid the contract of sale." It will be observed that there the check was not presented within what would have been regarded as a reasonable time had the question been one of holding drawers who had suffered a loss by the delay. Having been received in Cincinnati, where the bank on which it was drawn was situated, due diligence for that purpose required its presentation not later than the next business day. 7 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 978, 979; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1042. But the delay was not conclusive upon the question of the passing of title to the coal, because it was accounted for by the situation of the parties. Here the delay was considerably greater, but was explained by circumstances which naturally account for it, without the necessity of supposing that the plaintiff intended to waive the right to reclaim his wheat. Long as the interval was between the making of the check and its presentation, Brown deposited it for collection at the first opportunity he had to attend to the matter in person, without making a trip to town for that very purpose. To say that to preserve his right of reclamation it was necessary for him to present the check not later than the day after he received it would be to establish too rigorous a rule. And, after passing that limit, there seems to be no place where a hard and fast line can be drawn, dividing reasonable and permissible delay from that which is unreasonable and prohibited. If the failure to make an earlier presentation did not bar him, his subsequent conduct did not have that effect, for within a short time after learning of the failure of the drawer he claimed ownership of the wheat, and, although he did not bring his action at once, he never thereafter ceased to assert his right to do so. We think, under the authorities it was a question of fact whether under all the circumstances his intention was that the absolute title to the wheat should pass to the elevator company, and the decision of the trial court cannot be disturbed on review.

The judgment is affirmed.

MUTUAL BENEFIT LIFE INSURANCE

(December 18, 1907.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Campbell County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. J. Crawford, Hazelrigg, Chenault, & Hazelrigg, and R. A. Nagel for appellant.

Mr. W. O. Harris, for appellee:

It is lawful to contract for a cash surrender value which is less than the full reserve.

Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 115 Ky. 772, 74 S. W. 1066; Penn's Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Barnett, 124 Ky. 274, 96 S. W. 1120, 99 S. W. 228.

Messrs. Dodd & Dodd also for appellee.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On March 20, 1893, the appellee com-decision upon the question whether an insurer had the right to settle with a borrowing policy holder on an entirely different basis than with other policy holders,—a basis that did not secure the same benefits to the borrower as to the nonborrower,—the courts in the following cases hold that, in computing the surrender value of a policy or the amount of extended or paid-up insurance to which the assured was entitled, the amount of his loan with interest should be first deducted from the reserve of his policy: Bryant v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 109 Fed. 748; Rife v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 129 Cal. 455, 82 Pac. 48; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Davis, 115 Ky. 404, 73 S. W. 1020; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Twyman, 122 Ky. 523, 121 Am. St. Rep. 471, 92 S. W. 335, 97 S. W. 391; Penn's Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Barnett, 124 Ky. 274, 96 S. W. 1120, 99 S. W. 228.

And the same rule was applied in Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 580, 69 S. W. 1, which seems to be an earlier opinion of the case reported in 115 Ky. 757, 74 S. W. 1066 (specifically overruled in EMIG v. MUTUAL BEN. L. INS. CO. so far as it conflicts with the conclusion there reached), since the parties and subject-matter are identical, though 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pany issued to George Emig a policy upon his life for the sum of $5,000, in consideration of $195 paid by him, and the agreement to pay annually a premium of $195 on the 20th day of March in every year during the continuance of the policy. The policy was an ordinary life policy, and was made payable to the insured. It contained several stipulations as to nonforfeiture, extended insurance, loan and cash surrender value; but, as in 1897 a new contract was made, and this substituted contract was in force from that time until the death of Emig, we will treat it as the contract under which the rights of the parties must be adjudicated. The contract of 1897 is as follows:

" . . . When, after two full annual premiums shall have been paid on this policy, it shall cease or become void solely by the nonpayment of any premium when due, its entire net reserve by the American experience mortality and interest at 4 per cent yearly (provided there be no loan on the policy) shall be applied by the company as a single premium at the company's rates published and in force at this date, either, first, to the purchase of nonparticipating insurance for the full amount insured by this policy, or, second, upon the written application by the owner of this policy and the surrender thereof to the company at Newark within three months from such nonpayment of premium, to the purchase of a nonparticipating paid-up policy payable at the time this policy would be payable if continued in force. Both kinds of insurance aforesaid will be subject to the same

there is nothing in the later case to indicate that the former opinion was withdrawn.

Such, also, was the conclusion reached in Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Ross, 63 Ga. 199, and in Hull v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 39 Wis. 397, in which the court treated notes given by the assured for premiums as loans to him by the insurer.

On the other hand, in Smith v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 173 Mo. 329, 72 S. W. 935, and in Burridge v. New York L. Ins. Co. 211 Mo. 158, 109 S. W. 560, under a statute providing that, upon default in the payment of a premium after a certain number had been paid the balance of three fourths of the net value of the policy after deducting therefrom the indebtedness on account of past premiums should be applied to the purchase of temporary or extended insurance, it was held that such provision did not authorize the insurer to deduct loans to the insured from the net value of the policy, before its extended period was calculated.

In Bozeman v. Prudential Ins. Co. (Ky.) 113 S. W. 836, the policy in suit expressly provided that any indebtedness by the insured to the insurer should first be deducted from any option (as to surrender or extended insurance) proffered by the policy and chosen by him.

conditions, except as to payment of premiums, as those of this policy. Third, if preferred, the company will, on the surrender of the policy fully receipted within the said three months, pay as a cash surrender value its entire net reserve by the American experience mortality and interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent yearly, less a surrender charge equal to 1 per cent of the sum issued by the policy.

"If there be any loan on the policy, such indebtedness shall be paid off out of the cash surrender value, and the remainder paid in cash by the company; or a value will be allowed by the company in the form of extended or paid-up insurance as above provided, the amount to be applied to the purchase of such insurance being correspondingly reduced in the ratio of the indebtedness to the full cash surrender value.

"If death shall occur within one year after the nonpayment of premium and during the term of extended insurance, there shall be deducted from the amount payable any premium that would have become due on this policy if it had continued in full force, also the amount of any indebtedness on this policy at the time of such nonpayment of premium.

"The company will, at any time while the policy is in full force, loan up to the limit secured by its cash surrender value, upon satisfactory assignment of the policy to the company as collateral security.

"The figures given in the following table are based upon the assumption that all premiums (less current dividends) have been fully paid in cash. The indebtedness, if any, may be paid off in cash, in which case the figures in the table will apply:

At End of Year	Cash Surrender Value Loan Value	In Case of Lapse of Policy
		Extended Insurance		Paid-up Policy
		Years	Days
5th	$400 00	5	218	$1,890
6th	497 55	6	134	1,060
7th	586 95	7	8	1,210
8th	686 30	7	206	1,370
9th	801 50	8	2	1,525
10th	906 45	8	180	1,675

Having paid the first premium when the policy was issued, Emig began to borrow money from the company to meet his subsequent premiums, until on March 20, 1902, he owed the company $854.35. He defaulted in the payment of the premium which fell due March 20, 1903, and also in the one that became due March 20, 1904, and died on June 1, 1904. By the default in the payment of the premium on March 20, 1903, his policy became forfeited, unless it was 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

kept alive until his death by the nonforfeiture system, set out in the contract heretofore mentioned.

It will be observed that a clause in this contract provides in part that, "if there be any loan on the policy, such indebtedness shall be paid out of the cash surrender value, and the remainder paid in cash by the company." It being conceded that on March 20, 1903, Emig owed the company $854.35, with interest from March 20, 1902, and that he defaulted in the premium due March 20, 1903, it is the contention that on that date he was only entitled to the cash surrender value of the policy, less the loan. The cash surrender value on March 20, 1903, according to the calculation made by the company, and which is shown by the table, was $906.45, and the loan and interest to that date being $905.61, it only left due Emig on that day 84 cents. It is further insisted for the company that, if the other paragraph of this clause is put into operation, which provides, "or a value will be allowed by the company in the form of an extended or paid-up insurance as above provided, the amount to be applied to the purchase of such insurance being correspondingly reduced in the ratio of the indebtedness to the full cash surrender value," the net reserve of the policy by the American experience mortality and interest at 4 per cent was on March 20, 1903, $1,001.95, and that, reducing this in the ratio of the indebtedness to the cash surrender value, left only 90 cents to be applied to the purchase of extended insurance at the company's rates published and in force at the date of the policy, which sum would have purchased insurance for $5,000, for two days and no longer. So that, in either event, looking at the matter from the company's standpoint, Emig is not entitled to recover more than 84 cents.

Emig's administrator insists that the provisions relied on by the company are against public policy and void, and that he is entitled to recover $5,000, less the amount of the note and interest thereon and the premiums due in 1903 and 1904. It does not appear that Emig made any election, or requested or demanded any settlement of any kind from the company, and so the matter stood from 1903 until this suit was brought, when the company for defense set up that it did not owe Emig anything.

In the body of the policy it is provided that "in case the premium shall not be paid on or before the several days hereinbefore mentioned for the payment thereof, . . . then and in every such case this policy shall cease and determine, subject to the provisions of the company's nonforfeiture system, as indorsed hereon with the accompanying table;" and further, "this policy while in force will participate annually in the company's distribution of surplus, and after two years will be incontestable except for nonpayment of premiums." The company does not distinctly claim a forfeiture of the policy by reason of the nonpayment of the note; but it insists that, because of Emig's failure to pay the premium due March 20, 1903, it had the right under the contract to deduct from the sum then due him on the policy, ascertained according to its method of calculating, the amount of its note and interest, and by this process a forfeiture was in effect accomplished.

It is true the contract gave it the right to make the character of settlement it did, but it remains to be seen whether or not the provisions of the contract under which the company elected to settle with Emig are valid and enforceable, or void as against public policy. In brief, the question is, Will provisions of a policy be upheld that give an insurance company the right to settle on a different plan with a borrowing policy holder from that adopted with the policy holder who is not a borrower, thereby enabling it to exact more than its debt and legal interest? Under the contract, if Emig had not been a borrowing member, after he had paid two full annual premiums, the entire net reserve by the American experience mortality and interest at 4 per cent yearly would be applied by the company as a single premium at the company's rates to the purchase of nonparticipating insurance for the full amount insured by the policy; or, upon his written application for the reserve, would have been applied to the purchase of a nonparticipating paid-up policy; or, at his election, the company would pay as the cash surrender value of the policy its entire net reserve by the American experience mortality with interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent yearly, less a surrender charge equal to 1 per cent of the sum insured by the policy. But, if a policy holder happened to be at the same time a borrower from the company, and had defaulted in the payment of a premium, then the company under the contract had the right to deduct the indebtedness out of the cash surrender value and pay the balance in cash, or allow a value in the form of extended or paid-up insurance, the amount of such value to be applied to the purchase of such insurance being correspondingly reduced in the ratio of the indebtedness to the full cash value. It will thus be seen that the borrowing and the nonborrowing members are not treated alike; that the nonborrower has advantages and privileges that are not allowed the borrowing member. To illustrate, if on March 20, 1903, Emig had not been indebted to the company, and had defaulted in the annual premium then due, he would have been entitled to demand from the company nonparticipating term insurance for the full amount of his policy for such period as the same could be purchased by its entire net reserve by the American experience mortality and interest at 4 per cent yearly, or he could have demanded that the net reserve be applied to the purchase of a nonparticipating paid-up policy. But, being a borrower from the company, it claims the right to settle with him on an entirely different basis, and one that does not secure the benefits that as a nonborrower he could have demanded. It must be kept in mind that the cash surrender value of the policy as fixed in the tables and under which the company settled its account on March 20, 1903, with Emig, is not the full value of the policy that he would have received if he was not a borrower. By its settlement the company did not deduct the amount of Emig's note, with 6 per cent interest, and give him extended insurance for the time he was entitled to it. It arbitrarily adopted a method by which it exacted from him more than his debt and interest by failing to allow him credit for the full amount to which he was entitled.

To make plain the manner in which Emig was discriminated against, and the fact that the company exacted in the settlement it made more than the amount of its debt and legal interest, it is only necessary to direct attention to the admissions in the answer which show that the net reserve of the policy by the American experience mortality and interest at 4 per cent was, on March 20, 1903, $1,001.95, whereas the cash surrender value on that date was only $906.45. Electing as it did to take the amount of Emig's debt and interest, $905.61, from the $906.45, only left 84 cents due the assured. When, if the debt had been deducted from the net reserve of the policy, which was $1,001.95, there would have been due him $95.50; but, upon a fair settlement, the amount due him would have been more than this, because he was entitled to the dividend on his policy for the year 1903, which was not allowed him in fixing the amount at $1,001.95, as this sum only includes the dividends to March, 1902. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Davis, 115 Ky. 404, 73 S. W. 1020. In computing under the other clause, by which it allowed him a value to be applied to the purchase of extended or paid-up insurance, and finding that there was only due him 90 cents, it reduced the net reserve in the ratio of the indebtedness to the cash surrender value of the policy, and again discriminated against him and exacted more than the amount of the debt and legal interest.

We are wholly unable to perceive why an insurance company should be allowed to discriminate between its policy holders in this manner or exact indirectly more than legal interest. In lending money to its policy holders, an insurance company occupies exactly the same attitude as any other money lender. It is entitled to demand and collect the amount of its debt, with 6 per cent interest thereon, and no more. It is true the contract allows it to demand more than this, and the right to require the borrowing member to pay a larger sum than his debt and interest; but this character of contract, no matter how carefully it may be worded or how skillfully devised, will not be enforced. When the company lends money and takes as security for the loan a policy that amply secures it, there is no reason why it should be allowed privileges or rights not extended to ordinary money lenders. Our laws against usury and other devices and schemes resorted to by lenders, to enable them to charge debtors more than the legal rate of interest, are rigidly enforced, and no plan, however ingenious, will be allowed to defeat them.

Viewing the matter from this standpoint, what were the rights of the respective parties on March 20, 1903, when Emig defaulted in the payment of the premium then due? He owed the company $854.35, with interest thereon from March 20, 1902, and the company as security for this had a lien upon his policy. On that date the company had the right to ascertain the amount under the contract that Emig, treating him as a nonborrower, was then entitled to, which was the entire net reserve by the American experience mortality and interest at 4 per cent yearly, and to deduct from it the sum of his note and interest, and for the difference, if any, he was entitled—as he made no election—to extended insurance for the full amount of his policy for such period as this balance would carry it. If on March 20, 1903, Emig had not been a borrower from the company, the premiums he had paid would, under the contract and tables, have carried his insurance for the full amount for 8 years and 130 days. But, being a borrower, with his policy pledged to the company as security for the loan, it had the right on that day to demand the payment of its loan and give Emig, on the basis herein indicated, nonparticipating term insurance for the balance due. The fact that Emig had paid a sufficient number of premiums to carry his insurance 8 years and 130 days did not give him the right to insist that the company must carry his full insurance for that period of time and take out of it, if he died within that period, the amount of his debt with interest. This conclusion would give the insured the unreasonable advantage of having the full amount of insurance in force for a period of 8 years and 130 days, during all of which time he would be indebted to the company in the full amount of the loan value of his policy, and this without the payment of either premiums on the policy or interest on his note. The result would be that Emig's debt would be increasing and the value of his policy decreasing, until, at the expiration of the 8 years and 130 days, the company would have his note and as security a policy without value. To put it in another way, if he had outlived the period of extended insurance, the policy that the company accepted as security for the note would have lapsed entirely and been of no value, and consequently the company would have no security for the money advanced on it if the insured was insolvent, and yet the insured during this time would have had in his pocket practically the full value of the policy and, on his life, insurance for the full amount of the policy. Jagoe v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 123 Ky. 510, 96 S. W. 598; Penn's Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Barnett, 124 Ky. 266, 96 S. W. 1120, 99 S. W. 228. But provisions in a policy that give the company the right to take undue advantage of the insured, or that allow it the right to arbitrarily adopt a method by which it may indirectly exact from a borrowing member more than the debt and interest due by him, or to settle an indebtedness upon an erroneous and unfair basis, and one that will in effect work a forfeiture of the policy, will not be enforced. They are against public policy and void. New York L. Ins. Co. v. Curry, 115 Ky. 100, 61 L.R.A. 268, 103 Am. St. Rep. 297, 72 S. W. 736; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Twyman, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 167, 89 S. W. 178. These principles do not, of course, deny to an insurance company the right to declare a policy forfeited or lapsed for nonpayment of premiums, or prevent it from providing options in its policy between which the insured may elect, and that will bind him when an election has been made. These are reasonable conditions, and are not in the same class as the carefully adopted clauses that discriminate against borrowing members.

In support of its right to settle with Emig in the manner it did, the company relies upon the case of Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 115 Ky. 757, 74 S. W. 1066. There the contract and policy contained the same provisions as the one in the case at bar,—in fact it was issued by the same company. Sudduth, who was the policy holder and who had paid the premiums for twelve years, borrowed from the company on the policy $599.32, payable July 30, 1899, on which date his note fell due, but neither the note nor premium was paid. Sudduth died the following November. In a suit on the policy the company set up the defenses that are here made,—the only difference being that here the company found a balance due Emig of 84 cents, whereas in the Sudduth Case the amount of the note and interest was exactly the amount of the cash surrender value of the policy. This court—three of the judges dissenting—held that the company was entitled under the contract to make a settlement similar to the one made by the company with Emig.

The case of New York L. Ins. Co. v. Meinken, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2113, 80 S. W. 175, also relied on by appellee, is not in point. It appeared that on November 8, 1893, the appellant insured the life of Meinken for $2,500, in consideration of $59.50 payable annually on the 8th of November in each year. The policy provided for extended insurance. The annual premiums were paid for the first three years in cash, and entitled the insured under the tables contained in the policy to extended insurance for the full amount of the policy up to April 8, 1899, or, if he demanded it, paid-up insurance for $167. Meinken defaulted in the payment of a premium note due in 1897, and died in February, 1901. In a suit by his administrator to recover $2,500, the full amount of the policy, the company denied liability, and alleged that the premiums paid did not carry the policy under the terms of the contract up to the date of the death of the insured, and that the policy had lapsed. In the course of the opinion, this court said: "In case of default in the payment of the annual premium, the insured had two options; first, the policy provided that he should be entitled to extended insurance for the full amount of the policy for a definite period; or, second, if the insured should make demand therefor, and surrender the policy within six months after default, he was entitled to paid-up insurance for a stipulated sum. But he could not claim both of these surrender values. Having failed to demand paid-up insurance, the policy was by its terms continued in force for the full amount of $2,500 for a definite period, but which had expired before his death." Here it will be observed that the insured defaulted in the payment of a note given for the premium, which was in effect the same as if he had failed to pay a premium, and the court held that, having failed to make an election within six months or at all, the company, under the terms of the policy, gave him extended insurance for the full amount for the full period to which under the tables he was entitled to extended insurance, and under the tables he was only entitled to extended insurance to April 8, 1899; and, consequently, as said by the court: "Having failed to demand paid-up insurance, the policy was by its terms continued in force for the full amount of $2,500 for a definite period, but which had expired before his death."

Nor is Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 117 Ky. 834, 111 Am. St. Rep. 269, 79 S. W. 218, authority for appellee. In that case Harvey paid the first five annual premiums on his policy, but failed to pay the one due in November, 1892, and the policy lapsed in accordance with its terms at that date. Harvey died in 1902. Suit was brought against the company to recover $507, the amount of paid-up insurance which under the contract it was claimed Harvey was entitled to in November, 1892, when he defaulted in the payment of premiums then due. The contract of insurance provided that if the policy holder, after paying two full premiums, defaulted in the payment of a premium, the amount due him should be applied, "first, to the purchase of nonparticipating term insurance for the full amount insured by this policy, or, second, upon the written application by the owner of this policy and the surrender thereof to the company at Newark within three months from such nonpayment of premium, to the purchase of a nonparticipating paid-up policy payable at the time this policy would be payable if continued in force." In its answer the company averred that, as no written application was made for paid-up insurance, it gave to Harvey nonparticipating term insurance for the full amount of the policy for 3 years and 134 days, this being the extended insurance which the amount due him would purchase. The court, in upholding the contention of the company, said: "It will be observed that the nonforfeiture provisions of the policy provided that the assured shall be entitled to the first-named or term insurance, for the full amount of the policy, unless he makes application and surrenders his policy at his default. But he failed to make such application. And "there can be no question under the terms of the policy that such application and surrender by the beneficiaries of the policy is a condition precedent to the issue of paid-up insurance; otherwise it became the duty of the company, without application or re-upon one T. L. Reynolds, a resident citizen of Water Valley, who was at the time a traveling salesman in the employ of the Saxony Mills. Mr. Reynolds seems to have accepted service and acknowledged that he was the agent of the appellant, and the officer so stated in his return. The appellant entered no appearance in the case, and judgment was taken in favor of Wagner & Company, as by default for the sum of $150, and the money in the bank was subjected to the payment of the judgment. It appears, however, that this fund was never so applied, but seems to have been paid to appellant. However that may be, it appears that in September, 1906, the judgment was unsatisfied, and upon suitable garnishment proceedings a debt due appellant by the Newburger Mercantile Company was sought to be subjected to the payment of this judgment. The sole defense interposed by the Saxony Mills is that the judgment rendered by Justice Mauldin in 1905 is void because that court never acquired jurisdiction. The circuit judge held that the judgment was not void, and gave judgment against the garnishee in favor of appellees, and the Saxony Mills prosecutes this appeal.

It is insisted by appellant that the act of Wagner & Company, in depositing the money in the bank to the credit of the Saxony Mills was unsanctioned by the appellant, and that jurisdiction could not thereby be conferred upon the court. We agree with this contention, and have no difficulty in state through a soliciting agent, so that service of process against it could be made upon him, but whether he was such an agent of the company as the statute authorized service to be made upon. The question as to whether or not the company was doing business in the state was not material, as it clearly appeared that it had property in the state and came within the Code provision authorizing service of process upon certain agents of any foreign corporation having property within the state. The court in the Bell Case apparently concedes that Green v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. supra, is in conflict with the conclusion it reaches, as it clearly is; but the contention is made that that case is not binding upon it, as it therein recognizes, or, to use the language of the court, connotes the idea, that certain modes of service may be sufficient for state purposes, and not for Federal purposes; and it is said that, while the service of process therein sustained may be so insufficient that a judgment based thereon would have no extraterritorial effect, and would also be insufficient for Federal purposes, yet it would be valid and enforceable in the state.

And see Central R. Co. v. Eichberg, 107 Md. 363, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 389, 68 Atl. 690, which holds that a foreign railroad company doing business in the state through a domestic corporation which has power to and does make contracts for passenger and freight traffic in its behalf may be served with process by service upon an agent whose authority is limited to the soliciting of business, he referring all prospective patrons to the domestic corporation. This holding, however, is not in conflict with the majority doctrine, as the corporation was clearly doing business in the state, and the holding of the court is confined to the mere question of what is sufficient agency to authorize service of process on an agent.

A corporation by filling orders for goods, taken in another state by a local company to whom a commission is paid, is not thereby doing business in the state. Carpenter v. Willard Case Lumber Co. 158 Fed. 697.

Neither is a corporation doing business in another state by accepting bucket-shop business, turned over to it by a person in the bucket-shop business in such state, to whom it allowed a commission on such business. Swarts v. Christie Grain & Stock Co. 166 Fed. 338.

Neither is the maintenance by a corporation of an office in another state, in charge of a sales agent who takes orders for goods and transmits them to the home office for acceptance and to be filled, doing business therein. Case v. Smith, L. & Co. 152 Fed. 730.

Service of process against a foreign corporation upon a sales agent is not a service upon the corporation, where the agent is without apparent authority to represent it otherwise, and has no connection of any kind with the transaction sued upon. Hefner v. American Tube & Stamping Co. 163 Fed. 866.

And the fact that the agent sells goods manufactured by a foreign corporation under such circumstances as would estop the corporation from denying the agency is not doing business in the state through such agent so that he can be served with process issued against it. Wold v. J. B. Colt Co. 102 Minn. 386, 114 N. W. 243.

A single business transaction in the state by a foreign corporation through a soliciting agent is not sufficient to authorize suit against it therein, or service of process upon it. Ladd Metal Co. v. American Min. Co. 152 Fed. 1008. And see Penn Collieries Co. v. McKeever, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 127, and note thereto, and also note to A. Booth & Co. v. Weigand, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 693.

Generally, the same principles applicable in determining whether a corporation is doing business in a state other than that of its origin, so as to render it suable therein, also applies to the determination of the question whether a foreign corporation is doing business within the state, within statutes describing conditions upon which foreign corporations will be permitted to do business in such state; and it is generally held that merely soliciting business in another state, or the taking of orders subject to the approval of the home office and to be filled from the home office, is not doing business within concluding that one indebted to a nonresident cannot place money on deposit in a bank, in defiance of his creditor's wishes, for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction in attachment upon the court where the bank is located. This judgment must be upheld, if at all, upon the theory that the non-resident company had actually been served with process within the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace rendering the judgment. This matter, however, originated prior to the adoption of the present Code. We are not aided, in determining this question, by the provisions of §§ 919 and 920 of the Code of 1906 and chap. 123, p. 132, of the Laws of 1908. These new statutes, undertaking to define what shall constitute "doing business" within the state, and who are to be deemed agents of foreign corporations for the purpose of process, are not now before us. The case at bar is governed by the general rules of law on the subject, and by chap. 61, p. 49, of the Laws of 1894, which provides: "If the defendant in any suit or legal proceeding be a corporation, process may be served on the president or other head of the corporation, upon the cashier, secretary, treasurer, clerk, or agent of the corporation, or upon any one of the directors of such corporation; or, if the corporation be a sleeping-car company, upon any conductor thereof; or, if a steamboat company, upon the captain or other officer of a boat thereof. If no such persons or persons be found in the county, then it shall be sufficient to post a true copy of the process on the door the terms and meaning of such statutes. Bruner v. Kansas Moline Plow Co. 168 Fed. 218, affirming 7 Ind. Terr. 506, 104 S. W. 816; Underwood Typewriter Co. v. Piggott, 60 W. Va. 532, 55 S. E. 664; International Trust Co. v. A. Leschen & Sons Rope Co. 41 Colo. 299, 92 Pac. 727, 14 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 861; Bell Teleph. Co. v. Galen Co. (N. J. L.) 72 Atl. 47; Uihlein v. Caplice Commercial Co. (Mont.) 102 Pac. 564.

And the delivery of goods by a foreign corporation, in the state of its domicile, to an agent from another state, for sale therein on commission, is not doing business in such state within a statute penalizing foreign corporations doing business within the state without first complying with prescribed requirements. Three States Buggy & Implement Co. v. Com. 32 Ky. L. Rep. 385, 105 S. W. 971.

A contract by a foreign corporation, consigning to a factor in another state articles of commerce to be sold for an agreed commission, is not doing business in such state within the purview of a statute requiring a license tax to be paid by a foreign corporation doing business within the state. Butler Bros. Shoe Co. v. United States Rubber Co. 84 C. C. A. 167, 156 Fed. 1.

Occasional sales by a foreign corporation through its traveling representative are not sufficient to bring it within the purview of a statute requiring foreign corporations doing business in the state to first comply with certain requirements. To bring it within such statute, it is necessary that it should establish an agency or a branch office within the state. Novelty Tufting Mach. Co. v. Hutkoff, 56 Misc. 522, 107 N. Y. Supp. 88.

But storing goods in a state other than that of its domicile, for sale in each state on commission by an agent, and retaining title to the goods, and furnishing solicitors to assist in the sale thereof, is doing business in such state within a statute denying to foreign corporations doing business therein the right to sue in the state courts without compliance with certain prescribed requirements. Wilson-Moline Buggy Co. v. Priebe, 123 Mo. App. 521, 100 S. W. 558. To the same effect, except that no soliciting agents 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

were furnished by the foreign corporation, see Thomas Mfg. Co. v. Knapp, 101 Minn. 432, 112 N. W. 989.

So, a delivery of goods by a foreign corporation to an agent in the state of its origin, but for sale in another state from a general agency established therein, and the sale thereof in such state, is doing business therein within the purview of a statute prescribing a penalty for any foreign corporation doing business within the state without first complying with certain requirements. Milburn Wagon Co. v. Com. 31 Ky. L. Rep. 937, 104 S. W. 323.

Soliciting the sale of scholarships in a foreign corporation through a local agent who took orders therefor, and accepted part payment in advance, and also made collections on deferred payments, and who maintained an office for the transaction of such business, but at his own expense, is doing business in such state so as to bring the corporation within the statute denying to foreign corporations the right to sue in a state court unless they have first complied with certain requirements. International Text-book Co. v. Pigg, 76 Kan. 328, 91 Pac. 74. To the same effect under very similar facts, except that plaintiff corporation furnished an office to a local agent, see International Text-book Co. v. Lynch, 81 Vt. 101, 69 Atl. 541.

A contract appointing an agent and authorizing him to solicit the sale of the goods of a foreign corporation for a period of years is an arrangement to establish its business permanently within the state, and hence is doing business in the state within the purview of a statute denying the privilege of appealing to state courts to foreign corporations doing business within the state without having first complied with certain specific requirements. Neyens v. Worthington, 150 Mich. 580, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 142, 114 N. W. 404.

Delivering merchandise in the state, and accepting payment therefor, although ordered and accepted in another state, is sufficient to bring a foreign corporation within the terms of a statute authorizing service of process against foreign corporations on the secretary of state where the cause of action of the office or principal place of business of the corporation. In suits against railroads, sleeping-car, telegraph, telephone, express, steamboat, and insurance companies or corporations, or in suits against a receiver or receivers in charge of the property of any such companies or corporations, the process may be served on any agent of the defendant, or sent to any county in which the office or principal place of business may be located, and there served as herein directed and authorized; or may be served on any one of the foregoing officers of such corporation or company, and upon the secretary, cashier, treasurer, clerk, depot agent, attorney, or any other officer or agent of such receiver or receivers, or upon them in person. When any writ or process against such corporation, company, receiver, or receivers has been returned executed, the defendant or defendants shall be considered in court, and the action shall proceed as actions against natural persons; and all process and notices to be served upon such companies, corporations, or receivers, may be served as herein directed."

It will thus be seen that the statute makes special reference to railroads, sleeping-car, telegraph, telephone, express, steamboat, and insurance companies, and provides for service of process upon such companies by serving any of their agents. It is clear that no difficulty can arise in such cases, because all such companies have offices in the state, pay taxes here, have important property interests which the law protects, and in most cases have made large and valuable investments within our borders. This is the class of corporations to which reference is made by Justice Whitfield in his concurring opinion in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Sanford, 75 Miss. 862, 23 So. 355, 942. But the appellant corporation does not fall within this class. It has no office or place of business in the state of Mississippi. It has its place of business elsewhere, and sends its traveling salesmen into this state, who take orders which are transmitted to the home office and filled by shipment direct to the purchaser. The question is whether a court acquires jurisdiction of a case against such a nonresident corporation by serving process upon a traveling salesman. Is such an employee an "agent" of the corporation within the meaning of the statute above quoted? It is well settled that a corporation like the appellant company cannot be held to be "doing business" within the state, in the absence of a statute enlarging the usual significance of this well-known expression. It is hardly necessary to cite authority in support of this conclusion, as there is no intelligent dissent among the authorities. See the exhaustive note to Berger v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1214.

It is equally well settled that, in the case of a corporation which is not "doing business" in this state, service of process upon a mere soliciting agent is not sufficient. Such an employee is not an agent of the corporation within the meaning of the statute. It is accurately stated by the Michigan court that the word "agent" in a statute like ours does not mean every man who is intrusted with a commission or employment, but designates the principal officers of the corporation, who, either generally or in respect to some particular department of the corporate business, have a controlling authority; either general or special. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hunt, 39 Mich. 469. It is said, again, that statutes providing for service of process upon an "agent" of a corporation are to be construed "to include only agents vested with some general authority and discretion, and not to extend to mere employees having no independent powers." 19 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 676; N. K. Fairbanks & Co. v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 4 C. C. A. 403, 9 U. S. App. 212, 54 Fed. 420.

It follows from these views that the justice's court was wholly without jurisdiction to render the original judgment, and the same is absolutely void. Such being the case, the writ of garnishment against the Newburger Mercantile Company should have been quashed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF NEBRASKA EX REL. JOHN M. RAGAN

v.

GEORGE C. JUNKIN, Secretary of State,
Appt.

(— Neb. —, 122 N. W. 473.)

Constitutional law — judicial candidates — nomination — free speech — free assembly.

1. The legislative enactment in §§ 1 and 10, chap. 53, Sess. Laws 1900, that candidates for judicial and educational offices shall not be "nominated, indorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to in any manner, by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election," is a violation of § 5 of the Bill of Rights, declaring that "every person may freely speak, write, and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; and in all trials for libel, both civil and criminal, the truth, when published with good motives and for justifiable ends, shall be a sufficient defense;" and of § 19 of the Bill of Rights, declaring that "the right of the people peaceably to assemble to consult for the common good, and to petition the government or any department thereof, shall never be abridged."

Same — "assemblage" — political convention.

2. A political convention is an "assemblage" within the meaning of the constitutional provision that the right of the people to assemble to consult for the common good shall never be abridged.

Same — elective franchise.

3. In prescribing a form of official ballot which limits the printed names of candidates for judicial and educational offices to nominees by petitions containing 5,000 names each, and in depriving all electors except 500 in each county of the right to take part in nominating a particular candidate, chapter 53, p. 256, Sess. Laws 1900, violates § 22 of the Bill of Rights, declaring that "all elections shall be free, and there shall be no hindrance or impediment to the right of a qualified voter to exercise the elective franchise."

Statute — fundamental invalidity — effect.

4. Where it appears on the face of a legislative act that an inducement for its passage was a void provision, the entire act falls.

Same — partial invalidity — effect.

5. Where valid and invalid parts of a legislative act are so intermingled that they cannot be separated in such a manner as to leave an enforceable statute expressing the legislative will, no part of the enactment can be enforced.

(Dean and Letton, JJ., dissent.)

(August 18, 1900.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Lancaster County directing defendant to place relator's name on the primary election ballot. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. G. G. Martin, with Messrs. W. T. Thompson, Attorney General, and Arthur F. Mullen, for appellant:

The valid portions of the law can be separated from the invalid portions, leaving a complete law.

Headnotes by Rose, J.

Note.—No other case passing on the constitutionality of a statute prohibiting the nominating, recommending, or censuring of specified officers by certain organizations or at designated elections has been disclosed.

A somewhat analogous decision is found in Ex parte Harrison, 212 Mo. 88, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 950, 126 Am. St. Rep. 557, 110 S. W. 709, where a statute requiring a report of a civic league upon a candidate for public office to state in full all the facts on which it is founded, together with the names and addresses of the persons furnishing it, was held to be a violation of the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech. The court said: "The constitutional liberty of speech and of the press grants the right to freely utter and publish whatever a citizen may desire, and to be protected in so doing, provided always that such publications are not blasphemous, obscene, seditious, or scandalous in their character, so that they become an offense against the public, and by their malice and falsehood injuriously affect the character, reputation, or pecuniary interest of individuals. . . . The general assembly, under the legislative power granted it by the people, subject to the limitations of the state and Federal Constitutions, unquestionably has the power to enact penal statutes and prescribe civil remedies 'for all abuses of that liberty' of speech or publication. If a publication is neither blasphemous, obscene, seditious, or defamatory, then, under the Constitution of this state, no court has the right to restrain it, nor the legislature power to punish it."

The case of Louthan v. Com. 79 Va. 196, 52 Am. Rep. 626, while not in point, is of interest. It was there held that a statute forbidding judges and state school officers participating actively in politics, making political speeches, or taking active part in political meetings, was unconstitutional where the Constitution gave any citizen a right to speak, write, and publish his sentiments.

Rose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant is secretary of state, and as such was requested to place the name of relator on the primary ballot as a Republican candidate for judge of the supreme court at the primary election to be held August 17, 1909, but refused on the ground that compliance would be a violation of the nonpartisan judiciary act, passed at the last session of the legislature. Sess. Laws 1909, chap. 53, p. 256. The controversy thus raised was submitted to the district court of Lancaster county, where the act in question was held void as being an invasion of the constitutional right of free assembly, of free speech, and of a free ballot. A peremptory writ of mandamus was accordingly allowed, directing defendant to place relator's name on the primary ballot in compliance with the primary election law and in disregard of the nonpartisan judiciary act. From the order allowing the writ, defendant appeals, and his record presents for review the correctness of the ruling of the trial court.

The 1st section of the nonpartisan judiciary act authorizes party nominations at conventions and primaries, and concludes as follows: "But candidates for the following offices, to wit, chief justice of the supreme court, judge of the supreme court, judge of the district court, county judge, regent of the state university, superintendent of public instruction, and county superintendent of public instruction, shall not be nominated, indorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to in any manner, by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election; and no party name or designation shall be given upon any ballot to any candidate for any of said offices, and hereafter all candidates for all of said offices shall be nominated only by petition, and no candidate for any of said offices shall appear on any party ticket." Sess. Laws 1909, chap. 53, p. 256, § 1. According to this provision, candidates for judicial and educational offices cannot be "nominated, indorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to in any manner, by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election." Does the Bill of Rights forbid such an enactment? It declares: "Every person may freely speak, write, and publish on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; and in all trials for libel, both civil and criminal, the truth, when published with good motives and for justifiable ends, shall be a sufficient defense." Const. art. 1, § 5. "The right of the people peaceably to assemble to consult for the common good, and to petition the government or any department thereof, shall never be abridged." Const. art. 1, § 19. The first provision quoted protects every person in his right to speak, write, and publish on all subjects, and the next permits him to assemble with others to consult for the common good. A political meeting or convention is an "assemblage" within the meaning of the constitutional provision that the right of the people to assemble and consult for the common good shall never be abridged. The right of a citizen to speak, write, and publish on all subjects does not terminate when he enters a political convention or assemblage. With good motives and for justifiable ends, the members of such a body may jointly speak and publish the truth about candidates for office, and this right extends to aspirants for judicial and educational offices.

Judge Cooley, in discussing the constitutional liberty of the press and of speech, said: "There are cases where it is clearly the duty of everyone to speak freely what he may have to say concerning public officers or those who may present themselves for public positions. Through the ballot box the electors approve or condemn those who ask their suffrages." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 530. Delegates and members of political organizations not only take with them into their party councils the inalienable right to speak, write, and publish on all subjects, but the full benefit of this privilege can only be obtained by united action. Political parties are the great moving forces in the administration of public affairs, and their influence in elections cannot be eliminated by the legislature as long as the right to assemble and speak the truth remains in the charter of our liberties. Published criticisms of candidates, officers, and policies are potent factors in the struggle for civic virtue, and cannot be suppressed by legislative enactment. The privilege of speaking and publishing the truth with good motives and for justifiable ends was not inserted in the Bill of Rights by accident. The doctrine that the truth as to a man's conduct is no justification for publishing it in the press originated in the Star Chamber, and was in high favor in that tribunal, when printing became an effective means of disseminating what honest men said about the abuses of official power and the conduct and policies of public men. The hostility to such a restriction of free speech and of a free press resulted in the adoption of § 5 of the Bill of Rights. The nonpartisan judiciary act is void in so far as it declares that candidates for judicial and educational offices shall not be "nominated, indorsed, recommended, censured criticized, or referred to in any manner, by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election."

The act under consideration prescribes the manner of nominating candidates for judicial and educational offices and the form of ballot to be used at the November election. In this connection the following provisions are assailed as unconstitutional: "Candidates for public office may be nominated otherwise than by convention, committee, or primary meeting, in the following manner: A certificate of nomination containing the name of the candidate for the office to be filled, stating the name, residence, business, and postoffice address of the candidate, shall be signed by electors residing in the district or political division in which the officers are to be elected, and filed with the clerk of the village, city, or county, or with the secretary of state, as the case may be. The number of signatures shall not be less than 5,000, not more than 500 of which shall be from one county, when the nomination is for chief justice or judge of the supreme court." Sess. Laws 1909, chap. 53, p. 258, § 3. Under the provisions quoted only 500 electors in a county can lawfully sign the nominating certificate of a candidate for judge of the supreme court, though there may be more than 5,000 legal voters therein. In other words, 500 electors in a county may participate in nominating a candidate for judge of the supreme court, and when they do so the other voters in the same county are deprived of the right to sign a nominating certificate for the same candidate. In Adams county, where relator resides, nearly 5,000 electors voted at the general election in 1908. Only 500 of them, under the nonpartisan judiciary act, can take part in nominating him for judge of the supreme court, and this would be true, if the entire electorate of 5,000 were a unit in demanding an opportunity to vote for him as a regular nonpartisan candidate at the November election. For want of the signatures of the supporters who are deprived of the right to sign the nominating certificate of the candidate of their choice, he may not be nominated. In such an event his name would not be printed on the official ballot for the November election, and their right to vote for him thereat as a regular nominee would be lost. Under these circumstances the empty privilege of writing on official ballots in blank spaces the names of persons who have not been nominated, with the prospect of having such votes classified in the election returns as "scattering," is not the full measure of an elector's rights within the meaning of the Constitution. Electors who desire to vote for a particular candidate for judge of the supreme court at the November election should be allowed to take part in nominating him, or in whatever preliminary step the law requires as a condition of allowing his name to be printed on the official ballot. This privilege is protected by the following section of the Bill of Rights: "All elections shall be free; and there shall be no hindrance or impediment to the right of a qualified voter to exercise the elective franchise." Const. art. 1, § 22.

When the lawmakers enter the party caucus, the party convention, the party committee, and the primary, to make regulations, they must act within the limits of the foregoing provision. The elective franchise may be invaded by such regulations when they prescribe the forms of the official ballots to be used at the general election and establish the methods of making nominations. These forms and methods may be as effective to deprive the voter of his rights as direct legislation relating to the November election. Chief Justice Holcomb, in discussing a primary law, said: "It is a part of the election machinery, by which is determined who shall be permitted to have their names appear on the official election ballot as candidates for public office. To say that the voters are free to exercise the elective franchise at a general election for nominees, in the choice of which unwarranted restrictions and hindrances are interposed, would be a hollow mockery. The right to freely choose candidates for public offices is as valuable as the right to vote for them after they are chosen. Both these rights are safeguarded by constitutional guaranty of freedom in the exercise of the elective franchise." State ex rel. Adair v. Drexel, 74 Neb. 790, 105 N. W. 179. In the case cited Chief Justice Holcomb adopted the following language of Prof. Wigmore: "Nomination for public office may be considered in two aspects: First, it involves the right of every eligible person to be voted for by any elector who desires to do so; secondly, it involves the right of each elector to exercise choice among all who are eligible. The two rights may be protected by the same legislation, but it is important to remember that there is involved not merely the right of an individual to be a candidate, but the right of every other person to select him for the office; practically the feasibility of independent political movements depends upon the second right." 23 Am. L. Rev. 730.

State ex rel. Adair v. Drexel, 74 Neb. 776, 105 N. W. 174, was cited with approval by the supreme court of Illinois in People ex rel. Breckon v. Election Comrs. 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

221 Ill. 9, 77 N. E. 321, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 562, where the following language was used by that court: "When statutes are enacted which regulate the form of the ballot to be used, what shall appear upon the ballot, and how the candidates whose names shall so appear shall be chosen, the provision of the Bill of Rights applies to the new condition. The right to choose candidates for public offices whose names will be placed on the official ballot is as valuable as the right to vote for them after they are chosen, and is of precisely the same nature. There is scarcely a possibility that any person will or can be elected to office under this system, unless he shall be chosen at a primary election, and this statute, which provides the methods by which that shall be done, and prescribes and limits the rights of voters and of parties, must be regarded as an integral part of the process of choosing public officers, and as an election law." The supreme court of Illinois in a later case said: "The power of the individual voter at the polls to cast his vote untrammelled, for the candidate of his choice, is no more sacred than the right of the individual member of a political party to express his choice for party candidates at a primary election." Rouse v. Thompson, 228 Ill. 540, 81 N. E. 1115.

In depriving electors of the right to participate in nominating for judicial and educational offices the candidates of their choice, the nonpartisan judiciary act violates § 22 of the Bill of Rights. The duty to uphold all valid legislation has led to an earnest effort to find some substantial basis for sustaining those provisions which are not directly inhibited by the Constitution. This cannot be done, however, if either of the invalid provisions was an inducement to the passage of the bill. The void part of § 1 is repeated in § 10 with the legislative announcement that it is "declared to be the purpose of the people of Nebraska to remove all of said offices entirely from the domain of party politics." The leading provision for carrying into effect that purpose, the one disclosed by the act itself, is the void provision that candidates for those offices shall not be "nominated, indorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to, by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election." It is true the legislature prescribed a form for a nonpartisan ballot and prohibited party designation of candidates thereon. This, however, did not prevent party activity in the election of judicial and educational officers. The legislative intention being to remove such offices from the domain of party politics, and the leading provision for carrying that purpose into effect being void, the bill necessarily shows on its face that the void part was an inducement to the passage of the act.

Even if the unconstitutional provisions were not the inducing cause of the legislation, the entire act must fall, unless the valid and invalid parts can be separated in such a way as to leave an independent statute capable of enforcement. The intention of the legislature must be expressed by written language. In segregating void provisions the language itself must be separated. "Where a part of an act is unconstitutional," wrote Chief Justice Holcomb, "because contravening some provision of the fundamental law, the language found in the invalid portion of the act can have no legal force or efficacy for any purpose whatever." State v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 71 Neb. 335, 100 N. W. 405. It is equally true that what remains must express the legislative will independently of the void part, since the court has no power to legislate. These propositions are elementary, and citation of precedents to support them is unnecessary. For the purpose of applying the rules stated, § 1 of the act is here reproduced: "Any convention or primary meeting, as hereinafter defined, held for the purpose of making nominations for public offices, and also voters of the number hereinafter specified, may nominate candidates for public offices to be filled by election within the state; a convention or primary meeting within the meaning of this act is an organized assemblage of voters, representing a political party which, at the last election before the holding of such conventions or primary meetings, polled at least 1 per cent of the entire vote in the state, county, or other subdivision or district for which the nomination is made. A committee appointed by such convention or primary meeting may also make nominations for public offices, and is authorized to do so by resolutions, duly passed by the convention or meeting at which said committee was appointed. A state convention of any political party may take action upon any constitutional amendment which is to be voted upon at the following election, and said convention may declare for or against such amendment, and such declaration shall be considered as a portion of their ticket to be filed with the secretary of state and by him certified to the various county clerks. But candidates for the following offices, to wit, chief justice of the supreme court, judge of the supreme court, judge of the district court, county judge, regent of the state university, superintendent of public instruction, and county superintendent of public instruction, shall not be nominated, indorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to in any manner, by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election; and no party name or designation shall be given upon any ballot to any candidate for any of said offices, and hereafter all candidates for all of said offices shall be nominated only by petition, and no candidate for any of said offices shall appear on any party ticket." Sess. Laws 1909, chap. 53, p. 256.

In this section the void provision already described limits the operation of what precedes it. The first part of the section authorizes nominations by conventions and primary meetings. This portion, with the void part stricken out, would authorize partisan nominations of candidates for judicial and educational offices, which is exactly the opposite in that respect of what the legislature intended. With the qualifying and void part eliminated, therefore, the first part of the section does not express the legislative will. These observations apply also to § 10, where the void provision in the 1st section is repeated.

Section 3 makes provision for nominating candidates for judicial and educational offices by petition or certificate of nomination. This section contains the void provision which deprives all electors in a county except 500 of the right to sign the nominating certificate of a particular "candidate by petition." The petition described in § 3 is a substantive part of the legislation, and reference to it is repeatedly made throughout the act. With the void provision stricken out, the petition mentioned by the legislature in other parts of the bill would not be the petition to which the legislature referred. It is therefore clear that, with the unconstitutional provisions eliminated, the balance of the act would not be what the lawmakers in fact enacted. There is no lawful way to separate the valid and invalid portions so as to leave an enforceable statute expressing the will of the legislature.

It follows that no part of the act can be sustained.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Reese, Ch. J., absent and not sitting.

Dean, J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the opinion of the majority of the court. From the arguments of counsel and the law applying to the facts, it does not clearly appear that the act in question comes within the inhibitory provisions of the fundamental law that have been invoked to destroy it. The act is attacked solely on constitutional grounds, and thus the recognized rules of this and other jurisdictions, in cases involving constitutional construction, should be applied to determine the right of the act to take a place among the laws of the state.

Viewed from any point, there is a delicacy that surrounds the discussion of some features of the case that would be gladly avoided, but due regard for the performance of a public duty otherwise directs. The legislature has for many years been modifying the general election laws in response to public demand. It gave us the Australian ballot system, and events have proven its wisdom. It gave us the statewide primary law, and, while it may be defective in some respects, it is within the province of the legislature to amend it. In any event it is not likely a return will be had to the convention system of nominating candidates for public office. The non-partisan judiciary act, with but seven negative votes in the senate and but twenty-seven negative votes in the house recorded against it, is but an expansion of the general primary system. Its principle is not new to the statute books of five states or more. It is not an untried experiment.

In the preservation of the constitutional checks and balances of our system of government, is involved the preservation of government itself. It is fundamental that the legislative, executive, and judicial departments should each be free to perform their separate functions without interference from either of the others. Applying this principle to a legislative act, the validity whereof is attacked on the sole ground of being repugnant to the Constitution, a decent respect for the legislative and executive departments which have respectively passed and approved it inculcates an abiding desire on the part of the judiciary to refrain from disturbing it, except for the most weighty reasons. An act of the legislature is presumed to be constitutional. This presumption continues until the contrary is affirmatively shown by the challenging party. The legislature is presumed to know, to interpret, and to make effective by competent legislative enactment, the will of the people, and every act passed that is conformable to the Constitution has all the power of that instrument behind it. All intendments of the law favor these presumptions. The judiciary is not the master of the Constitution, but merely its interpreter, and, in the exercise of this prerogative, it is not the court's duty to declare an act unconstitutional, unless it clearly and beyond question contravenes some provision of the fundamental law, and every reasonable doubt will be resolved in 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

favor of sustaining the act. By close adherence to this long familiar rule may the judiciary preserve itself from the imputation of even seeming to invade the legislative realm. It may thus avoid "bench legislation,"—an insidious judicial offense, and one which may in time, if indulged, imperil the perpetuity of our institutions. Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 227; Prof. Wigmore, 23 Am. L. Rev. 719; Topeka v. Gillett, 32 Kan. 431, 4 Pac. 800; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 270, 6 L. ed. 625; Hoover v. Wood, 9 Ind. 286; Re Wellington, 16 Pick. 96, 26 Am. Dec. 631.

The majority opinion holds: "Political parties are the great moving forces in the administration of public affairs." That evil influences and impure motives should creep into the management of political parties are circumstances that have been long recognized and are everywhere deplored; but the act is not aimed at the destruction, or even the impairment, of an exercise of the legitimate functions of political parties. The relator's argument on this point indicates he is seized with this fear, and in a manner his protest against the act is suggestive of John's protest at Runnymede. The non-partisan act leaves the solution of political questions to political parties. It appears to be only a well-directed protest against the domination of nonpolitical departments of government by partisan political influence. Justice, in the proper application of its principles, is no respecter of party lines. No logical reason for the domination of our school system by the spirit of partisanship can be advanced. There is sufficient latitude on public questions and public problems that are in their nature purely political to absorb the legitimate attention of those whose guiding hands would direct the destinies of the political parties, and thus indirectly, but none the less potently, the destiny of state and nation. In the departments sought to be affected, the legislature has the right, within the bounds of the fundamental law, to exert its power to the end that they may be effectively removed by legislative enactment from the domain of partisan politics.

Who will question the propriety of legislation to the end that the judiciary may avoid even the appearance of securing place and power at the hands of the cunning captains of political patronage? He was a wise writer who said: "A gift doth blind the eyes." Is the gift less seductive, and will it less effectually dull the eye of the magistrate to the iniquities of the giver, because it takes the form of preferment in office? No one will question the propriety of giving added meaning to the vital truth expressed in the motto of our state, "Equality before the Law." By what means may this result be the better maintained? Will it be by an immersion of the judiciary in the seething pool of partisan politics, or will it be by its separation from that stirring feature of political life in the manner pointed out by the act in question? The legislature, coming from the body of the people, and charged with legislative responsibility, solved the problem in a manner satisfying to itself by the passage of the nonpartisan judiciary act. Who, then, is to pass upon the wisdom or the unwisdom, the expediency or the in expediency, that may be involved in its declared purpose? Not the judiciary, for it is not within its constitutional province, but the legislature alone, in the exercise of its power to amend and its power to repeal. Will it be seriously urged that loyalty to party or party leadership, because of past achievement, or promise of future performance, or for any sane reason, is always and everywhere and regardless of all else the paramount duty of the citizen, whether in or out of office? It is to be deplored that in some instances in public history, in the exuberance of an intense partisan spirit, loyalty to party leadership seems at times almost to have overcome loyalty to all else. Political parties will be always with us. They are inseparable from our form of government, but danger lies in the direction of the exercise of a spirit of excessive and unreasoning loyalty to party or to party leaders. See Messages of the Presidents (Washington), p. 54; 1 Bryce, American Commonwealth, p. 104.

The opinion holds, in effect, that because, under the provisions of the act in question, only 500 petitioners in Adams county, the home of relator, can take part in nominating him, he might thereby be prevented from receiving a nomination, and the electorate of his county, which contains about 5,000 electors, would thus be deprived the opportunity of voting for him. The point does not seem to be well taken. It does not appear reasonable to believe the enforcement of this feature of the act would be fraught with results so serious. There are eight counties contiguous to that of relator, having a population in each that is not much, if any, less than that of Adams county. Thus, in his own and in the eight neighboring counties, with one additional, the names of the requisite 5,000 signatures might be obtained by the relator, or by any qualified candidate. In the state at large the entire vote amounts to approximately 250,000. Two per cent of that number is the number of signatures required to place the name of relator in nomination. The most populous county in the state has approximately 23 L.R.A. (N.S.)

25,000 voters. Two per cent of that number is the maximum number of signatures permitted by the act in any one county, so that upon a percentage basis, while it is true no percentage is named in the act, it is seen there is no distinction between the different portions of the state and no distinction as to the number of signatures required of candidates for position in the same class. The act seems to impose no unusual or unreasonable burden or restriction in the requirement that the signatures of 5,000 electors shall be obtained, with the limit of 500 in any one county. These are mere details of the law, regulations that are within the power of the legislature to prescribe. By the arrangement of the ballot, provision is made that the voter may write in the names of such additional persons as may commend themselves to his choice. Healey v. Wipf (S. D.) 117 N. W. 521; 23 Am. L. Rev. 719; Paine, Elections (1888), § 5.

The act is not obnoxious to the constitutional prohibition against class legislation, because it includes all candidates for judicial position in courts of record, and all candidates for executive school positions. It adds no new qualifications to the constitutional requirements respecting the position sought by relator. State ex rel. Atwood v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578, 17 Pac. 177; State, Dobbins, Prosecutor, v. Northampton Twp. 50 N. J. L. 496, 14 Atl. 587; Topeka v. Gillett, 32 Kan. 431, 4 Pac. 800; State ex rel. Selden v. Berka, 20 Neb. 375, 30 N. W. 267; State ex rel. Dawson County v. Farmers' & M. Irrig. Co. 59 Neb. 1, 80 N. W. 52. The majority opinion cites State ex rel. Adair v. Drexel, 74 Neb. 776, 105 N. W. 174. There a candidate for nomination was required, by the act there in question, to pay a sum equal to 1 per cent of the salary of the desired office for the term, to entitle his name to appear on the primary ballot. In brief, the act required him to purchase the right to submit his name to the electorate as a party candidate for nomination. The act was held to be clearly repugnant to the Constitution; but it does not so clearly appear that the rule there invoked applies to the facts in the case at bar. People ex rel. Breckon v. Election Comrs. 221 Ill. 9, 77 N. E. 321, 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 562, and Rouse v. Thompson, 228 Ill. 522, 81 N. E. 1109, are cited in the majority opinion. The soundness of all that is said in the cited portions of the cases may be conceded. For the most part they appear to show a connection between the primary election and the general election.

The opinion discusses two features that were not argued in the brief of relator. Reference is had to the feature limiting the number of signatures that may be obtained in any one county to 500, and to that other feature which discusses freedom of speech and the right to peaceably assemble. It is an established rule of this court that assignments which are not argued in the briefs of the party complaining are deemed to be waived and will receive no attention here. The reason for the rule and its application is sound. It is fair to all litigants, avoids surprise to counsel, and gives to each party an equal opportunity to be heard on contested matter. In Brown v. Dunn, 38 Neb. 52, 58 N. W. 703, the rule was applied by Ragan, C.: "We will not examine errors alleged in a petition in error, unless such errors are specifically pointed out and relied upon in the briefs filed in the case, under the rules of this court." In support of his ruling he cites Phenix Ins Co. v. Reams, 37 Neb. 423, 55 N. W. 1074. To the same effect are the following: Peaks v. Lord, 42 Neb. 15, 60 N. W. 349; Madsen v. State, 44 Neb. 631, 62 N. W. 1081; Blodgett v. McMurtry, 54 Neb. 71, 74 N. W. 392; Scott v. Chope, 33 Neb. 41, 49 N. W. 940; Glaze v. Parcel, 40 Neb. 732, 59 N. W. 382; Gulick v. Webb, 41 Neb. 706, 43 Am. St. Rep. 720, 60 N. W. 13; Erck v. Omaha Nat. Bank, 43 Neb. 613, 62 N. W. 67; Johnson v. Gulick, 46 Neb. 817, 50 Am. St. Rep. 629, 65 N. W. 883; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Gerhold, 47 Neb. 397, 66 N. W. 538; Mandell v. Weldin, 59 Neb. 699; 82 N. W. 6.

The majority opinion holds: "Where it appears on the face of a legislative act that an inducement for its passage was a void provision, the entire act falls." And that: "Where valid and invalid parts of a legislative act are so intermingled that they cannot be separated in such a manner as to leave an enforceable statute expressing the legislative will, no part of the enactment can be enforced." Even assuming that the portions of the act in question are invalid that are pointed out by the majority opinion, yet it does not appear that they are so intermingled with the valid portions that they cannot be separated so as to leave an enforceable statute. The act in question would still be enforceable by omitting from its 1st section the following words: "Indorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to in any manner." With these words omitted the 1st section would provide that candidates for the judiciary and executive school offices "shall not be nominated by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election." Applying the same rule to the feature of § 3 of the act, which limits the number of signatures to 500 names in any one county, and with these words omitted, "not more than 500 of which shall be from one county," the section would then read: "The number of signatures shall not be less than 5,000 . . . when the nomination is for chief justice or judge of the supreme court." The limitation of 500 signatures to any one county is not essential to the practical operation of the act. With this feature omitted, 5,000 voters from any portion of the state would nominate, and thus the relator, by his own showing, would not be deprived of any substantial right. The act would then merely change the place of nomination from the floor of the party convention, or from the party primary, to the body of the people, without regard to party affiliation. Has a political party an inherent right to nominate party candidates for nonpolitical offices? Are not all the people greater than a mere party subdivision of the people?

Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations (7th ed. p. 247), concerning a legislative act, says: "The constitutional and unconstitutional provisions may even be contained in the same section, and yet be perfectly distinct and separable, so that the first may stand though the last fall." In support of this view the author cites many authorities. The majority opinion contains a citation from State v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 71 Neb. 325, 99 N. W. 36, 100 N. W. 405, 102 N. W. 1022, 106 N. W. 767. Fairly construed, it reaffirms the rule laid down by Judge Cooley. Blair v. Ridgely, 41 Mo. 63, 97 Am. Dec. 248: "Outside of society, and disconnected with political society, no person has or can exercise the elective franchise as a natural right, and he only receives it upon entering into the social compact subject to such qualifications as may be prescribed by the state or body politic." People v. Barber, 48 Hun, 198, 201: "The elective suffrage is not a natural right of the citizen. It is a franchise dependent upon law, by which it must be conferred to permit its exercise. Spencer v. Board of Registration, 1 MacArth. 169, 29 Am. Rep. 582."

The inducement for the passage of the act is not expressed in its details, but is found in its broader language, which is expressive of a laudable desire to separate the judicial and the school system from partisan political control, by nonpartisan nominations and nonpartisan elections.

In the belief that the judgment of the trial court should be reversed, and the act in question sustained, this dissent is submitted.

Letton, J., dissenting:

While I agree with much that is said in the majority opinion, I must dissent from the conclusion reached. That opinion holds:

1. That the provision of the law under consideration which declares that candidates for judicial and educational offices shall not be "nominated, indorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to in any manner, by any political party, or any political convention or primary, or at any primary election," is void as being in violation of the provisions of the Bill of Rights protecting liberty of speech and the right of free public assembly. So far as the prohibition of free speech by citizens assembled together in conventions is concerned, this provision of the act is clearly and manifestly void. Its enforcement in this respect would be an assault of the gravest and most heinous character upon the liberty of the citizen, and one that no free people would long endure. It is opposed to that spirit of liberty which is our dearest heritage, and which should be most jealously conserved and strongly defended by legislature, courts, and private citizen alike. It cannot be defended as a valid exercise of legislative power, and, indeed, counsel for respondent laudably has made no attempt to do so. But, perhaps, recognizing its inability and the folly of attempting to curb and limit free speech and free assemblage in a land of liberty, the legislature wisely attached no penalty or punitive sanction to a violation of its commands in these respects. Since a disregard of this provision can meet no punishment, all that part of the act may be treated as surplusage. It may be considered as an indication of what the legislature would have liked to do if it had the power, or perhaps as advisory in its nature. But I cannot go so far as the majority in holding this whole provision void. Not all of it is obnoxious to or inhibited by any provision of the Constitution. The regulation of primary elections is concededly within the province of the legislature, and that portion of this provision which prohibits the nomination of such candidates at any primary election is not in violation of any constitutional provision, and is a proper regulation. The legislature may, as it did for many years before the passage of the Australian ballot law, leave the whole matter of the nomination of candidates and the preparation of ballots to be used at the general election to individual or party care; the only regulation at that time being that the elector should deliver in full view of the people assembled at the polls a piece of paper with the name of the person voted for written or printed thereon and a pertinent description of the office. Gen. Stat. 1873, chap. 20, § 29. Or it may take into its hands the entire control and direction of the nomination of candidates and the preparation and furnishing of official ballots. Its action in regard to these matters, where no constitutional right is assailed, is conclusive alike upon the courts and upon the citizen.

In this state the printing and furnishing of official ballots has for years been assumed by the state. No other ballots than those furnished by public authority can be used. The manner in which the names of candidates shall appear upon such official ballot, whether with or without party designation, is a matter entirely within the control and discretion of the legislature, provided only that in this respect no discrimination or partiality is shown which will defeat the constitutional requirements providing for "a free ballot and a fair count." Political parties may or may not be recognized by the legislature in regulating the form of ballots, and there is no constitutional requirement which compels their notice. The legislature has the option whether or not the ballots shall be "official" and printed at public expense, and whether party designations shall appear thereon; and it has the power to decide whether the names of candidates printed upon the "official ballots" shall be ascertained by petition, by convention, by primary election, or by any other manner which accomplishes the end sought, a reasonable limitation of the number of names necessary to print in order to afford every elector a fair opportunity to express his preference. While at the general election the elector may vote for whom he pleases by writing any name upon the ballot, it is manifestly impossible for the state to print in advance the name of every possible candidate, and the exercise of some method of selection is necessary to avoid needless expense and an unwieldy and cumbersome ballot. The state, too, has the right reasonably to classify offices, and to provide that candidates for certain offices shall be selected by primary election and for others by petition. This state having heretofore adopted the primary system of nominations as to certain offices, it has the power to prohibit nominations at a primary election for such offices as to which it is provided nomination shall be by petition. In my judgment the prohibition of the nomination of candidates for judicial and educational offices at primary elections is a valid exercise of legislative power, but the prohibition of free speech and free assemblage contained in the act is not and ought not to be of more practical or legal effect than "sounding brass or tinkling cymbals" or "the crackling of thorns under a pot."

2. Coming now to the provision limiting signatures to petitions for candidates for the office of supreme judge to not more than 500 in any one county: In its practical operation I seriously doubt whether this would hinder or obstruct any voter in the exercise of the elective franchise. Everyone who has observed the degree of care and discrimination, or rather lack of these qualities, which the average man ordinarily employs before he affixes his name to petitions, must come to the conclusion that, after obtaining 500 signers in a few counties in the more densely populated portion of the state, there would be little or no difficulty in filling the quota from the eighty or more counties left to canvass. But, however this may be, the possibility exists that the reputation of a candidate entirely fitted and qualified for, and who might adorn the position, may be so purely local that, unless the voters of his own immediate locality furnish the 5,000 names necessary under the law, thousands of voters in that locality would be placed at a serious disadvantage, as compared with voters in other parts of the state, by being compelled to write the name of their choice upon the official ballot, instead of its being printed thereon. The contingency is in my opinion remote, but it may happen. The unexpected often happens. It is the duty of the courts to preserve and uphold every constitutional safeguard thrown around the exercise of the elective franchise, and since the view taken by the majority is in the direction of promoting and preserving wider freedom of choice, and removes a hindrance or obstruction to the right of selection, I concur in the holding that this provision is discriminatory and void. But the limitation as to 500 signatures only applies to judges of the supreme court. No such provision is made as to other candidates, and this single provision certainly was not the inducement for the passage of the act. As to all other officers, the majority opinion condemns the act upon one ground alone, that of the empty and forceless inhibition of free speech. I am firmly convinced that this alone is mere redundant matter, and is not of sufficient importance to justify setting the law aside.

This brings me to the question of what effect on the whole law is had by excising both of these provisions. It is a fundamental and elementary proposition that, under our system of government, what laws shall be passed, what political or governmental policy pursued, or what economic theory adopted in the affairs of government, are matters with which the legislature is alone concerned, and for which it is alone responsible to the people of the state. It may be as well to say in this connection that whether the act was passed by a bare majority or whether it was unanimously adopted, whether the policy is new or whether ancient, whether its intent is wise or whether unwise, whether passed from partisan motives or not, and whether the result may prove to be good or evil, are matters with which the court has no concern. Many laws, in fact most of great importance, have a partisan origin, and are obnoxious to many persons; but with this we have nothing to do. Does the law, or do any of its provisions, violate the Constitution? This is the sole question. If any portion of the act does so, is that portion such an essential and necessary element that its elimination leaves a law incomplete and fragmentary, and which does not accord with the legislative purpose and intent, and which is incapable of enforcement? It is the duty of the court to construe and interpret acts passed by the legislature so as to uphold them if their language reasonably admits of such interpretation, and not to set them aside unless they clearly contravene the constitutional limitations upon legislative power. All doubts must be resolved in favor of the statute, and all presumptions are that the legislature passed a valid act and kept within its constitutional powers. As a corollary, if a part of a statute fails as being obnoxious to the limitations of that instrument, if, after the elimination of the objectionable part, enough of the law remains so that the intention of the legislature may be carried out, and the desired end and purpose of the enactment accomplished, the act may stand. These propositions are so elementary that citation of authorities is needless; and, indeed, these are the canons recognized in the majority opinion. I agree with the language of Judge Holcomb, quoted in the majority opinion, that "the language found in the invalid portion of the act can have no legal force or efficacy for any purpose whatever," and with the language of the majority opinion that "what remains must express the legislative will, independently of the void part, since the court has no power to legislate."

Tested by this rule, does "what remains express the legislative will?" I am convinced that there is no difficulty with the law in this respect. After eliminating the prohibition of free speech and the provision limiting the number of signatures for the office of supreme judge, we find an act which in substance provides that candidates for judicial and educational offices shall be nominated by petition, and not at primary elections, prescribing the number of signatures to entitle the candidate to the printing of his name upon the official ballot, and providing that the names shall be printed thereon without party designation. I see no obstacle to the carrying out of these provisions. I am of the opinion that, since the entire control of the printing of the official ballot has been placed in the hands of the public authorities, and since, if any candidate should "be nominated, endorsed, recommended, censured, criticized, or referred to" by any political party or political convention, this could have no possible effect upon the printing of any name or party designation upon the official ballot, the declared end and purpose of the act to remove the election of candidates for such offices from the domain of party politics may be accomplished so far as it may be done among a free people. The legislature cannot prevent free speech; but it can control and regulate the official ballot and the manner of selection of names of candidates to be printed thereon. It has the right to do so in such a manner as to remove, as far as it may, consistent with constitutional rights, certain offices or all offices, if it chooses, "from the domain of partisan politics," if in its judgment it believes it to be for the best interests of the state. It cannot abolish parties nor prevent their formation; it cannot prevent the free and open discussion of the qualifications and fitness for office of candidates, either by newspapers, individuals, or assemblages of citizens, whether in church, mass meeting, or political convention; but it has the undoubted right to mitigate, if it can, any evils that it believes to flow from nominations by political parties, so long as it acts in such a manner that there shall be no infringement upon the requirement of the Constitution that "all elections shall be free; and there shall be no hindrance or impediment to the right of a qualified voter to exercise the elective franchise." Art. 1, § 22.

I believe that, with the excision of the immaterial and unessential provisions mentioned, the law is still in accordance with the legislative purpose and intent, and with the Constitution of the state; that these portions may be declared invalid, and the remainder of the statute upheld as a valid exercise of legislative power. For these reasons, I must dissent from the conclusion reached that the law is altogether void.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

CHARLES G. LARSON, Appt.,

v.

FRANK NEWMAN, Admr., etc., of George J. Newman, Deceased, et al., Resp'ts.

(— N. D. —, 121 N. W. 202.)

Broker — sale of land — termination of authority.

1. A landowner made a contract in writing with S. & Co., land agents, authorizing them to sell a piece of land on terms stated in the contract. Afterwards the firm of S. & Co. dissolved. S., continuing the business, made a contract to sell the land to plaintiff on terms somewhat different from those authorized in the agency contract, and signed the landowner's name thereto by himself as agent. In an action to compel the landowner to specifically perform the contract, held that whatever authority was conferred upon S. & Co. by the agency contract was terminated upon the dissolution of the copartnership, and S. had no further power under that contract.

Same — exceeding authority — binding effect.

2. The sale by an agent on any other terms and conditions than those authorized by the principal is not binding on the latter.

Same — ratification — evidence — sufficiency.

3. Evidence insufficient to show a ratification by the principal of the contract of sale by S. to plaintiff.

(March 13, 1909.)

Headnotes by CARMODY, J.

Case Note. — Dissolution of partnership authorized to act as agent, as termination of agency.

This note does not cover the general question whether partnership contracts are terminated by a dissolution of the firm, but it is confined strictly to the effect of dissolution upon contracts of agency. Neither are cases of joint agents other than partnerships within its scope.

The dissolution of a partnership authorized to act as an agent is generally held to revoke the agency.

Thus, the dissolution of a partnership avoids an order given to a carrier, authorizing the delivery of goods to such partnership for the purpose of cartage; and a firm composed of two of the members of the former partnership of three has no authority to continue to act thereunder. Angle v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 9 Iowa. 487.

So, the principal is entitled to discontinue the agency, where, upon dissolution of a partnership which had acted as agent in collecting rents, the partners offer each to collect a part of the rent in the future. Thomas v. Gwyn, 131 N. C. 460, 42 S. E. 904.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Ward County in defendants' favor in an action brought to compel specific performance of an alleged contract to sell certain land. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Johnson & Nestos and Skulason & Burtness for appellant.

Messrs. Engerud, Holt, & Frame, with Messrs. Palda & Burke, for respondents:

Upon dissolution of the firm the agency ceased.

Martine v. International L. Ins. Soc. 53 N. Y. 341, 13 Am. Rep. 529; Johnson v. Wilcox, 25 Ind. 182.

A sale by an agent on any other terms and conditions than those authorized by the principal is not binding on the latter.

Carmony, J., delivered the opinion of the court:
